THE AMERICAN CASEBOOK SERIES

THE first of the American Casebook Series, Mikell's Cases on Criminal Law, issued in December, 1908, contained in its preface an able argument by Mr. James Brown Scott, the General Editor of the Series, in favor of the case method of law teaching. Until 1915 this preface appeared in each of the volumes published in the series. But the teachers of law have moved onward, and the argument that was necessary in 1908 has now become needless. That such is the case becomes strikingly manifest to one examining three important documents that fittingly mark the progress of legal education in America. In 1893 the United States Bureau of Education published a report on Legal Education prepared by the American Bar Association's Committee on Legal Education, and manifestly the work of that Committee's accomplished chairman, William G. Hammond. in which the three methods of teaching law then in vogue—that is, by lectures, by text-book, and by selected cases—were described and commented upon, but without indication of preference. The next report of the Bureau of Education dealing with legal education, published in 1914, contains these unequivocal statements:

"To-day the case method forms the principal, if not the exclusive, method of teaching in nearly all of the stronger law schools of the country. Lectures on special subjects are of course still delivered in all law schools, and this doubtless always will be the case. But for staple instruction in the important branches of common law the case has proved itself as the best available material for use practically everywhere. * * * The case method is to-day the principal method of instruction in the great majority of the schools of this country."

But the most striking evidence of the present stage of development of legal instruction in American Law Schools is to be found in the special report, made by Professor Redlich to the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, on "The Case Method in American Law Schools." Professor Redlich, of the Faculty of Law in the University of Vienna, was brought to this country to make a special study of methods of legal instruction in the United States from the standpoint of one free from those prejudices necessarily engendered in American teachers through their relation to the struggle for supremacy so long, and at one time so vehemently, waged among the rival systems. From this masterly report, so replete with brilliant analysis and discriminating comment, the following brief extracts are taken. Speaking of the text-book method Professor Redlich says:

"The principles are laid down in the text-book and in the professor's lectures, ready made and neatly rounded, the predigested essence of many judicial decisions. The pupil has simply to accept them and to inscribe them so far as possible in his memory. In this way the scientific element of instruction is apparently excluded from the very first. Even though the representatives of this instruction certainly do regard law as a science—that is to say, as a system of thought, a grouping of concepts to be satisfactorily explained by historical research and logical deduction—they are not willing to teach this science, but only its results. The inevitable danger which appears to accompany this method of teaching is that of developing a mechanical, superficial instruction in abstract maxims, instead of a genuine intellectual probing of the subject-matter of the law, fulfilling the requirements of a science."

Turning to the case method Professor Redlich comments as follows:

"It emphasizes the scientific character of legal thought; it goes now a step further, however, and demands that law, just because it is a science, must also be taught scientifically. From this point of view it very properly rejects the elementary school type of existing legal education as inadequate to develop the specific legal mode of thinking, as inadequate to make the basis, the logical foundation, of the separate legal principles really intelligible to the students. Consequently, as the method was developed, it laid the main emphasis upon precisely that aspect of the training which the older text-book school entirely neglected—the training of the student in intellectual independence, in individual thinking, in digging out the principles through penetrating analysis of the material found within separate cases; material which contains, all mixed in with one another, both the facts, as life creates them, which generate the law, and at the same time rules of the law itself, component parts of the general system. In the fact that, as has been said before, it has actually accomplished this purpose, lies the great success of the case method. For it really teaches the pupil to think in the way that any practical lawyer—whether dealing with written or with unwritten law—ought to and has to think. It prepares the student in precisely the way which, in a country of case law, leads to full powers of legal understanding and legal acumen; that is to say, by making the law pupil familiar with the law through incessant practice in the analysis of law cases, where the concepts, principles, and rules of Anglo-American law are recorded, not as dry abstractions, but as cardinal realities in the inexhaustibly rich, ceaselessly fluctuating, social and economic life of man. Thus in the modern American law school professional practice is preceded by a genuine course of study, the methods of which are perfectly adapted to the nature of the common law."

The general purpose and scope of this series were clearly stated in the original announcement:

"The General Editor takes pleasure in announcing a series of scholarly casebooks, prepared with special reference to the needs and limitations of the classroom, on the fundamental subjects of legal education, which, through a judicious rearrangement of emphasis, shall provide adequate training combined with a thorough knowledge of the general principles of the subject. The collection will develop the law historically and scientifically; English cases will give the origin and development of the law in England; American cases will trace its expansion and modification in America; notes and annotations will suggest phases omitted in the printed case. Cumulative references will be avoided, for the footnote may not hope to rival the digest. The law will thus be presented as an organic growth, and the necessary connection between the past and the present will be obvious.

"The importance and difficulty of the subject as well as the time that can properly be devoted to it will be carefully considered so that each book may be completed within the time allotted to the particular subject. * * * If it be granted that all, or nearly all, the studies required for admission to the bar should be studied in course by every student—and the soundness of this contention can hardly be seriously doubted—it follows necessarily that the preparation and publication of collections of cases exactly adapted to the purpose would be a genuine and by no means unimportant service to the cause of legal education. And this result can best be obtained by the preparation of a systematic series of casebooks constructed upon a uniform plan under the supervision of an editor in chief. * * *

"The following subjects are deemed essential in that a knowledge of them (with the exception of International Law and General Jurisprudence) is almost universally required for admission to the bar:

Administrative Law.	Equity Pleading.
Agency.	Evidence.
Bailments.	Insurance.
Bills and Notes.	International Law.
Carriers.	Jurisprudence.
Code Pleading.	Legal Ethics.
Common-Law Pleading.	Partnership.
Conflict of Laws.	Personal Property.
Constitutional Law.	Public Corporations.
Contracts.	Quasi Contracts.
Corporations.	Real Property.
Criminal Law.	Sales.
Criminal Procedure.	Suretyship.
Damages.	Torts.
Domestic Relations.	Trusts.
Equity.	Wills and Administration.

"International Law is included in the list of essentials from its intrinsic importance in our system of law. As its principles are simple in comparison with municipal law, as their application is less technical, and as the cases are generally interesting, it is thought that the book may be larger than otherwise would be the case.

"The preparation of the casebooks has been intrusted to experienced and well-known teachers of the various subjects included, so that the experience of the classroom and the needs of the students will furnish a sound basis of selection."

AUTHOR'S PREFATORY NOTE

NO STUDENT or teacher should suppose that he can learn the law of contracts from one casebook or one text-book. If the law consisted of one set of rules, consistent, uniform, and logically constructed, the author's problem and the student's problem would be greatly simplified, though less interesting. The law is not such a set of rules, and it must be taught as it is—inconsistent, variable, illogical, growing and changing with the growth of civilization. As the mores change, the prevailing notions of social and economic welfare, the conscious and unconscious customs of men, the practices of business affairs, even as the notions of individual groups and of individual men change, so also change the stated rules of law. It has long been impossible to present the story of this growth of Anglo-American contract law in one volume. What was the law prior to the year 1300 as put into Latin by Bracton? What is its tortuous path in Anglo-Latin-French during the centuries of the Year Books (1300–1550)? What are the rules laid down by our industrious reporters in the English tongue, from Plowden to Meeson and Welsby (1550–1850)? What are our American courts going to decide to-morrow?

The purpose of the present casebook is to afford introductory material for answering the last question. Even as such an introduction, it cannot fail to seem inadequate. There are too many jurisdictions, too great a conflict, too great a complexity of affairs, too industrious a production of opinions, for any volume to give full satisfaction. It is indeed true that the last question cannot be answered without answering all the preceding ones and more. Yet the present volume offers no material as early as Bracton; it presents only a small amount from the Year Books; and even the period of the English reporters is sacrificed to include more cases from the recent past. It is hoped that enough of the earlier material has been included to indicate continuity of legal history and to prove that the future is influenced by the remote as well as by the recent past. But student and teacher must go elsewhere for knowledge of the earlier periods. Bracton's age must be left to the historical scholar. The Year Books can and should be read for themselves. For the period between 1550 and 1850, it will generally be sufficient to study the two volumes of cases published by Langdell. To supplement the present volume as to present-day law, there are other excellent collections of cases and there are the amazing digests and the labyrinthine libraries. Some footnotes have been added to assist in making further independent investigation; they are not intended to make such investigation unnecessary.

Of the 594 cases in the present volume, 258 have been decided since 1900, 224 between 1800 and 1899, and 112 prior to 1800; 185 cases are English, while 409 represent the federal courts and 39 different states in the Union. An effort has been made not to neglect leading cases that are commonly cited as having first laid down or established an important rule of law. At least one-fourth of the cases herein will also be found in earlier casebooks on the subject.

The order of arrangement has been chosen with the purpose of making the topics and the individual cases most readily understood by the beginning student. Teachers frequently disagree as to the most desirable order; but it is not difficult to rearrange topics to suit individual taste.

One cannot use a particular casebook in his law school courses for more than 15 years without being greatly influenced by both the choice of cases and the order of their arrangement. For this reason the present writer will be found greatly indebted to Professor Samuel Williston, and through him to his predecessors, Professors Ames and Langdell. Acknowledgment is also due to the work of Professor Keener. The very special debt owed to Professor Hohfeld is shown, not so much in the construction of the casebook as in the critical analysis and comparison of the classroom. Hohfeld's articles on "Some Fundamental Legal Relations as Applied in Judicial Reasoning," 23 Yale Law Journal, 16 (1913), and 26 Yale Law Journal, 710 (1917), reveal new possibilities for constructive work to every student of the law. Acknowledgment is also made to the Oxford University Press for its permission to make use of the notes in the writer's edition of Anson on Contracts, published in 1919.

TABLE OF CASES

Cases printed in ordinary type are the cases reported as the text of this volume. Cases printed in italics are found in the footnotes and in text; they are included in this table either because they are stated and discussed, or because they are printed in other casebooks and have become known to many teachers and students, who will thus be enabled to use this table as a supplementary index.

ON THE

LAW OF CONTRACTS

CHAPTER I

OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE

SECTION 1.—INOPERATIVE PRELIMINARY NEGOTIATION

WEEKS v. TYBALD.

(In the King's Bench, 1605. Nov. 11.)

In an assumpsit the plaintiff alleges, that whereas there was a communication of marriage between the plaintiff and the daughter of the defendant, that the defendant upon speech between the father of the plaintiff and the defendant, for free liberty to the plaintiff to come to the house of the defendant to woo his daughter, the defendant then and there affirm'd and publish't that he would give £100 to him that should marry his daughter with his consent, &c. By the court the action doth not lye, for asseruit et publicavit doth not make words that include a promise.

It is not aver'd nor declar'd to whom the words were spoken, and it is not reason that the defendant should be bound by such general words spoken to excite suitors.

KELLER v. HOLDERMAN.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1863. 11 Mich. 248, 83 Am. Dec. 737.)

Action by Holderman against Keller upon a check for $300 drawn by Keller upon a banker at Niles, and not honored. The cause was tried without a jury, and the Circuit Judge found as facts, that the check was given for an old silver watch, worth about $15, which Keller took and kept till the day of trial, when he offered to return it to the plaintiff, who refused to receive it. The whole transaction was a frolic and banter—the plaintiff not expecting to sell, nor the defendant intending to buy the watch at the sum for which the check was drawn. The defendant when he drew the check had no money in the banker's hands, and had intended to insert a condition in the check that would prevent his being liable upon it; but as he had failed to do so, and had retained the watch, the Judge held him liable, and judgment was rendered against him for the amount of the check.

MARTIN, C. J. When the court below found as a fact that "the whole transaction between the parties was a frolic and a banter, the plaintiff not expecting to sell, nor the defendant intending to buy the watch at the sum for which the check was drawn," the conclusion should have been that no contract was ever made by the parties, and the finding should have been that no cause of action existed upon the check to the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, with costs of this court and of the court below.[1]

The other Justices concurred.

HIGGINS v. LESSIG.

(Appellate Court of Illinois, 1893. 49 Ill. App. 459.)

CARTWRIGHT, J.[2] Appellant was the owner of a set of old double harness, worth perhaps $15, which was taken from his premises without his knowledge, and he offered a reward of $100 for the recovery of the harness and the conviction of the thief. A few days afterward a boy named Wilt found part of the harness in appellee's berry patch, and appellant went with appellee to the place and brought that part of the harness into appellee's blacksmith shop. Appellant gave the boy who had found the harness a quarter of a dollar, and said he would give him a dollar to find the rest of it. Appellee claims that appellant at that time offered a reward of $100 to the one who would find out who the thief was, and that he earned the reward. This suit was brought to recover the amount so claimed as a reward, and a trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee for $100.

The evidence showed that the defendant was much excited on the

In Plate v. Durst, 42 W. Va. 63, 24 S. E. 580, 32 L. R. A. 404 (1896), the defendant promised plaintiff $1,000 and a diamond ring if she would stay in his service. He now claims this was said in jest. The court said: "Jokes are sometimes taken seriously by the young and inexperienced in the deceptive ways of the business world, and if such is the case, and thereby the person deceived is led to give valuable services in the full belief and expectation that the joker is in earnest, the law will also take the joker at his word, and give him good reason to smile." See, to the same effect: Nyulasy v. Rowan, 17 Vict. L. R. 663 (1891); Theiss v. Weiss, supra.

occasion, when it is claimed that the offer was made in the shop. Plaintiff's version of the language used was that defendant said, "I will give $100 to any man who will find out who the thief is, and I will give a lawyer $100 for prosecuting him," using rough language and epithets concerning the thief. There was evidence of substantial repetitions of the statement, together with the assertion that he would not have a second-class lawyer, either, and that he would not hire a cheap lawyer, but a good lawyer. The harness had been taken by a man called Red John Smith, who had been adjudged insane, and a Mrs. Phillips told the plaintiff that she saw Smith walking by with the harness on his back, on Sunday morning, which was the time when it was taken. Plaintiff watched Smith that night and saw him hiding the collars, and the next day he waited for the return of the defendant from Galesburg, and told him that Red John Smith had the harness. A search warrant was procured, and the remainder of the harness was found.

We do not think that the language used was such as, under the circumstances, would show an intention to contract to pay a reward, and think plaintiff had no right to regard it as such. Defendant had previously offered a very liberal reward for the return of the old harness and the conviction of the thief. On this occasion he paid the boy only a trifling sum, and offered only $1 for finding the rest of the property. His further language was in the nature of an explosion of wrath against some supposed thief who had stolen the harness, and was coupled with boasting and bluster about the prosecution of the thief. It was indicative of a state of excitement, so out of proportion to the supposed cause of it, that it should be regarded rather as the extravagant exclamation of an excited man than as manifesting an intention to contract. * * * [3]

[3] In accord: Stamper v. Temple, 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 113, 44 Am. Dec. 296 (1845).

The absence of an intention to create legal relations may be evidenced in various ways. In Balfour v. Balfour, [1919] 2 K. B. 571, Atkin, L. J., said: "There are agreements which do not result in contracts. * * * The ordinary example is where two parties agree to take a walk together, or where there is an offer and acceptance of hospitality. * * * One of the most usual forms of agreement which does not constitute a contract appears to me to be the arrangements which are made between husband and wife. * * * They are not contracts, because the parties did not intend that they should be attended by legal consequences."

Sometimes parties merely give their "word of honor, as business men," Osgood v. Skinner, 211 Ill. 229, 71 N. E. 869 (1904); or they may expressly provide that their agreement shall not be enforceable at law, Smith v. Macdonald, 37 Cal. App. 503, 174 Pac. 80 (1918), post, p. 711; Monroe v. Martin, 137 Ga. 262, 73 S. E. 341 (1911).

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO. v. JOHNSON.

Bill by Montgomery Ward & Co. against Mary E. Johnson. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

BRALEY, J. The essential allegations of the bill are admitted by the demurrer, but if they fail to show a binding contract between the parties, it cannot be maintained for specific performance, or injunctive relief. The defendant manufactured and sold firearms of certain types, which had acquired in the market a recognized reputation for their quality and style of workmanship. In the management of the business, sales were made only to jobbers, who were to resell to their customers at a uniform price. But having received complaints that the scale of prices in some instances had not been followed, she issued a printed letter, which after reciting the cause of its publication, and that "we have prepared, and are sending under this cover by registered post, a printed document setting forth the terms and conditions upon which Iver Johnson revolvers will be supplied to the jobbing trade," contained the statement that "hereafter no order will be filled except upon the terms set forth in the enclosed document, therefore please read it carefully, for we are going to ask your support and cooperation." The plaintiff apparently was a customer of the defendant, and having received the letter, alleges that it was "a certain offer in writing to make a contract," the terms and conditions of which were expressed in the accompanying document. It is then alleged that, "intending to accept said contract, and to cause that the defendant should be bound by said acceptance; and that the parties should be mutually bound thereby," the plaintiff transmitted to the defendant an order for revolvers; but there is no allegation that this purpose was communicated to her, or that the order was accepted with this understanding.

The plaintiff relies on these transactions as constituting a bilateral contract. But if the letter and document are examined in connection with the recitals, they were not in the nature of a general offer, where upon compliance with the conditions by those to whom it is addressed, a legally binding contract at once springs into existence. The defendant promulgated the terms under which she proposed to do business in the future, not with the plaintiff only, but with the members of the jobbing trade, who were to be treated as licensees, if they would agree to abide by them. It is expressly announced, in the seventh paragraph of the document, that the defendant does not undertake to furnish, or to be responsible for a failure to deliver goods which may be ordered, and the words, "that it can be revoked without liability for damages by thirty days written notice, to date from the actual mailing of the notice," refer to the license to deal in the defendant's product, with a discontinuance of all business relations. "A contract is an agreement which creates an obligation," said Mr. Justice Field in Ashcroft v.

Butterworth, 136 Mass. 511, 514. And an invitation to prospective buyers to negotiate for a license, and to trade with the defendant, even when confined to a definite class, imposes no obligation on the sender of accepting any offer which thereafter might be received. The order of the prospective buyer does not ripen into a contract of sale until the defendant's acceptance, and then only as to goods specifically ordered. Smith v. Gowdy, 8 Allen, 566; Lincoln v. Erie Preserving Co., 132 Mass. 129; Edge Moor Bridge Works v. Bristol, 170 Mass. 528, 49 N. E. 918; Moulton v. Kershaw, 59 Wis. 316, 18 N. W. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 516; Spencer v. Harding, L. R. 5 C. P. 561; Canning v. Farquhar, 16 Q. B. D. 727, 732.

We are of opinion that a fair interpretation of the letter, and document, very plainly shows that it was not a general offer to sell to those addressed, but an announcement, or invitation, that the defendant would receive proposals for sales on the terms and conditions stated, which she might accept or reject at her option. No contract between the parties having been created, the defendant's refusal to accept and fill the plaintiff's orders, as alleged in the bill, was not an actionable wrong, and the further questions of a breach, and the measure and form of relief, and whether the contract was legally terminated by the notice, become immaterial, and need not be discussed.

The decree of the single justice, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill, must be affirmed with costs.

Decree accordingly.

NEBRASKA SEED CO. v. HARSH.

Action by the Nebraska Seed Company, a corporation, against H. F. Harsh. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

MORRISSEY, C. J. Plaintiff, a corporation, engaged in buying and selling seed in the city of Omaha, Neb., brought this action against the defendant, a farmer residing at Lowell, Kearney county, Neb. The petition alleges:

"That on the 26th day of April, 1912, the plaintiff purchased of and from the defendant 1,800 bushels of millet seed at the agreed price of $2.25 per hundredweight, F. O. B. Lowell, Neb., which said purchase and contract was evidenced by writing and correspondence passing between the respective parties of which the following is a copy:

" 'Lowell, Nebraska, 4—24—1912.

" 'Neb. Seed Co., Omaha, Neb.—Gentlemen: I have about 1,800 bu. or thereabouts of millet seed of which I am mailing you a sample. This millet is recleaned and was grown on sod and is good seed. I want $2.25 per cwt. for this seed f. o. b. Lowell.

" 'Yours truly, H. F. Harsh.'

"Said letter was received by the plaintiff at its place of business in Omaha, Neb., on the 26th day of April, 1912, and immediately thereafter the plaintiff telegraphed to the defendant at Lowell, Neb., a copy of which is as follows:

" '4—26—12.

" 'H. F. Harsh, Lowell, Nebr. Sample and letter received. Accept your offer. Millet like sample two twenty-five per hundred. Wire how soon can load. The Nebraska Seed Co.'

"On the same day, to wit, April 26, 1912, the plaintiff, in answer to the letter of the said defendant, wrote to him a letter and deposited the same in the United States mail, directed to the said defendant at Lowell, Neb., which said letter was duly stamped, and which the plaintiff charges that the defendant in due course of mail received. That a copy of said letter is as follows:

" '4—26—12.

" 'Mr. H. F. Harsh, Lowell, Neb.—Dear Sir: We received your letter and sample of millet seed this morning and at once wired you as follows: "Sample and letter received. Accept your offer. Millet like sample two twenty-five per hundred, wire how soon can load." We confirm this message have booked purchase of you 1,800 bushels of millet seed to be fully equal to sample you sent us at $2.25 per cwt. your track. Please be so kind as to load this seed at once and ship to us at Omaha. We thank you in advance for prompt attention. When anything further in the line of millet to offer, let us have samples.

" 'Yours truly, The Nebraska Seed Co.' "

It alleges that defendant refused to deliver the seed, after due demand and tender of the purchase price, and prays judgment in the sum of $900. Defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled. He saved an exception to the ruling and answered, denying that the petition stated a cause of action; that the correspondence set out constituted a contract, etc. There was a trial to a jury with verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

In our opinion the letter of defendant cannot be fairly construed into an offer to sell to the plaintiff. After describing the seed, the writer says, "I want $2.25 per cwt. for this seed f. o. b. Lowell." He does not say, "I offer to sell to you." The language used is general, and such as may be used in an advertisement, or circular addressed generally to those engaged in the seed business, and is not an offer by which he may be bound, if accepted, by any or all of the persons addressed.

"If a proposal is nothing more than an invitation to the person to whom it is made to make an offer to the proposer, it is not such an offer as can be turned into an agreement by acceptance. Proposals of this kind, although made to definite persons and not to the public generally, are merely invitations to trade; they go no further than what occurs when one asks another what he will give or take for certain goods. Such inquiries may lead to bargains, but do not make them.

They ask for offers which the proposer has a right to accept or reject as he pleases." 9 Cyc. 278e.

The letter as a whole shows that it was not intended as a final proposition, but as a request for bids. It did not fix a time for delivery, and this seems to have been regarded as one of the essentials by plaintiff, for in his telegram he requests defendant to "wire how soon can load."

"The mere statement of the price at which property is held cannot be understood as an offer to sell." Knight v. Cooley, 34 Iowa, 218.

The letter of acceptance is not in the terms of the offer. Defendant stated that he had 1,800 bushels or thereabouts. He did not fix a definite and certain amount. It might be 1,800 bushels; it might be more; it might be less; but plaintiff undertook to make an acceptance for 1,800 bushels—no more, no less. Defendant might not have this amount, and therefore be unable to deliver, or he might have a greater amount, and, after filling plaintiff's order, have a quantity of seed left for which he might find no market. We may assume that when he wrote the letter he did not contemplate the sale of more seed than he had, and that he fixed the price on the whole lot whether it was more or less than 1,800 bushels.

We do not think the correspondence made a complete contract. To so hold where a party sends out letters to a number of dealers would subject him to a suit by each one receiving a letter, or invitations to bid, even though his supply of seed were exhausted. In Lyman v. Robinson, 14 Allen (Mass.) 242, 254, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has sounded the warning:

"Care should always be taken not to construe as an agreement letters which the parties intended only as a preliminary negotiation."

Holding, as we do, that there was no binding contract between the parties, it is unnecessary to discuss the other questions presented.

The judgment of the district court is reversed.[4]

[4] In Moulton v. Kershaw, 59 Wis. 316, 18 N. W. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 516 (1884) the defendant sent the following letter:

"Milwaukee, September 19, 1882.

"J. H. Moulton, Esq., La Crosse, Wis.—Dear Sir: In consequence of a rupture in the salt trade, we are authorized to offer Michigan fine salt, in full car-load lots of 80 to 95 bbls., delivered at your city, at 85c. per bbl., to be shipped per C. & N. W. R. R. Co. only. At this price it is a bargain, as the price in general remains unchanged. Shall be pleased to receive your order.

"Yours truly, C. J. Kershaw & Son."

The plaintiff replied, saying: "You may ship me two thousand barrels as offered in your letter." It was held that the defendant's letter created no power of acceptance, but was a mere invitation to deal.

In Ahearn v. Ayres, 38 Mich. 692 (1878) the opinion of the court was as follows: "Ahearn sued defendants for not accepting certain stave bolts. It appears that he asked one of the firm what they were paying for bolts, and was answered they would take all he could make and deliver at $2 per cord. He afterwards made a lot of bolts, which he proposed to furnish, but they denied any bargain. There was no contract made out. Ahearn did not inform defendants that he would accept or act on their order, or deliver any

SHEPARD v. CARPENTER.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 54 Minn. 153, 55 N. W. 906.)

Action on a contract by Eugene S. Shepard against Herbert M. Carpenter. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

GILFILLAN, C. J. A contract between two persons, upon a valid consideration, that they will, at some specified time in the future, at the election of one of them, enter into a particular contract, specifying its terms, is undoubtedly binding, and upon a breach thereof the party having the election or option may recover as damages what such particular contract to be entered into, would have been worth to him, if made. But an agreement that they will in the future make such contract as they may then agree upon amounts to nothing. An agreement to enter into negotiations, and agree upon the terms of a contract, if they can, cannot be made the basis of a cause of action. There would be no way by which the court could determine what sort of a contract the negotiations would result in; no rule by which the court could ascertain whether any, or, if so, what, damages might follow a refusal to enter into such future contract. So, to be enforceable, a contract to enter into a future contract must specify all its material and essential terms, and leave none to be agreed upon as the result of future negotiations.

bolts, or, if any, how many. The transaction went no further than what occurs when any one asks another what he will either give or take for commodities. Such inquiries may lead to bargains, but do not make them."

In Harvey v. Facey, [1893] A. C. 552, the plaintiff telegraphed: "Will you sell us Bumper Hall Pen? Telegraph lowest cash price—answer paid." The defendant replied: "Lowest price for Bumper Hall Pen £900." The plaintiff then telegraphed: "We agree to buy Bumper Hall Pen for the sum of £900 asked by you." It was held there was no contract.

In Sellers v. Warren, 116 Me. 350, 102 Atl. 40 (1917) A. offered to buy B.'s interest in certain land for four-elevenths of the total selling price. B. replied: "Cannot accept offer; would not consider less than half." A. telegraphed: "Accept your offer of equal division." There was no contract made.

The following cases held that there was no offer creating any power of acceptance: Patton v. Arney, 95 Iowa, 664, 64 N. W. 635 (1895), defendant wrote that his steers "ought to be worth $4.25; Johnston Bros. v. Rogers Bros., 30 Ont. 150 (1899), "We quote you f. o. b. your station Hungarian $5.40 car lots only. * * * We would suggest your using the wire to order as prices are so rapidly advancing;" State v. Peters, 91 Me. 31, 39 Atl. 342 (1897), quotation of prices; Smith v. Gowdy, 8 Allen (Mass.) 566 (1864); Cherokee Tanning Extract Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 143 N. C. 376, 55 S. E. 777, 118 Am. St. Rep. 806 (1906); Beaupre v. Pacific & A. Tel. Co., 21 Minn. 155 (1874); Hall v. Kimbark, Fed. Cas. No. 5,938 (1874); Schubmacher v. Lebeck, 103 Kan. 458, 173 Pac. 1072, L. R. A. 1918F, 788 (1918), mere statement of terms of sale to a broker is not an offer to the broker; Boyers & Co. v. Duke, [1905] I. R. 617, 3 B. R. C. 220.

In the following cases the words used constituted an offer: Fairmount Glass Works v. Crunden-Martin Woodenware Co., 106 Ky. 659, 51 S. W. 196 (1899), "We quote you Mason jars * * * pints $4.50 per gross, for immediate acceptance"; Lawrence v. Milwaukee L. S. & W. R. Co., 84 Wis. 427, 54 N. W. 797 (1893); Woldert v. Arledge, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 692, 23 S. W. 1052 (1893). See, further, L. R. A. 1915F, 824, note.

The agreement herein sued on leaves essential terms of the future contract to be fixed by future agreement. It clearly contemplated that the logs to be cut and hauled should be delivered at some one place, but it does not specify what place, but instead thereof provides that the (future) contract shall be for plaintiff to cut into logs, "haul and deliver at the boom or other place of delivery, to be in and by said contract agreed upon," without indicating what boom, or where it may be. The place of delivery was manifestly left to be agreed on, and, when agreed on, inserted in the future contract. How payments were to be made by plaintiff for logs sold by him was a matter of serious importance, but all the contract says of it is: "One-third of the selling price thereof, in cash, to be paid within —— days after such sale shall be made."

It is manifest the parties intended the future contract to specify the number of days within which payment or payments were to be made, but that they had not agreed on the number of days, and so left it to be agreed on and inserted in the future contract. A perhaps still more important matter was within what time the logs should be cut. All the contract says of that is "that the amount of timber or logs to be cut in any one year shall be agreed upon, and be expressed in said contract." Where a final contract fails to express some matter, as, for instance, a time for payment, the law may imply the intention of the parties; but, where a preliminary contract leaves certain terms to be agreed upon for the purpose of a final contract, there can be no implication of what the parties will agree upon. Judgment affirmed.[5]

LESKIE v. HASELTINE.

Assumpsit by Henry B. Leskie against Charles F. Haseltine for breach of an agreement by defendant to give plaintiff the contract, as the successful bidder, for the erection of a building in Philadelphia. From a judgment entered on a verdict in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant, Charles F. Haseltine, desired to erect a large and costly building in Philadelphia, and requested his architect to ask for estimates. The architect did so by postal cards sent to a number of builders, in the following form: "204 South Fifth Street, March 28th, 1887. Dear Sir: You are requested to estimate on the Haseltine building. My office will be open from 9 A. M to 5 P. M. All bids must be addressed to me, and must be received at this office by noon, Wednesday, April 6th. Yours truly, W. N. Lockington, per W. W. L."

[5] In accord: Sibley v. Felton, 156 Mass. 273, 31 N. E. 10 (1892); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gorman, 79 Kan. 643, 100 Pac. 647, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 637 (1909); Somers v. Musolf, 86 Ark. 97, 109 S. W. 1173 (1908). See, also, Varney v. Ditmars, 217 N. Y. 223, 111 N. E. 822, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 758 (1916).

Ten builders, including H. B. Leskie, the plaintiff in this case, sent written estimates. Most of these were brought to the architect's office at noon on Wednesday, April 6th, the time mentioned in the postal card. The estimates were then opened, Mr. Haseltine and most of the builders or their representatives being present. The plaintiff's bid was the lowest. It was in the alternative for either $152,740 or $153,000, according to whether brick or iron arches were to be used. The plaintiff testified that when the bids were read out the defendant smiled, and said to plaintiff, "You are the lucky man." A witness called by the plaintiff added to this that the defendant said, "You have won, and fairly so." The defendant and his architect testified that all that was said by defendant was, "That is all for the present," and that the matter was adjourned for the purpose of considering the estimates, and this was corroborated by two or three other persons who were present. It was understood by all parties that a formal written contract would have to be entered into for the erection of the building before anything would be done.

The plaintiff testified that during several days after the opening of the estimates, and while the matter was under consideration, some of the details which would enter into such a contract were discussed between him and the defendant, but many of these details remained unsettled. While these matters were under discussion, and before any contract had been prepared or signed, the defendant, who had been investigating the character and ability of the plaintiff, came to the conclusion that he was not a desirable man to whom to intrust so large an undertaking, and notified him that he had concluded to give the contract to another bidder.

Defendant subsequently entered into a formal written contract with one of the higher bidders. The plaintiff then sued him for $15,000, alleging that what took place at the architect's office on the reading of the estimates amounted to a binding contract in law between the plaintiff and defendant for the erection of the building.[6]

Per Curiam. The plaintiff was admittedly the lowest bidder for the erection of defendant's building. It does not follow, however, that because he was the lowest bidder the defendant was bound to award him the contract. The fact that upon the opening of the bids either the architect or the defendant may have said to the plaintiff: "You are the lucky man," amounts to nothing more than a recognition of the fact that he was the lowest bidder. After the bids had been opened, it was the right of the defendant to inquire into the fitness and ability of the respective bidders to fulfill the contract. He was not bound to award it to a bidder who lacked either the skill, experience, or ability to properly perform the contract.

In this case the contract never was awarded to the plaintiff. There were a number of questions to be settled when the defendant and the bidder were brought together before their minds could be said to have agreed upon anything. The learned judge below submitted the case to the jury under proper instructions, and their verdict is the end of the matter.

Judgment affirmed.[7]

STANTON v. DENNIS.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1911. 64 Wash. 85, 116 Pac. 650.)

Action by E. M. Stanton against W. H. Dennis. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

FULLERTON, J. Some time in 1909, the Thompson-Starrett Company entered into a contract to construct an addition to the Fidelity Trust Company's building in the city of Tacoma. Thereafter they sublet the contract for doing the painting and carpentry work on the building to the appellant, W. H. Dennis. The appellant, being desirous of again subletting the carpentry work, requested one Phil E. Dunnavant to bid thereon, at the same time furnishing him with a copy of the plans and specifications of the work. Later on Dunnavant submitted the following writing:

"Portland, Ore., Jan. 7, 1910. W. H. Dennis, Seattle, Wash.—Dear Sir: Confirming our conversation with you over long distance phone this afternoon we propose to furnish all labor for setting millwork and carpentry on the addition to the Fidelity Trust Co.'s building at Tacoma, Wash., for the sum of five thousand seven hundred and no/100 dollars ($5,700.00). The work above mentioned is to be included and above the seventh floor and is to be in accordance with plans and specifications prepared by D. H. Burnham, Chicago. It is understood that we are not to furnish labor for laying floors, putting up door jacks or setting any centers or grounds. It is also understood that we are to furnish no material of any description used in setting the millwork or in any of the carpentry work. Formal contract to follow. Phil E. Dunnavant & Co., per Phil E. Dunnavant. Accepted: ———————."

This writing with duplicate copies was forwarded to the appellant by Dunnavant, who, upon receipt thereof, wrote his name after the word "Accepted," and returned the same to Dunnavant.

Early in February, 1910, Dunnavant became financially embarrassed and sought the appellant, and suggested to him the idea of putting the contract in the name of a third party. The appellant took the matter under consideration, and Dunnavant returned to his home at Portland, Or., from which place he wrote the appellant as follows: "Portland, Oregon. Feb. 25, 1910. W. H. Dennis, White Building, Seattle, Wash.—Dear Sir: Would like to have you write me and let me know what response you got to the telegram you sent while I was there. I have had to turn all of my work over to the bonding companies as I was unable to pull through. It will help me a great deal if you will give me some information about the Spokane job and also the Tacoma job. I have been expecting a letter from you daily since my return but so far have received none. Thanking you in adavnce, I am, yours very truly, Phil E. Dunnavant."

To this the appellant answered by the following letter: "Feb. 28, 1910. Mr. Phil E. Dunnavant, Portland, Oregon—Dear Sir: In answer to yours of last week, will say that under the circumstances it will be impossible to do the work as we talked of in our talk when you were up here and will have to arrange with some other contractor to do the work at Spokane and Tacoma. Am sorry but cannot do anything else as it has turned out. Yours truly, W. H. Dennis & Son."

To this letter the appellant replied: "Portland, Oregon. March 2, 1910. Mr. W. H. Dennis, Seattle, Wash.—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 28th ult. received and carefully noted, under existing circumstances I do not feel like letting the contracts for the Tacoma and Spokane jobs go as there is good prospects in them for me, if I can make no other arrangements with you I will have to carry them on as was first intended. I will probably be in Seattle some time in the near future and will talk the matter over with you but in the meantime would like to know just how the work stands on the two jobs as I have my men ready to go on short notice. Trusting that I will hear from you as soon as possible I beg to remain, Yours very truly, Phil E. Dunnavant."

No formal contract was ever forwarded for execution by Dunnavant and none in fact was entered into, and thereafter the appellant prosecuted the work described in the writing through other parties. After the completion of the work, Dunnavant assigned his claim to the present respondent, who brought this action on the accepted writing to recover damages as for breach of contract. The cause was tried in the court below by the judge, sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the respondent for the full amount claimed, namely, $1,700. To reverse the judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

The principal question suggested by the record is whether the writing containing the bid of Dunnavant and the acceptance thereof by the appellant constituted the completed contract between the parties, or was it an agreement settling some of the terms of a contract to be entered into later. The face of the writing, it is at once apparent, indicates that it was intended as the latter, rather than the former. After specifying certain particulars, it expressly provides that a formal contract is to follow. If the writing itself was intended as the completed contract, there would have been no need for this proviso. A contract complete in itself does not need the sanction of another contract.

Again, the contract, when tested by the surrounding circumstances, seems incomplete. It refers to work of a particular character in a described building, yet it specifies no time when the work shall be begun, when it shall be completed, the character of the work that shall be performed, or when payment for the work shall be made. While the law in such cases implies certain conditions, namely, that the work shall be commenced and completed within a reasonable time after demand, shall be performed in an ordinarily skillful manner, and shall be paid for within a reasonable time after its completion, it is apparent that these conditions might not satisfy the appellant. He was a subcontractor of Thompson-Starrett Company, and bound to perform according to the stipulations of his written contract with them, which might vary materially from the stipulations implied by law. This being true, the appellant very naturally would want the contract under which the work was to be actually performed conditioned so as to accord with his contract with the original builder. The writing, in whatever aspect it is viewed, therefore, seems to us to point to the conclusion that it was not intended to be the final agreement between the parties.

The evidence also, we think, sustains this conclusion. The appellant testifies to the fact positively, and Dunnavant admits that such a thing was talked over between them, but that the purpose was to put the contract in more formal shape, rather than supply any further details. Both parties were men of ability and experience, and it would hardly seem that if they intended this writing to be a complete contract between them they would solemnly provide, both in writing and orally, for a further agreement.

By the conditions of the writing, it was Dunnavant's duty, after the acceptance by the appellant of the terms proposed, to prepare a formal contract embodying such terms and such further details as the character of the work required, and forward the same to the appellant for execution. Failing in this, he had no cause of action against the appellant, as the appellant could not otherwise be put in default, and of course no cause of action passed to his assignee by the assignment.

The judgment appealed from is reversed and the case remanded, with instructions to enter a judgment in favor of the appellant to the effect that the respondent take nothing by his action.[8]

[8] In Mississippi & D. S. S. Co. v. Swift, 86 Me. 248, 29 Atl. 1066, 41 Am. St. Rep. 545 (1894), Emery, J., said: "From these expressions of courts and jurists, it is quite clear that, after all, the question is mainly one of intention. If the party sought to be charged intended to close a contract prior to the formal signing of a written draft, or if he signified such an intention to the other party, he will be bound by the contract actually made, though the signing of the written draft be omitted. If, on the other hand, such party neither had nor signified such an intention to close the contract until it was fully expressed in a written instrument and attested by signature, then he will not be bound until the signatures are affixed. The expression of the idea may be attempted in other words: if the written draft is viewed by the parties merely as a convenient memorial, or record of their previous contract, its absence does not affect the binding force of the contract; if, however, it is

BILLINGS v. WILBY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1918. 175 N. C. 571, 96 S. E. 50.)

Action by A. U. Billings against William Wilby. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepts and appeals. No error.

HOKE, J.[9] There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that plaintiff, a contractor of extended experience and engaged at the time in "grading off the foundation" for the new federal building at Wilkesboro, N. C., on January 16, 1916, received a letter from William Wilby, defendant, then at Selma, Ala., and who had the subcontract for the plumbing and laying the sewer line, inviting a proposition from plaintiff for cutting the ditch and laying the line, etc., according to survey and specifications which had been already made by the government; that on January 13, 1916, plaintiff replied by telegram from North Wilkesboro, as follows:

"Will put in sewer line according to specifications for five hundred dollars you furnish pipe and material North Wilkesboro wire at once if you accept this. [Signed] A. U. Billings."

On same date defendant sent by wire a night letter as follows:

"Forty cents per running foot is best I can do I furnish pipe and you cement. I can do it myself for less than this but want it put in before my man comes. If I cannot get it for the above amount will wait and put it in myself. [Signed] William Wilby."

To this plaintiff replied by telegram at 10:40 a. m. January 14:

"Night letter received. Will accept. Send contract signed at once."

That plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to do the work, and had the hands and tools there for the purpose, and on the night before he was to begin, which was several days after plaintiff's last message, plaintiff received a telegram from defendant to the effect that he viewed as consummation of the negotiation, there is no contract until the written draft is finally signed." It was held that there was no contract.

In the following cases, also, it was held that the execution of the written document was contemplated by the parties as the final operative fact, prior to which there was no contract: Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797 (1895); Las Palmas Winery & Distillery v. Garrett & Co., 167 Cal. 397, 139 Pac. 1077 (1914); Ocala Cooperage Co. v. Florida Cooperage Co., 59 Fla. 390, 52 South. 13 (1910); Strong & Trowbridge Co. v. H. Baars & Co., 60 Fla. 253, 54 South. 92 (1911); Scott v. Fowler, 227 Ill. 104, 81 N. E. 34 (1907); Alexandria Billiard Co. v. Miloslowsky, 167 Iowa, 395, 149 N. W. 504 (1914); Tucker v. Pete, Sheeran Bros. & Co., 155 Ky. 670, 160 S. W. 176 (1913); Barrelli v. Wehrli, 121 La. 540, 46 South. 620 (1908); Donnelly v. Currie Hardware Co., 66 N. J. Law, 388, 49 Atl. 428 (1901); Williams v. Burdick, 63 Or. 41, 125 Pac. 844, 126 Pac. 603 (1912). In Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cas. 238, 268 (1857) it was said that "the circumstance that the parties do intend a subsequent agreement to be made is strong evidence to show that they did not intend the previous negotiations to amount to an agreement." In Rossdale v. Denny, [1921] 1 Ch. 57, a letter contained several proposed terms and then said: "Subject to a formal contract to embody such reasonable provisions as my solicitors may approve." The court reviewed the cases where the words "subject to" had been used, and it held there was no contract.

would advise plaintiff in a day or two about the work; that defendant never did advise plaintiff further about it, but soon thereafter undertook the work himself, etc.; that plaintiff's damage in the loss of the contract was about $250. On matters relevant to the issue, defendant introduced his own deposition to the effect "that he was a plumber resident in Selma, Ala., and had a subcontract for installing the plumbing and sewer for the building and in addition to the telegrams already in evidence, there was attached to his deposition two other telegrams in terms as follows; one purporting to be from plaintiff to defendant, dated January 18, 3 p. m.:

"I accept your sewer proposition wire at once if you accept mine start work at once in the morning. [Signed] A. U. Billings."

—and another from defendant to plaintiff:

"Will advise you within next few days regarding sewer proposition.

"[Signed] William Wilby."

In reference to the additional telegrams attached to the deposition and purporting to be from plaintiff, "I accept your sewer proposition wire at once if you accept mine start work in the morning," plaintiff recalled testified that he did not send nor authorize any one else to send such a telegram. On perusal of this evidence, we are clearly of opinion that a definite contract to let the work in question was constituted between these parties by the telegram of plaintiff, dated January 14th, in reply to defendant's night letter and in terms, "Night letter received will accept send contract signed at once," and this result is not affected by the closing words of the message, "Send contract signed," etc.—this by correct interpretation meaning merely that it was the desire and preference of the plaintiff that the agreement they had made should be written out and formally signed by the parties, and it is the recognized position here and elsewhere that, when the parties have entered into a valid and binding agreement, the contract will not be avoided because of their intent and purpose to have the same more formally drawn up and executed, and which purpose was not carried out. Gooding v. Moore, 150 N. C. 195, 63 S. E. 895; Teal v. Templeton, 149 N. C. 32, 62 S. E. 737; Sanders v. Pottlitzer Bros. Fruit Co., 144 N. Y. 209, 39 N. E. 75, 29 L. R. A. 431, 43 Am. St. Rep. 757; Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) p. 29, and authorities cited. In Moore's Case, supra, it was held:

"That when parties to an oral contract contemplate a subsequent reducing of it to writing, as a matter of convenience and prudence and not as a condition precedent, it is binding on them, though their intent to formally express the agreement in writing was never carried out."

And in 144 N. Y., supra:

"If the correspondence and telegrams between the parties contain all the details of a contract, it is enforceable, though they intended that their agreement should be formally expressed in a single paper which, when signed, should be the evidence of what already had been agreed upon."

This being the correct position, we must approve his honor's charge on the first issue:

"That, if the jury believe the evidence and find the facts to be as testified by the witness and disclosed by the documents produced in evidence, you will answer the first issue Yes."

The parties having entered into a definite contract by the message from the plaintiff, of date January 14th, the additional message introduced by the defendant, even if genuine, evinces no purpose to abandon any rights he had acquired or to reopen the question of what had been done between them, and, if it were otherwise, the charge of his honor, when considered in reference to the testimony and the conditions presented, could only mean, and was clearly intended to mean, that, if the parol evidence given by plaintiff to the effect that he had never sent this telegram or authorized any one else to do so should be accepted by the jury, and, the fact so found, such message should not be allowed to affect the determination of the issue.

On the record, we find no error in the charge or in the refusal of the motion to nonsuit, and the judgment below must be affirmed.

No error.[10]

10 In the following cases it was held that the written document was contemplated as a mere memorial, not as the only operative fact, and that a contract was made without it: Brogden v. Metrop. Ry. Co. (H. L.) 2 App. Cas. 666 (1877); Rossiter v. Miller, 3 App. Cas. 1124 (1878); Jenkins & Reynolds Co. v. Alpena Portland Cement Co., 147 Fed. 641, 77 C. C. A. 625 (1906); Wehner v. Bauer (C. SECTION 2.—COMMUNICATION OF OFFER

WILLIAMS v. CARWARDINE.

(In the King's Bench, 1833. 4 Barn. & Adol. 621.)

Assumpsit to recover £20, which the defendant promised to pay to any person who should give such information as might lead to a discovery of the murderer of Walter Carwardine. Plea, general issue. At the trial before Parke, J., at the last spring assizes for the county of Hereford, the following appeared to be the facts of the case: One Walter Carwardine, the brother of the defendant, was seen on the evening of March 24th, 1831, at a public-house at Hereford, and was not heard of again till his body was found on April 12th in the river Wye, about two miles from the city. An inquest was held on the body on April 13th and the following days till the 19th; and it appearing that the plaintiff was at a house with the deceased on the night he was supposed to have been murdered, she was examined before the magistrates, but did not then give any information which led to the apprehension of the real offender. On April 25th the defendant caused a hand-bill to be published, stating that whoever would give such information as should lead to a discovery of the murderer of Walter Carwardine should, on conviction, receive a reward of £20; and any person concerned therein, or privy thereto (except the party who actually committed the offense), should be entitled to such reward, and every exertion used to procure a pardon; and it then added, that information was to be given, and application for the above reward was to be made to Mr. William Carwardine, Holmer, near Hereford. Two persons were tried for the murder at the summer assizes 1831, but acquitted.

Soon after this, the plaintiff was severely beaten and bruised by one Williams, and on August 23d, 1831, believing she had not long to live, and to ease her conscience, she made a voluntary statement, containing information which led to the subsequent conviction of Williams. Upon this evidence it was contended, that as the plaintiff was not induced by the reward promised by the defendant to give evidence, the law would not imply a contract by the defendant to pay her the £20. The learned Judge was of opinion, that the plaintiff, having given the information which led to the conviction of the murderer, had performed the condition on which the £20 was to become payable, and was therefore entitled to recover it; and he directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, but desired them to find specially whether she was induced to give the information by the offer of the promised reward. The jury found that she was not induced by the offer of the reward, but by other motives.

Curwood now moved for a new trial. There was no promise to pay the plaintiff the sum of £20. That promise could only be enforced in favor of persons who should have been induced to make disclosures by the promise of reward. Here the jury have found that the plaintiff was induced by other motives to give the information. They have, therefore, negatived any contract on the part of the defendant with the plaintiff.

DENMAN, C. J. The plaintiff, by having given information which led to the conviction of the murderer of Walter Carwardine, has brought herself within the terms of the advertisement, and therefore is entitled to recover.

LITTLEDALE, J. The advertisement amounts to a general promise, to give a sum of money to any person who shall give information which might lead to the discovery of the offender. The plaintiff gave that information.

PARKE, J. There was a contract with any person who performed the condition mentioned in the advertisement.

PATTESON, J. I am of the same opinion. We cannot go into the plaintiff's motives.

Rule refused.

DAWKINS v. SAPPINGTON.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1866. 26 Ind. 199.)

FRAZER, J. *The appellant was the plaintiff below. The complaint was in two paragraphs: (1) That a horse of the defendant had been stolen, whereupon he published a hand-bill offering a reward of $50 for the recovery of the stolen property, and that thereupon the plaintiff rescued the horse from the thief and restored him to the defendant, who refused to pay the reward. (2) That the horse of the defendant was stolen, whereupon the plaintiff recovered and returned him to the defendant, who, in consideration thereof, promised to pay $50 to the plaintiff, which he has failed and refused to do.

To the second paragraph a demurrer was sustained. To the first an answer was filed, the second paragraph of which alleged that the plaintiff, when he rescued the horse and returned him to the defendant, had no knowledge of the offering of the reward. The third paragraph averred that the hand-bill offering the reward was not published until after the rescue of the horse and his delivery to the defendant. The plaintiff unsuccessfully demurred to each of these paragraphs, and refusing to reply the defendant had judgment. * * *

3. The second paragraph of the answer shows a performance of the service without the knowledge that the reward had been offered. The offer therefore did not induce the plaintiff to act. The liability to pay a reward offered seems to rest, in some cases, upon an anomalous doctrine, constituting an exception to the general rule. In Williams v. Carwardine, 4 Barn. & Adolph. 621, there was a special finding, with a general verdict for the plaintiff, that the information for which the reward was offered was not induced to be given by the offer, yet it was held by all the judges of the King's Bench then present, Denman, C. J., and Littledale, Parke and Patteson, JJ., that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. It was put upon the ground that the offer was a general promise to any person who would give the information sought; that the plaintiff, having given the information, was within the terms of the offer, and that the court could not go into the plaintiff's motives. This decision has not, we believe, been seriously questioned, and its reasoning is conclusive against the sufficiency of the defense under examination. There are some considerations of morality and public policy which strongly tend to support the judgment in the case cited. If the offer was made in good faith, why should the defendant inquire whether the plaintiff knew that it had been made? Would the benefit to him be diminished by the discovery that the plaintiff, instead of acting from mercenary motives, had been impelled solely by a desire to prevent the larceny from being profitable to the person who had committed it? Is it not well that any one who has an opportunity to prevent the success of a crime, may know that by doing so he not only performs a virtuous service, but also entitles himself to whatever reward has been offered therefor to the public?

The judgment is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer.[11] uitable one instituted by the persons who offered the reward, and who alleged that they were threatened with litigation by different parties claiming it, that some one or more of the defendants are entitled to the money, which the plaintiffs brought into court, and asked that defendants be required to set up their respective claims.

On May 16, 1917, it became known in the city of Parsons that Agnes Smith, the wife of Dr. Asa Smith, had been assaulted, and that a negro physician by the name of Robert E. Smith was suspected of the crime. (The victim of the assault died, and Robert E. Smith was charged with and convicted of murder in the first degree. The judgment was affirmed. State v. Smith, 103 Kan. 148, 174 Pac. 551.)

The plaintiffs are Dr. Asa Smith, husband of the murdered woman, and certain individuals who are members of the A. H. T. A. They caused to be published and circulated an offer of $750 reward "for the arrest or information that will lead to" the arrest of the accused.

As to the claims of the defendant Wm. S. Hyatt, the findings of fact are, in substance, these: Hyatt is an attorney at law with an office in the city of Parsons. Another attorney notified him that R. E. Smith desired to see him, and told him where Smith could be found. During the afternoon of May 17, 1917, Hyatt went to the hiding place of the accused in the city of Parsons in compliance with the directions that had been given him, and there found Smith. The two talked together for an hour or more, but were unable to reach an agreement as to the employment of Hyatt to defend Smith. There is a finding that the relation of attorney and client never existed between them at any time, and that Hyatt came away without being employed. Shortly before he went to see Smith, Hyatt learned that the reward had been offered, and after returning from his interview, he went to the office of the county attorney and told him where Smith could be found, and an arrangement was made to have the deputy sheriff go to the place for the purpose of arresting Smith. The deputy sheriff was called, and with Hyatt drove to the place where Smith had been left by Hyatt earlier in the afternoon, when they discovered that Smith was not there, but had been taken away by the other defendants. The court further found that Hyatt gave the first information to the proper officers [13] which would lead to the arrest of Smith after the offer of the reward had been made, and that the information was given more than an hour previous to the time Smith was removed by the other defendants from the house where he had been hiding, and that Hyatt's purpose in giving the information to the county attorney and the deputy sheriff was to obtain the reward offered by the plaintiffs; that the fact that Smith was not arrested from the information given by Hyatt was due to no fault or neglect of Hyatt. As a conclusion of law the court held that Hyatt was entitled to the reward.

The findings with reference to the other claimants are that Clarence Glass and Charles C. Edwards went to Thomas A. Murry, the chief of police of the city of Parsons, shortly after 6 o'clock on the afternoon of May 17, 1917, and requested Murry to go in a closed cab to a certain place in the city and take charge of Smith and deliver him to the jail at Oswego. Murry complied with the request, and went to the place directed, where he found the accused, together with the defendants Glass, Edwards, Tyson, Cook, and Ransom. All of them got into the cab with the chief of police, and the party went to Oswego, where Smith was delivered to the sheriff of Labette county. Before leaving Parsons, and just as the party got into the cab with the chief of police, the latter told the accused to consider himself under arrest, and informed him of the intention to deliver him at the county jail at Oswego. The evidence shows that the defendants who secured the services of the chief of police in taking the accused to Oswego were all members of the Lodge of Colored Masons, to which the accused belonged. The court finds that Smith expressed to them his fears of mob violence, and it was agreed that he would give himself into their custody, and they agreed to protect him; that none of these defendants had heard of the offer of reward at the time they called Murry, the chief of police, to their assistance. Murry testified that he had heard of the reward before he arrested Smith, and that the reason he placed him under arrest and took him to Oswego was partly to earn the reward and partly to protect Smith from mob violence. The court finds that it was the duty of Murry, as chief of police, to make arrest of fugitives from justice, that at the time of receiving Smith into custody Murry was not armed with a warrant or other process for the arrest, and that Smith had not committed any offense within the view of the chief of police.

The court found in favor of Hyatt and against the other defendants. The costs were directed to be paid out of the fund, and the balance of the $750 was ordered paid to Hyatt. The other defendants bring the case here for review. * * *

It is urged that it would be unconscionable to permit an attorney, under such circumstances, to avail himself of an offer of reward; that to do so would sanction conduct highly unprofessional in an attorney, and would permit him to obtain from one who occupies the position of a prospective client information which he uses to the other's prejudice and to gain a pecuniary benefit to himself. Without passing upon the question of the propriety of the conduct of an attorney in attempting to obtain a pecuniary advantage to the prejudice of an accused person under such circumstances, we think that Hyatt is not entitled to recover, because, from his own statement and the undisputed facts in evidence, his efforts to secure the apprehension of the accused were unavailing. The information which he gave to the officers did not result, even remotely, in bringing about the apprehension of the accused. The court finds that the information Hyatt gave would lead to the arrest of the guilty person if it had been acted upon promptly, and the fact that it did not bring about this result was through no fault of Hyatt's. But this finding does not help Hyatt's case. It may have been that the officers to whom he confided his information were too slow. Whatever the reason, before any action was taken by them which resulted in apprehending the accused, the latter was on his way to the county jail in the custody of another officer, having, with the aid of his friends, surrendered himself. So far as the apprehension of the guilty person was concerned, Hyatt might as well have kept his information to himself.

The defendants who admit that they had not heard of the offer of the reward until after the accused had been surrendered to the sheriff at Oswego are not entitled to recover. A private offer of reward for the apprehension of a fugitive from justice or of a person suspected or charged with an offense stands, as a general rule, upon a different footing from a statutory offer, or one made by virtue of a statute. 34 Cyc. 1752, 1753, and cases cited in notes. The offer of a private individual is a mere proposal, which, when accepted, becomes a contract. Until it is accepted by some person who upon the strength of the offer takes some steps to earn the reward, there is no contract. Van Vlissingen v. Manning, 105 Ill. App. 255. There must be a meeting of the minds of the parties—on the one side, of the person who makes the offer; on the other, of the person who performs the service. Where a claimant for the reward was not aware that it had been offered until after he had performed his services, there has been no meeting of minds which would constitute a contract. Besides, the undisputed facts with respect to those defendants who called the chief of police to assist them in taking the accused to Oswego are that these claimants were simply assisting the accused in surrendering himself. Their testimony is that what they did was for the purpose of protecting him from mob violence. They had never heard of the reward, and, of course, are not entitled to any part of it.[14]

As to whether identical offers crossing in the mail make a contract, see Tinn v. Hoffmann & Co., post, p. 155.

Thomas A. Murry cannot recover, because, as chief of police of the city of Parsons, it was his duty to make an arrest of fugitives from justice or persons charged with or suspected of crimes. The fact that he was not armed with a warrant or other process for the arrest of the accused is immaterial, because there was reasonable ground for believing that Smith had committed the particular offense charged against him, and his subsequent conviction established his actual guilt. * * *

It has been repeatedly held that public policy does not permit an officer to claim a reward for merely doing his duty.[15] * * *

Inasmuch as none of the defendants are entitled to recover any part of the reward, we think it would be a harsh rule to say that the plaintiffs are estopped from claiming it because of the admissions in their petition. In our view of the matter, justice requires that the trial court be directed to render judgment against all of the defendants, and that the plaintiffs, after paying the costs of the proceeding, be entitled to the return of the money.[16]

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to carry this order into effect. All the Justices concurring.[17]

15 The court cited authorities on this point. For cases herein, see post, p. 381.

16 The discussion of the reasons for giving the plaintiff a judgment that he did not ask in his bill of interpleader is mostly omitted.

17 In a number of cases, similar in many respects to the principal case, although not in all, the reward was apportioned by the court among several claimants, who had not acted jointly, but whose united efforts caused the result desired by the offerer. Some of these were interpleader suits brought by the offerer. Bloomfield v. Maloney, 176 Mich. 548, 142 N. W. 785, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 662 (1913); Fargo v. Arthur, 43 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 193 (1872); Rochelle v. Pacific Exp. Co., 56 Tex. Civ. App. 142, 120 S. W. 543 (1909). Others were suits brought by one or more claimants. Whitcher v. State, 68 N. H. 605, 34 Atl. 745 (1894); Goldsborough v. Cradie, 28 Md. 477 (1867); Chambers v. Ogle, 117 Ark. 242, 174 S. W. 532 (1915); Lancaster v. Walsh, 4 M. & W. 14 (1835).

Where a reward is offered for lost property, it has been held that one who returns a part is entitled pro tanto. Deslondes v. Wilson, 5 La. 397, 25 Am. Dec. 187 (1833); Symmes v. Frazier, 6 Mass. 344, 4 Am. Dec. 142 (1810); Hawk v. Marion County, 48 Iowa, 472 (1878).

Apportionment was refused where a reward was offered for two persons and only one was captured. Blain v. Pacific Express Co., 69 Tex. 74, 6 S. W. 679 (1887).

A reasonable construction must be given to the published offer. A reward for "arrest and conviction" can be earned without personally arresting the criminal. Doing acts that are the substantial cause of the arrest and conviction is enough. Elkins v. Board of Com'rs of Wyandotte County, 91 Kan. 518, 138 Pac. 578, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 638, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 257 (1914); Id., 86 Kan. 305, 120 Pac. 542, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 662 (1912); Stone v. Dysert, 20 Kan. 123 (1878); Hall v. State, 102 Wash. 519, 173 Pac. 429 (1918); Choice v. CHOICE et al. v. CITY OF DALLAS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, 1919. 210 S. W. 753.)

Action by Mrs. M. P. Choice against the City of Dallas and A. E. Firmin and wife, with cross-bill by defendant Firmin and wife. General and special exceptions urged by defendant city to plaintiff's petition and to the cross-bill sustained, and plaintiff and Firmin and wife appeal. Reversed and remanded.

BOYCE, J.[18] This suit was brought by appellant Mrs. M. B. Choice against the city of Dallas to recover a reward offered by the city "for the arrest and conviction of any one guilty of arson within the corporate limits of the city of Dallas." A. E. Firmin and wife, Mrs. Nellie Firmin, were made defendants on allegations that they were claiming the reward. These parties appeared, and by cross-bill sought to recover the reward. The court sustained general and special exceptions urged by the city to the plaintiff's petition and the cross-bill of Mrs. Firmin, and this appeal complains of this action.

Plaintiff alleged in her petition that on January 27, 1917, her residence in the city of Dallas was destroyed by fire set by one Mary Wright, who was by such act guilty of arson; that the plaintiff secured and furnished information and testimony that led to the arrest and conviction of the said Mary Wright of said crime; that at such time there was in force in the city of Dallas an ordinance duly and legally passed at a time long prior to the occurrence of the fire, as follows:

"Arson Reward."

"Whereas, under provisions of law, the state fire insurance commission has provided that, where any city or town maintains a standing reward of a sum equal to $1.00 for each one hundred of population for the arrest and conviction of any one guilty of arson, in that event the insurance key rate of such city or town is entitled to credit of 2%; and

"Whereas, the crime of arson results in loss of property, causes an increase in insurance premiums, and frequently results in the loss of life, and is one of the most serious crimes against society; and

"Whereas, the city of Dallas has now a population of 130,000; and

"Whereas, the people of Dallas, through their city government, are preparing to apply to the state insurance commission for a substantial reduction in our insurance key rate:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the board of commissioners that the city of Dallas hereby offers a standing reward in the sum of $1,300.00 for the arrest and conviction of any one guilty of arson within the corporate limits of the city of Dallas, said reward, however, not to apply to the fire marshal, nor any other officer, city, county or state, who makes such arrest in the discharge of his official duties.

"Be it further resolved that the city fire marshal be, and that he is hereby directed to have prepared and to post placards in all public buildings in the city, showing that such reward has been offered as above described."

It is further alleged that notices of such reward were posted in accordance with the terms of such ordinance, and that by the passage thereof the city did secure the reduction in the key rate of insurance for said city, as referred to in the ordinance; that the plaintiff, with knowledge of, and acting under, said ordinance, secured and furnished such information as caused the arrest and conviction of said Mary Wright. Mrs. Firmin, joined by her husband, alleged in her cross-petition that she, and not the plaintiff, discovered the facts and furnished the information which caused the arrest and conviction of the said Mary Wright, and that she was entitled to the reward. This cross-petition contained no allegations that the cross-petitioner had any knowledge of the offer of reward or acted thereunder.

The demurrers to these pleadings of the plaintiff and cross-petitioner were sustained on three grounds: (1) That the ordinance offering said reward was void as not being within the powers conferred upon the city by its charter;[19] (2) that it did not appear that either of said claimants actually arrested the said Mary Wright; (3) that it did not appear from the cross-petition of Mrs. Firmin that she had knowledge of the offer of reward and was induced to act by reason thereof. We will consider these in the order stated. * * *

The offer of a reward for "arrest and conviction" cannot be taken literally, as the conviction at least requires the action of the courts of the state. So it has been generally held that the terms of such an offer are complied with when one acting thereunder secures and furnishes information necessary to and which results in arrest and conviction by the properly constituted authorities, and we think this is the rule that should be applied in this case. Tobin v. McComb, 156 S. W. 237; Haskell v. Davidson, 91 Me. 488, 40 Atl. 330, 42 L. R. A. 155, 64 Am. St. Rep. 254; Kinn v. First Nat. Bank, 118 Wis. 537, 95 N. W. 969, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1012; Elkins v. Board of Wyandotte County, 86 Kan. 305, 120 Pac. 542, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 662; 34 Cyc. 1747.[20]

It is settled in this state that the recovery of rewards offered by individuals is governed by the principles of the law of contract, and that before recovery can be had it must appear that the party claiming the reward knew of and acted upon the offer when the services for the rendition of which the reward is claimed were rendered. Broadnax v. Ledbetter, 100 Tex. 375, 99 S. W. 1111, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1057. The court in that case, however, suggests this distinction, which appellant Mrs. Firmin seeks to apply in this case:

"While we have seen no such distinction suggested, it may well be supposed that a person might become legally entitled to a reward for arresting a criminal, although he knew nothing of its having been offered, where it was offered in accordance with law by the government. A legal right might in such a case be given by law without the aid of contract."

[19] The city was held to have power. This part of the opinion is omitted.

[20] Cf. Shuey v. United States, post, p. 178;

A suggestion of such a distinction was also made in the cases of Clinton County v. Davis, 162 Ind. 60, 69 N. E. 680, 64 L. R. A. 780, 1 Ann. Cas. 282, and Drummond v. United States (U. S.) 35 Ct. Cl. 372. The only case we have found in which the distinction was actually applied is that of Smith v. State, 38 Nev. 477, 151 Pac. 512, L. R. A. 1916A, 1276. In that case the Governor of the state of Nevada, acting under the provisions of an act of the Legislature, offered a reward for the arrest and conviction of the murderers of certain ranchmen, and the plaintiffs, who claimed the reward, were not aware of the fact that it had been offered when they did the acts on account of which the reward was claimed. The case of Broadnax v. Ledbetter, supra, was referred to in the opinion, and the above paragraph from the decision was quoted with approval, and it was concluded by the court that in cases of this kind it was not contemplated by the Legislature that any contractual relation was necessary; "that the right to the reward follows by operation of law if a compliance with the provisions of the statute has been shown."

It seems that a general reward offered by the government is regarded by these authorities somewhat in the nature of a bounty. While an ordinance is not a law, in one sense of the word it is a local law, emanating from legislative authority and operative within its limited sphere as effectively as a general law of the sovereignty. Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5024; Second Series, vol. 3, p. 77. Following these authorities, we hold that it was not necessary for the cross-petitioner to allege knowledge of the existence of the reward at the time she took action to secure the arrest and conviction of Mary Wright. * * *

We are of the opinion that the court erred in sustaining the exceptions to the petition and cross-petition, and the case will be reversed and remanded.[21]

[21] The first person giving the required information is entitled to the whole reward. United States v. Simons (D. C.) 7 Fed. 709 (1881); Lancaster v. Walsh (Exch.) 4 M. & W. 16 (1838).

In Lockhart v. Barnard (Exch.) 14 M. & W. 674 (1845) Parke, B., said: "According to the true construction of the advertisement, the information must be given, with a view to its being acted on, either to the person offering the reward, or his agent, or some person having authority by law to apprehend the criminal." A mere statement to a disinterested third person in general conversation was no acceptance.

SECTION 3.—ACCEPTANCE BY POST

(In the King's Bench, 1818. 1 Barn. & Ald. 681.)

Action for non-delivery of wool according to agreement. At the trial at the last Lent assizes for the county of Worcester, before Burrough, J., it appeared that the defendants, who were dealers in wool, at St. Ives, in the county of Huntingdon, had, on Tuesday, September 2, 1817, written the following letter to the plaintiffs, who were woolen manufacturers residing in Bromsgrove, Worcestershire: "We now offer you eight hundred tods of wether fleeces, of a good fair quality of our country wool, at 35s. 6d. per tod, to be delivered at Leicester, and to be paid for by two months' bill in two months, and to be weighed up by your agent within fourteen days, receiving your answer in course of post."

This letter was misdirected by the defendants, to Bromsgrove, Leicestershire, in consequence of which it was not received by the plaintiffs in Worcestershire till 7 p. m. on Friday, September 5th. On that evening the plaintiffs wrote an answer, agreeing to accept the wool on the terms proposed. The course of the post between St. Ives and Bromsgrove is through London, and consequently this answer was not received by the defendants till Tuesday, September 9th. On Monday, September 8th, the defendants not having, as they expected, received an answer on Sunday, September 7th (which in case their letter had not been misdirected would have been in the usual course of the post), sold the wool in question to another person. Under these circumstances the learned judge held, that the delay having been occasioned by the neglect of the defendants, the jury must take it, that the answer did come back in due course of post; and that then the defendants were liable for the loss that had been sustained, and the plaintiffs accordingly recovered a verdict.

Jervis having in Easter Term obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that there was no binding contract between the parties.

Dauncey, Puller & Richardson showed cause. They contended that at the moment of the acceptance of the offer of the defendants by the plaintiffs the former became bound. And that was on the Friday evening, when there had been no change of circumstances. They were then stopped by the Court, who called upon Jervis & Campbell in support of the rule. They relied on Payne v. Cave [3 T. R. 148], and more particularly on Cooke v. Oxley [Id. 653]. In that case Oxley, who had proposed to sell goods to Cooke, and given him a certain time at his request, to determine whether he would buy them or not, was held not liable to the performance of the contract, even though Cooke, within the specified time, had determined to buy them, and given Oxley notice to that effect. So here the defendants who have proposed by letter to sell this wool, are not to be held liable, even though it be now admitted that the answer did come back in due course of post. Till the plaintiffs' answer was actually received there could be no binding contract between the parties; and before then the defendants had retracted their offer by selling the wool to other persons.

But THE COURT said that if that were so, no contract could ever be completed by the post. For if the defendants were not bound by their offer when accepted by the plaintiffs till the answer was received, then the plaintiffs ought not to be bound till after they had received the notification that the defendants had received their answer and assented to it. And so it might go on ad infinitum. The defendants must be considered in law as making, during every instant of the time their letter was traveling, the same identical offer to the plaintiffs, and then the contract is completed by the acceptance of it by the latter. Then as to the delay in notifying the acceptance, that arises entirely from the mistake of the defendants, and it therefore must be taken as against them that the plaintiffs' answer was received in course of post.

Rule discharged.

TAYLOE v. MERCHANTS' FIRE INS. CO. OF BALTIMORE.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1850. 9 How. 390, 13 L. Ed. 187.)

Mr. Justice NELSON.[22] This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, which was rendered for the defendants.

The case in the Court below was this: William H. Tayloe, of Richmond County, Va., applied to John Minor, the agent of the defendants, residing at Fredericksburg in that State, for an insurance upon his dwelling-house to the amount of $8000 for one year, and, as he was about leaving home for the State of Alabama, desired the agent to make the application in his behalf.

The application was made accordingly, under the date of November 25th, 1844, and an answer received from the secretary of the company, stating that the risk would be taken at 70 cents on the $100 the premium amounting to the sum of $56. The agent stated in the application to the company the reason why it had not been signed by Tayloe; that he had gone to the State of Alabama on business, and would not return till February following, and that he was desired to communicate to him at that place the answer of the company.

On receiving the answer, the agent mailed a letter directed to [22] The statement of facts and part of the opinion have been omitted.

Tayloe, under date of December 2d, advising him of the terms of the insurance, and adding, "Should you desire to effect the insurance, send me your check payable to my order for $57, and the business is concluded." The additional dollar was added for the policy.

This letter, in consequence of a misdirection, did not reach Tayloe till the 20th of the month; who, on the next day, mailed a letter in answer to the agent, expressing his assent to the terms, and inclosing his check for the premium as requested. He also desired that the policy should be deposited in the bank for safe-keeping. This letter of acceptance was received on the 31st at Fredericksburg by the agent, who mailed a letter in answer the next day, communicating to Tayloe his refusal to carry into effect the insurance, on the ground that his acceptance came too late, the center building of the dwelling-house in the mean time, on the 22d of the month, having been consumed by fire.

The company, on being advised of the facts, confirmed the view taken of the case by their agent, and refused to issue the policy or pay the loss.

A bill was filed in the Court below by the insured against the company, setting forth, substantially, the above facts, and praying that the defendants might be decreed to pay the loss, or for such other relief as the complainant might be entitled to.

I. Several objections have been taken to the right of the complainant to recover, which it will be necessary to notice; but the principal one is that the contract of insurance was not complete at the time the loss happened, and therefore that the risk proposed to be assumed had never attached.

Two positions have been taken by the counsel for the company for the purpose of establishing this ground of defence.

1. The want of notice to the agent of the company of the acceptance of the terms of the insurance; and,

2. The nonpayment of the premium.

The first position assumes that, where the company have made an offer through the mail to insure upon certain terms, the agreement is not consummated by the mere acceptance of the offer by the party to whom it is addressed; that the contract is still open and incomplete until the notice of acceptance is received; and that the company are at liberty to withdraw the offer at any time before the arrival of the notice, and this even without communicating notice of the withdrawal to the applicant; in other words, that the assent of the company, express or implied, after the acceptance of the terms proposed by the insured, is essential to a consummation of the contract.

The effect of this construction is to leave the property of the insured uncovered until his acceptance of the offer has reached the company and has received their assent, for if the contract is incomplete until notice of the acceptance, till then the company may retract the offer, as neither party is bound until the negotiation has resulted in a complete bargain between the parties.

In our apprehension, this view of the transaction is not in accordance with the usages and practice of these companies in taking risks; nor with the understanding of merchants and other business men dealing with them; nor with the principles of law, settled in analogous cases, governing contracts entered into by correspondence between parties residing at a distance.

On the contrary, we are of opinion, that an offer under the circumstances stated, prescribing the terms of insurance, is intended, and is to be deemed, a valid undertaking on the part of the company, that they will be bound, according to the terms tendered, if an answer is transmitted in due course of mail, accepting them; and that it cannot be withdrawn, unless the withdrawal reaches the party to whom it is addressed before his letter of reply announcing the acceptance has been transmitted.

This view of the effect of the correspondence seems to us to be but carrying out the intent of the parties, as plainly manifested by their acts and declarations.

On the acceptance of the terms proposed, transmitted by due course of mail to the company, the minds of both parties have met on the subject, in the mode contemplated at the time of entering upon the negotiation, and the contract becomes complete. The party to whom the proposal is addressed has a right to regard it as intended as a continuing offer until it shall have reached him, and shall be in due time accepted or rejected.

Such is the plain import of the offer. And besides, upon any other view the proposal amounts to nothing, as the acceptance would be but the adoption of the terms tendered, to be, in turn, proposed by the applicant to the company for their approval or rejection. For, if the contract is still open until the company is advised of an acceptance, it follows, of course, that the acceptance may be repudiated at any time before the notice is received. Nothing is effectually accomplished by an act of acceptance.

It is apparent, therefore, that such an interpretation of the acts of the parties would defeat the object which both had in view in entering upon the correspondence.

The fallacy of the argument, in our judgment, consists in the assumption, that the contract cannot be consummated without a knowledge on the part of the company that the offer has been accepted. This is the point of the objection. But a little reflection will show that, in all cases of contracts entered into between parties at a distance by correspondence, it is impossible that both should have a knowledge of it the moment it becomes complete. This can only exist where both parties are present.

The position may be illustrated by the case before us. If the contract became complete, as we think it did, on the acceptance of the offer by the applicant, on December 21st, 1844, the company, of course, could have no knowledge of it until the letter of acceptance reached the agent, on the 31st of the month; and, on the other hand, upon the hypothesis it was not complete until notice of the acceptance, and then became so, the applicant could have no knowledge of it at the time it took effect. In either aspect, and, indeed, in any aspect in which the case can be presented, one of the parties must be unadvised of the time when the contract takes effect, as its consummation must depend upon the act of one of them in the absence of the other.

The negotiation being carried on through the mail, the offer and acceptance cannot occur at the same moment of time; nor, for the same reason, can the meeting of the minds of the parties on the subject be known by each at the moment of concurrence; the acceptance must succeed the offer after the lapse of some interval of time; and, if the process is to be carried farther in order to complete the bargain, and notice of the acceptance must be received, the only effect is to reverse the position of the parties, changing the knowledge of the completion from the one party to the other.

It is obviously impossible, therefore, under the circumstances stated, ever to perfect a contract by correspondence, if a knowledge of both parties at the moment they become bound is an essential element in making out the obligation. And as it must take effect, if effect is given at all to an endeavor to enter into a contract by correspondence, in the absence of the knowledge of one of the parties at the time of its consummation, it seems to us more consistent with the acts and declarations of the parties, to consider it complete on the transmission of the acceptance of the offer in the way they themselves contemplated; instead of postponing its completion till notice of such acceptance has been received and assented to by the company. * * *

HOUSEHOLD FIRE & CARRIAGE ACC. INS. CO., Limited, v. GRANT.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1879. 4 Exch. Div. 216.)

Action to recover £94. 15s., being the balance due upon 100 shares allotted to the defendant on the 25th of October, 1874, in pursuance of an application from the defendant for such shares, dated the 30th of September 1874.

At the trial before Lopes J., during the Middlesex sittings, 1878, the following facts were proved: In 1874 one Kendrick was acting in Glamorganshire as the agent of the company for the placing of their shares, and on the 30th of September the defendant handed to Kendrick an application in writing for shares in the plaintiff's company, which stated that the defendant had paid to the bankers of the company £5, being a deposit of 1s. per share, and requesting an allotment of 100 shares, and agreeing to pay the further sum of 79s. per share within twelve months of the date of the allotment. Kendrick duly forwarded this application to the plaintiffs in London, and the secretary of the company, on the 20th of October, 1874, made out the letter of allotment in favour of the defendant, which was posted addressed to the defendant at his residence, 16 Herbert street, Swansea, Glamorganshire. His name was then entered on the register of shareholders. This letter of allotment never reached the defendant. The defendant never paid the £5 mentioned in his application but, the plaintiffs' company being indebted to the defendant in the sum of £5 for commission, that sum was duly credited to his account in their books. In July, 1875, a dividend at the rate of 2½ per cent. was declared on the shares, and in February, 1876, a further dividend at the same rate. These dividends, amounting altogether to the sum of 5s. were also credited to the defendant's account in the books of the plaintiffs' company. Afterwards the company went into liquidation, and on the 7th of December, 1877, the official liquidator applied for the sum sued for from the defendant; the defendant declined to pay, on the ground that he was not a shareholder.

On these facts the learned judge left two questions to the jury: (1) Was the letter of allotment of the 20th of October in fact posted? (2) Was the letter of allotment received by the defendant? The jury found the first question in the affirmative and the last in the negative. The learned judge reserved the case for further consideration, and after argument directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs on the authority of Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381.

The defendant appealed.

THESIGER, L. J.[23] In this case the defendant made an application for shares in the plaintiffs' company, under circumstances from which we must imply that he authorized the company, in the event of their allotting to him the shares applied for, to send the notice of allotment by post. The company did allot him the shares, and duly addressed to him and posted a letter containing the notice of allotment, but upon the finding of the jury it must be taken that the letter never reached its destination. In this state of circumstances, Lopes, J., has decided that the defendant is liable as a shareholder. He based his decision mainly upon the ground that the point for consideration was covered by authority binding upon him, and I am of opinion that he did so rightly, and that it is covered by authority equally binding upon this court.

The leading case upon the subject is Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381.[24] It is true that Lord Cottenham might have decided that case [23] Opinion of Baggallay, L. J., omitted.

[24] In Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381 (1848), Dunlop wrote from Glasgow offering to sell 2,000 tons of pig iron. Higgins mailed an acceptance at Liverpool on January 30, saying: "We have accepted your offer unconditionwithout deciding the point raised in this. But it appears to me equally true that he did not do so, and that he preferred to rest and did rest his judgment as to one of the matters of exception before him upon a principle which embraces and governs the present case. If so, the court is as much bound to apply that principle constituting as it did a ratio decidendi, as it is to follow the exact decision itself. The exception was that the Lord Justice General directed the jury in point of law that, if the pursuers posted their acceptance of the offer in due time, according to the usage of trade they were not responsible for any casualties in the post-office establishment. This direction was wide enough in its terms to include the case of the acceptance never being delivered at all; and Lord Cottenham, in expressing his opinion that it was not open to objection, did so after putting the case of a letter containing a notice of dishonour posted by the holder of a bill of exchange in proper time, in which case he said (1 H. L. Cas., at page 399): "Whether that letter be delivered or not is a matter quite immaterial, because for accidents happening at the post-office he is not responsible." In short, Lord Cottenham appears to me to have held that, as a rule, a contract formed by correspondence through the post is complete as soon as the letter accepting an offer is put into the post, and is not put an end to in the event of the letter never being delivered. My view of the effect of Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381, is that taken by James, L. J., in Harris' Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587. There, at page 592, he speaks of the former case as "a case which is binding upon us, and in which every principle argued before us was discussed at length by the Lord Chancellor in giving judgment." He adds, the Lord Chancellor "arrived at the conclusion that the posting of the letter of acceptance is the completion of the contract; that is to say, the moment one man has made an offer, and the other has done something binding himself to that offer, then the contract is complete, and neither party can afterwards escape from it." Mellish, J., also took the same view. He says, at page 595: "In Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381, the question was directly raised whether the law was truly expounded in the case of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681. The house of lords approved of the ruling of that case. The Lord Chancellor Cottenham said, in the course of his judgment, that in the case of a bill of exchange notice of dishonour, given by putting a letter inte the post at the right time, had been held quite sufficient whether that letter was delivered or not; and he referred to Stocken v. Collin, 7 Mees. & W. 515, on that point, he being clearly of opinion that the rule as to accepting a contract was exactly the same as the rule as to sending notice of dishonour of a bill of exchange. He then referred to the case ally; but we hope you will accede to our request as to delivery and mode of payment by two months' bill." This letter was misdated "January 31," and because of delay in the mails it was not received in Glasgow until February 1. An acceptance on January 31 would in fact have been too late. It was held that a contract was made.

of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681, and quoted the observation of Lord Ellenborough, C. J. That case therefore appears to me to be a direct decision that the contract is made from the time when it is accepted by post." Leaving Harris' Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587, for the moment, I turn to Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225, in which Cresswell, J., told the jury that if the letter accepting the contract was put into the post-office and lost by the negligence of the post-office authorities, the contract would nevertheless be complete; and both he and Wilde, C. J., and Maule, J., seem to have understood this ruling to have been in accordance with Lord Cottenham's opinion in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381. That opinion therefore appears to me to constitute an authority directly binding upon us. But if Dunlop v. Higgins were out of the way, Harris' Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587, would still go far to govern the present. There it was held that the acceptance of the offer at all events binds both parties from the time of the acceptance being posted, and so as to prevent any retraction of the offer being of effect after the acceptance has been posted. Now, whatever in abstract discussion may be said as to the legal notion of its being necessary, in order to the effecting of a valid and binding contract, that the minds of the parties should be brought together at one and the same moment, that notion is practically the foundation of English law upon the subject of the formation of contracts. Unless therefore a contract constituted by correspondence is absolutely concluded at the moment that the continuing offer is accepted by the person to whom the offer is addressed, it is difficult to see how the two minds are ever to be brought together at one and the same moment. This was pointed out by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 B. & Ald. 681, which is recognized authority upon this branch of the law. But, on the other hand, it is a principle of law, as well established as the legal notion to which I have referred, that the minds of the two parties must be brought together by mutual communication. An acceptance, which only remains in the breast of the acceptor without being actually and by legal implication communicated to the offerer, is no binding acceptance. How, then, are these elements of law to be harmonized in the case of contracts formed by correspondence through the post? I see no better mode than that of treating the post-office as the agent of both parties, and it was so considered by Lord Romilly in Hebb's Case, L. R. 4 Eq. at page 12, when in the course of his judgment he said: "Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, decides that the posting of a letter accepting an offer constitutes a binding contract, but the reason of that is, that the post-office is the common agent of both parties." Alderson, B., also in Stocken v. Collin, 7 M. & W. at page 516, a case of notice of dishonor, and the case referred to by Lord Cottenham, says: "If the doctrine that the post-office is only the agent for the delivery of the notice were correct, no one could safely avail himself of that mode of transmission." But if the post-office be such common agent, then it seems to me to follow that, as soon as the letter of acceptance is delivered to the post-office, the contract is made as complete and final and absolutely binding as if the acceptor had put his letter into the hands of a messenger sent by the offerer himself as his agent to deliver the offer and receive the acceptance. What other principle can be adopted short of holding that the contract is not complete by acceptance until and except from the time that the letter containing the acceptance is delivered to the offerer, a principle which has been distinctly negatived? This difficulty was attempted to be got over in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108, which was a case directly on all fours with the present and in which Kelly, C. B. (Id., at page 115), is reported to have said: "It may be that in general, though not in all cases, a contract takes effect from the time of acceptance, and not from the subsequent notification of it. As in the case now before the court, if the letter of allotment had been delivered to the defendant in the due course of the post, he would have become a shareholder from the date of the letter. And to this effect is Potter v. Sanders, 6 Hare, 1. And hence perhaps the mistake has arisen that the contract is binding upon both parties from the time when the letter is written and put into the post, although never delivered; whereas, although it may be binding from the time of acceptance, it is only binding at all when afterwards duly notified." But with deference I would ask how a man can be said to be a shareholder at a time before he was bound to take any shares, or, to put the question in the form in which it is put by Mellish, L. J., in Harris' Case, 7 Ch. App. 587, at page 596, how there can be any relation back in a case of this kind as there may be in bankruptcy. If, as the lord justice said, the contract, after the letter has arrived in time, is to be treated as having been made from the time the letter is posted, the reason is that the contract was actually made at the time when the letter was posted. The principle indeed laid down in Harris' Case, as well as in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381, can really not be reconciled with the decision in Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Exch. 108. James, L. J., in the passage I have already quoted,—Harris' Case, L. R. 7 Ch., 592,—affirms the proposition that when once the acceptance is posted neither party can afterwards escape from the contract, and refers with approval to Hebb's Case, L. R. 4 Eq. 9. There a distinction was taken by the master of the rolls that the company chose to send the letter of allotment to their own agent, who was not authorized by the applicant for shares to receive it on his behalf, and who never delivered it; but he at the same time assumed that if, instead of sending it through an authorized agent, they had sent it through the post-office, the applicant would have been bound although the letter had never been delivered. Mellish, L. J., really goes as far, and states forcibly the reasons in favour of this view. The mere suggestion thrown out at the close of his judgment, at page 597, when stopping short of actually overruling the decision in Telegraph Co. v. Colson, that although a contract is complete when the letter accepting an offer is posted, yet it may be subject to a condition subsequent that, if the letter does not arrive in due course of post, then the parties may act on the assumption that the offer has not been accepted, can hardly, when contrasted with the rest of the judgment, be said to represent his own opinion on the law upon the subject. The contract, as he says (L. R. 7 Ch. at page 596), is actually made when the letter is posted. The acceptor, in posting the letter, has, to use the language of Lord Blackburn, in Brogden v. Directors of Metropolitan Ry. Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, 691, "put it out of his control and done an extraneous act which clinches the matter, and shows beyond all doubt that each side is bound." How, then, can a casualty in the post, whether resulting in delay, which in commercial transactions is often as bad as no delivery, or in non-delivery, unbind the parties or unmake the contract? To me it appears that in practice a contract complete upon the acceptance of an offer being posted, but liable to put an end to by an accident in the post, would be more mischievous than a contract only binding upon the parties to it upon the acceptance actually reaching the offerer, and I can see no principle of law from which such an anomalous contract can be deduced.

There is no doubt that the implication of a complete, final, and absolutely binding contract being formed, as soon as the acceptance of an offer is posted, may in some cases lead to inconvenience and hardship. But such there must be at times in every view of the law. It is impossible in transactions which pass between parties at a distance, and have to be carried on through the medium of correspondence, to adjust conflicting rights between innocent parties, so as to make the consequences of mistake on the part of a mutual agent fall equally upon the shoulders of both. At the same time I am not prepared to admit that the implication in question will lead to any great or general inconvenience or hardship. An offerer, if he chooses, may always make the formation of the contract which he proposes dependent upon the actual communication to himself of the acceptance. If he trusts to the post he trusts to a means of communication which, as a rule, does not fail, and if no answer to his offer is received by him, and the matter is of importance to him, he can make inquiries of the person to whom his offer was addressed. On the other hand, if the contract is not finally concluded, except in the event of the acceptance actually reaching the offerer, the door would be opened to the perpetration of much fraud, and, putting aside this consideration, considerable delay in commercial transactions, in which despatch is, as a rule, of the greatest consequence, would be occasioned; for the acceptor would never be entirely safe in acting upon his acceptance until he had received notice that his letter of acceptance had reached its destination.

Upon balance of conveniences and inconveniences it seems to me, applying with slight alterations the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Insurance Co., 9 How. 390, more consistent with the acts and declarations of the parties in this case to consider the contract complete and absolutely binding on the transmission of the notice of allotment through the post, as the medium of communication that the parties themselves contemplated, instead of postponing its completion until the notice had been received by the defendant. Upon principle, therefore, as well as authority, I think that the judgment of Lopes, J., was right and should be affirmed, and that this appeal should therefore be dismissed.

BRAMWELL, L. J. The question in this case is not whether the post-office was a proper medium of communication from the plaintiffs to the defendant. There is no doubt that it is so in all cases where personal service is not required. It is an ordinary mode of communication, and every person who gives any one the right to communicate with him gives the right to communicate in an ordinary manner, and so in this way and to this extent, that if an offer were made by letter in the morning to a person at a place within half an hour's railway journey of the offerer, I should say that an acceptance by post, though it did not reach the offerer till the next morning, would be in time. Nor is the question whether, when the letter reaches an offerer, the latter is bound and the bargain made from the time the letter is posted or despatched, whether by post or otherwise. The question in this case is different. I will presently state what in my judgment it is. Meanwhile I wish to mention some elementary propositions which, if carefully borne in mind, will assist in the determination of this case:

First. Where a proposition to enter into a contract is made and accepted, it is necessary, as a rule, to constitute the contract that there should be a communication of that acceptance to the proposer, per Brian, C. J. (Y. B. 17 Edw. IV, 2, post, p. 60), and Lord Blackburn: Brogden v. Metropolitan Ry. Co., 2 App. Cas. at page 692.

Secondly. That the present case is one of proposal and acceptance.

Thirdly. That as a consequence of or involved in the first proposition, if the acceptance is written or verbal—i. e., is by letter or message, as a rule, it must reach the proposer or there is no communication, and so no acceptance of the offer.

Fourthly. That if there is a difference where the acceptance is by a letter sent through the post which does not reach the offerer, it must be by virtue of some general rule or some particular agreement of the parties. As, for instance, there might be an agreement that the acceptance of the proposal may be by sending the article offered by the proposer to be bought, or hanging out a flag or sign to be seen by the offerer as he goes by, or leaving a letter at a certain place, or any other agreed mode, and in the same way there might be an agreement that dropping a letter in a post pillar-box or other place of reception should suffice.

Fifthly. That as there is no such special agreement in this case, the defendant, if bound, must be bound by some general rule which makes a difference when the post-office is employed as the means of communication.

Sixthly. That if there is any such general rule applicable to the communication of the acceptance of offers, it is equally applicable to all communications that may be made by post. Because, as I have said, the question is not whether this communication may be made by post. If, therefore, posting a letter which does not reach is a sufficient communication of acceptance of an offer, it is equally a communication of everything else which may be communicated by post—e. g., notice to quit. It is impossible to hold, if I offer my landlord to sell him some hay, and he writes accepting my offer, and in the same letter gives me notice to quit, and posts his letter, which, however, does not reach me, that he had communicated to me his acceptance of my offer, but not his notice to quit. Suppose a man has paid his tailor by check or bank-note, and posts a letter containing a check or bank-note to his tailor, which never reaches, is the tailor paid? If he is, would he be if he had never been paid before in that way? Suppose a man is in the habit of sending checks and bank-notes to his banker by post, and posts a letter containing checks and bank-notes, which never reaches. Is the banker liable? Would he be if this was the first instance of a remittance of the sort? In the cases I have supposed, the tailor and banker may have recognized this mode of remittance by sending back receipts and putting the money to the credit of the remitter. Are they liable with that? Are they liable without it? The question then is, Is posting a letter which is never received a communication to the person addressed, or an equivalent, or something which dispenses with it? It is for those who say it is to make good their contention. I ask why is it? My answer beforehand to any argument that may be urged is, that it is not a communication, and that there is no agreement to take it as an equivalent for or to dispense with a communication. That those who affirm the contrary say the thing which is not. That if Brian, C. J., had had to adjudicate on the case, he would deliver the same judgment as that reported. That because a man, who may send a communication by post or otherwise, sends it by post, he should bind the person addressed, though the communication never reaches him, while he would not so bind him if he had sent it by hand, is impossible. There is no reason in it; it is simply arbitrary. I ask whether any one who thinks so is prepared to follow that opinion to its consequence; suppose the offer is to sell a particular chattel, and the letter accepting it never arrives, is the property in the chattel transferred? Suppose it is to sell an estate or grant a lease, is the bargain completed? The lease might be such as not to require a deed, could a subsequent lessee be ejected by the would-be acceptor of the offer because he had posted a letter. Suppose an article is advertised at so much, and that it would be sent on receipt of a post-office order. Is it enough to post the letter? If the word "receipt" is relied on, is it really meant that that makes a difference? If it should be said let the offerer wait, the answer is, may be he may lose his market meanwhile. Besides, his offer may be by advertisement to all mankind. Suppose a reward for information, information posted does not reach, some one else gives it and is paid, is the offerer liable to the first man?

It is said that a contrary rule would be hard on the would-be acceptor, who may have made his arrangements on the footing that the bargain was concluded. But to hold as contended would be equally hard on the offerer, who may have made his arrangements on the footing that his offer was not accepted; his non-receipt of any communication may be attributable to the person to whom it was made being absent. What is he to do but to act on the negative, that no communication has been made to him? Further, the use of the post-office is no more authorized by the offerer than the sending an answer by hand, and all these hardships would befall the person posting the letter if he sent it by hand. Doubtless in that case he would be the person to suffer if the letter did not reach its destination. Why should his sending it by post relieve him of the loss and cast it on the other party. It was said, if he sends it by hand it is revocable, but not if he sends it by post, which makes the difference. But it is revocable when sent by post, not that the letter can be got back, but its arrival might be anticipated by a letter by hand or telegram, and there is no case to show that such anticipation would not prevent the letter from binding.[25] It would be a most alarming thing to say that it would. That a letter honestly but mistakenly written and posted must bind the writer if hours before its arrival he informed the person addressed that it was coming, but was wrong and recalled; suppose a false but honest character given, and the mistake found out after the letter posted, and notice that it was wrong given to the person addressed.

Then, as was asked, is the principle to be applied to telegrams? Further, it seems admitted that if the proposer said, "Unless I hear from you by return of post the offer is withdrawn," that the letter accepting it must reach him to bind him. There is, indeed, a case recently reported in the Times, before the Master of the Rolls, where the offer was to be accepted within fourteen days, and it is said to have been held that it was enough to post the letter on the 14th, though it would and did not reach the offerer till the 15th. Of course there may have been something in that case not mentioned in the report. But as it stands it comes to this, that if an offer is to be accepted in June, and there is a month's post between the places, posting the letter on June 30th will suffice, though it does not reach till July 31st; but that case does not affect this. There the letter reached, here it has not. If it is not admitted that "unless I hear by return the offer is withdrawn" makes the receipt of the letter a condition, it is to say an express condition goes for naught. If it is admitted, is it not what every letter says? Are there to be fine distinctions, such as, if the words are "unless I hear from you by return of post," etc., it is necessary the letter should reach him, but "let me know by return of post," it is not; or if in that case it is, yet it is not where there is an offer without those words. Lord Blackburn says that Mellish, L. J., accurately stated that where it is expressly or impliedly stated in the offer, "you may accept the offer by posting a letter," the moment you post this letter the offer is accepted. I agree; and the same thing is true of any other mode of acceptance offered with the offer and acted on—as firing a cannon, sending off a rocket, give your answer to my servant the bearer. Lord Blackburn was not dealing with the question before us; there was no doubt in the case before him that the letter had reached. As to the authorities, I shall not re-examine those in existence before the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108. But I wish to say a word as to Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381; the whole difficulty has arisen from some expressions in that case. Mr. Finlay's argument and reference to the case when originally in the Scotch Court has satisfied me that Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, decided nothing contrary to the defendant in this case. Mellish, L. J., in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 596, says: "That case is not a direct decision on the point before us." It is true, he adds, that he has great difficulty in reconciling the case of the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108, with Dunlop v. Higgins. I do not share that difficulty. I think they are perfectly reconcilable, and that I have shown so. Where a posted letter arrives, the contract is complete on the posting. So where a letter sent by hand arrives, the contract is complete on the writing and delivery to the messenger. Why not? All the extraordinary and mischievous consequences which the Lord Justice points out in Harris's Case might happen if the law were otherwise when a letter is posted, would equally happen where it is sent otherwise than by the post. He adds that the question before the Lords in Dunlop v. Higgins was whether the ruling of the Lord Justice Clerk was correct, and they held it was. Now Mr. Finlay showed very clearly that the Lord Justice Clerk decided nothing inconsistent with the judgment in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson. Since the last case there have been two before Vice-Chancellor Malins, in the earlier of which he thought it "reasonable," and followed it. In the other, because the Lord Justices had in Harris's Case thrown cold water on it, he appears to have thought it not reasonable. He says, suppose the sender of a letter says, "I make you an offer, let me have an answer by return of post." By return the letter is posted, and A. has done all that the person making the offer requests. Now that is precisely what he has not done. He has not let him "have an answer." He adds there is no default on his part. Why should he be the only person to suffer? Very true. But there is no default in the other, and why should he be the only person to suffer? The only other authority is the expression of opinion by Lopes, J., in the present case. He says the proposer may guard himself against hardship by making the proposal expressly conditioned on the arrival of the answer within a definite time. But it need not be express nor within a definite time. It is enough that is to be inferred that it is to be, and if it is to be it must be within a reasonable time. The mischievous consequences he points out do not follow from that which I am contending for. I am at a loss to see how the post-office is the agent for both parties. What is the agency as to the sender? merely to receive? But suppose it is not an answer, but an original communication. What then? Does the extent of the agency of the post-office depend on the contents of the letter? But if the post-office is the agent of both parties, then the agent of both parties has failed in his duty, and to both. Suppose the offerer says, "My offer is conditional on your answer reaching me." Whose agent is the post-office then? But how does an offerer make the post-office his agent, because he gives the offeree an option of using that or any other means of communication?

I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. I am of opinion that there was no bargain between these parties to allot and take shares, that to make such bargain there should have been an acceptance of the defendant's offer and a communication to him of that acceptance. That there was no such communication. That posting a letter does not differ from other attempts at communication in any of its consequences, save that it is irrevocable as between the poster and post-office. The difficulty has arisen from a mistake as to what was decided in Dunlop v. Higgins, and from supposing that because there is a right to have recourse to the post as a means of communication, that right is attended with some peculiar consequences, and also from supposing that because if the letter reaches it binds from the time of posting, it also binds though it never reaches. Mischief may arise if my opinion prevails. It probably will not, as so much has been said on the matter that principle is lost sight of. I believe equal if not greater, will, if it does not prevail. I believe the latter will be obviated only by the rule being made nugatory by every prudent man saying, "Your answer by post is only to bind if it reaches me." But the question is not to be decided on these considerations. What is the law? What is the principle? If Brian, C.

J., had had to decide this, a public post being instituted in his time, he would have said the law is the same, now there is a post, as it was before—viz., a communication to affect a man must be a communication—i. e., must reach him.

LEWIS v. BROWNING.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1881. 130 Mass. 173.)

Action for breach of covenants in a lease. The question was whether the terms of a proposed new lease had been accepted by defendant. The negotiations with reference to the new lease were carried on by letter and telegraph. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

GRAY, C. J. In M'Culloch v. Insurance Co., 1 Pick. 278, this court held that a contract made by mutual letters was not complete until the letter accepting the offer had been received by the person making the offer; and the correctness of that decision is maintained, upon an able and elaborate discussion of reasons and authorities, in Langd. Cont. (2d Ed.) 989–996. In England, New York and New Jersey, and in the supreme court of the United States, the opposite view has prevailed, and the contract has been deemed to be completed as soon as the letter of acceptance has been put into the post office duly addressed. Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681; Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381, 398–400; Newcomb v. De Roos, 2 El. & El, 271; Harris' Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587; Lord Blackburn, in Brogden v. Insurance Co., 9 How. 390, 13 L. Ed. 187.

But this case does not require a consideration of the general question; for, in any view, the person making the offer may always, if he chooses, make the formation of the contract which he proposes dependent upon the actual communication to himself of the acceptance. Thesiger, L. J., in Insurance Co. v. Grant, 4 Exch. Div. 223; Pol. Cont. (2d Ed.) 17; Leake. Cont. 39, note. And in the case at bar, the letter written in the plaintiff's behalf by her husband as her agent on July 8, 1878, in California, and addressed to the defendant at Boston, appears to us clearly to manifest such an intention. After proposing the terms of an agreement for a new lease, he says, "If you agree to this plan, and will telegraph me on receipt of this, I will forward power of attorney to Mr. Ware," the plaintiff's attorney in Boston. "Telegraph me 'Yes' or 'No.' If 'No,' I will go on at once to Boston with my wife, and between us we will try to recover our lost ground. If I do not hear from you by the 18th or 20th, I shall conclude 'No.'" Taking the whole letter together, the offer is made dependent upon an actual communication to the plaintiff of the defendant's acceptance on or before the 20th of July, and does not discharge the old lease, nor bind the plaintiff to execute a new one, unless the acceptance reaches California within that time. Assuming, therefore, that the defendant's delivery of a despatch at the telegraph office had the same effect as the mailing of a letter, he has no ground of exception to the ruling at the trial.

TREVOR et al. v. WOOD et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1867. 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511.)

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court rendered at General Term, in the first district, reversing a judgment entered upon the report of Hon. William Mitchell, referee, and ordering a new trial before the same referee.

The appellants have stipulated that if the judgment be affirmed, judgment absolute may be entered against them.

The appellants are dealers in bullion in New York, and the respondents are dealers in bullion in New Orleans. In 1859 they agreed to deal with each other in the purchase and sale of dollars, and that all communications between them in reference to such transactions should be by telegraph.

Or January 30th, 1860, the appellants telegraphed from New York to the respondents, at New Orleans, asking at what price they would sell 100,000 Mexican dollars. On the 31st of the same month the respondents answered that they would deliver 50,000 at 7¼; and on the same day the appellants telegraphed from New York to the defendants, at New Orleans, as follows:

"To John Wood & Co.:

"Your offer, 50,000 Mexicans at 7¼, accepted; send more if you can. Trevor & Colgate."

At the same time the appellants sent by mail to the respondents a letter acknowledging the receipt of the respondents' telegram, and copying the appellants' telegraphic answer. On the same day the respondents had also sent by mail a letter to the appellants, copying respondents' telegram of that date. On the next day (February 1st, 1860) the appellants again telegraphed to the respondents as follows:

"To John Wood & Co.:

"Accepted by telegraph yesterday, your offer for 50,000 Mexicans; send as many more, same price. Reply.

"Trevor & Colgate."

This telegram, as well as that of January 31st, from the appellants, did not reach the respondents until 10 a. m. on February 4th, 1860, in consequence of some derangement in a part of the line used by the appellants, but which was not known to the appellants until February 4th, when the telegraph company reported the line down. On February 3d the respondents telegraphed to the appellants as follows: "No answer to our despatch—dollars are sold." And on the same day they wrote by mail to the same effect. The appellants received this despatch on the same day, and answered it on the same day as follows:

"To John Wood & Co.:

"Your offer was accepted on receipt."

And again the next day:

"The dollars must come, or we will hold you responsible. Reply.

"Trevor & Colgate."

And again on February 4th insisting on the dollars being sent "by this or next steamer," and saying, "Don't fail to send the dollars at any price."

On the same February 4th the respondents telegraphed to appellants: "No dollars to be had. We may ship by steamer twelfth, as you propose, if we have them." No dollars were sent, and this action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract in not delivering them. The referee found for the plaintiff $219.33.

SCRUGHAM, J.[28] The offer of the respondents was made on January 31st, and they did not attempt to revoke it until February 3d. The offer was accepted by the appellants before, but the respondents did not obtain knowledge of the acceptance until after this attempted revocation. The principal question, therefore, which arises in the case, is whether a contract was created by this acceptance before knowledge of it reached the respondents.

The case of Mactier v. Frith, in the late Court of Errors (6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262) settles this precise question, and was so regarded by this court in Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441, where it is said that the principle established in the case of Mactier v. Frith was that it was only necessary "that there should be concurrence of the minds of the parties upon a distinct proposition manifested by an overt act; and that the sending of a letter announcing a consent to the proposal was a sufficient manifestation and consummated the contract from the time it was sent."

There is nothing in either the case of Mactier v. Frith nor in that of Vassar v. Camp, indicating that this effect is given to the sending of a letter, because it is sent by mail through the public post-office, and in fact the letter referred to in the first case could not have been so sent, for it was to go from the city of New York to Jacmel, in the island of St. Domingo, between which places there was at that time no communication by mail.

The sending of a letter accepting the proposition is regarded as an acceptance, because it is an overt act clearly manifesting the intention of the party sending it to close with the offer of him to which it is sent, and thus marking that aggregatio mentium which is necessary to constitute a contract. * * *

It was agreed between these parties that their business should be transacted through the medium of the telegraph. The object of this agreement was to substitute the telegraph for other methods of communication, and to give to their transactions by it the same force and validity they would derive if they had been performed through other agencies. In accordance with this agreement the offer was made by telegraph to the appellants in New York, and the acceptance addressed to the respondents in New Orleans, and immediately despatched from New York by order of the appellants. It cannot, therefore, be said that the appellants did not put their acceptance in a proper way to be communicated to the respondents, for they adopted the method of communication which had been used in the transaction by the respondents, and which had been selected by prior agreement between them as that by means of which their business should be transacted.

Under these circumstances the sending of the despatch must be regarded as an acceptance of the respondents' offer, and thereupon the contract became complete.

I cannot conceive upon what principle an agreement to communicate by telegraph can be held to be in effect a warranty by each party that his communication to the other shall be received. On the contrary, by agreeing beforehand to adopt that means of communication the parties mutually assume its hazards, which are principally as to the prompt receipt of the despatches. * * *

Judgment reversed.[29]

HENTHORN v. FRASER.

In 1891 the plaintiff was desirous of purchasing from the Huskisson Benefit Building Society certain houses in Flamank Street, Birkenhead. In May he, at the office of the society in Chapel Street, Liverpool, signed a memorandum drawn up by the secretary, offering £600 for the property, which offer was declined by the directors; and on July 1st he made in the same way an offer of £700, which was also declined. On July 7th he again called at the office, and the secretary verbally offered to sell to him for £750. This offer was reduced into writing, and was as follows:

"I hereby give you the refusal of the Flamank Street property at £750 for fourteen days."

The secretary, after signing this, handed it to the plaintiff, who took it away with him for consideration.

On the morning of the 8th another person called at the office and offered £760 for the property, which was accepted, and a contract for purchase signed, subject to a condition for avoiding it if the society found that they could not withdraw from the offer to the plaintiff.

In Farmers' Produce Co. v. McAlester Storage & Commission Co., 48 Okl. 488, 150 Pac. 483, L. R. A. 1916A, 1297 (1915), the offer was by telegram from Wisconsin and the acceptance was by mail from Oklahoma on the same day. A few hours after mailing the acceptance a telegram of revocation of the offer was received. It was held that there was a contract; the court believing that the post was a contemplated means of communication.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock on that day the secretary posted to the plaintiff, who resided in Birkenhead, the following letter:

"Please take notice that my letter to you of the 7th instant, giving you the option of purchasing the property, Flamank Street, Birkenhead, for £750, in fourteen days, is withdrawn, and the offer cancelled."

This letter, it appeared, was delivered at the plaintiff's address between 5 and 6 in the evening, but, as he was out, did not reach his hands till about 8 o'clock.

On the same July 8th the plaintiff's solicitor, by the plaintiff's direction, wrote to the secretary as follows:

"I am instructed by Mr. James Henthorn to write you, and accept your offer to sell the property, 1 to 17 Flamank Street, Birkenhead, at the price of £750. Kindly have contract prepared and forwarded to me."

This letter was addressed to the society's office, and was posted in Birkenhead at 3:50 p. m., was delivered at 8:30 p. m. after the closing of the office, and was received by the secretary on the following morning. The secretary replied, stating that the society's offer had been withdrawn.

The plaintiff brought this action in the Court of the County Palatine for specific performance. The Vice-Chancellor dismissed the action, and the plaintiff appealed.

Lord Herschell. [30] This is an action for the specific performance of a contract to sell to the plaintiff certain house property situate in Flamank Street, Birkenhead. The action was tried before the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancashire, who gave judgment for the defendants. * * *

If the acceptance by the plaintiff of the defendants' offer is to be treated as complete at the time the letter containing it was posted, I can entertain no doubt that the society's attempted revocation of the offer was wholly ineffectual. I think that a person who has made an offer must be considered as continuously making it until he has brought to the knowledge of the person to whom it was made that it is withdrawn. This seems to me to be in accordance with the reasoning of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Adams v. Lindsell [1 B. & Ald. 681], which was approved by the Lord Chancellor in Dunlop v. Higgins [1 H. L. C. 381, 399], and also with the opinion of Lord Justice Mellish in Harris's Case [L. R. 7 Ch. 587]. The very point was decided in the case of Byrne v. Van Tienhoven [5 C. P. D. 344] by Lord Justice Lindley, and his decision was subsequently followed by Mr. Justice Lush. The grounds upon which it has been held that the acceptance of an offer is complete when it is posted have, I think, no application to the revocation or modification of an offer. These can be no more effectual than the offer itself, unless brought to the mind of the person to whom the offer is made. But it is contended on behalf of the defendants that the acceptance was complete only when received by them and not on the letter being posted. It cannot, of course, be denied, after the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins in the House of Lords, that, where an offer has been made through the medium of the post, the contract is complete as soon as the acceptance of the offer is posted, but that decision is said to be inapplicable here, inasmuch as the letter containing the offer was not sent by post to Birkenhead, but handed to the plaintiff in the defendants' office at Liverpool. The question therefore arises in what circumstances the acceptance of an offer is to be regarded as complete as soon as it is posted. In the case of the Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Company v. Grant [4 Ex. D. 216], Lord Justice Baggallay said: "I think that the principle established in Dunlop v. Higgins is limited in its application to cases in which by reason of general usage, or of the relations between the parties to any particular transactions, or of the terms in which the offer is made, the acceptance of such offer by a letter through the post is expressly or impliedly authorized." And in the same case Lord Justice Thesiger based his judgment on the defendant having made an application for shares under circumstances "from which it must be implied that he authorized the company, in the event of their allotting to him the shares applied for, to send the notice of allotment by post." The facts of that case were that the defendant had, in Swansea, where he resided, handed a letter of application to an agent of the company, their place of business being situate in London. It was from these circumstances that the Lords Justices implied an authority to the company to accept the defendant's offer to take shares through the medium of the post. Applying the law thus laid down by the Court of Appeal, I think in the present case an authority to accept by post must be implied. Although the plaintiff received the offer at the defendants' office in Liverpool, he resided in another town, and it must have been in contemplation that he would take the offer, which by its terms was to remain open for some days, with him to his place of residence, and those who made the offer must have known that it would be according to the ordinary usages of mankind that if he accepted it he should communicate his acceptance by means of the post. I am not sure that I should myself have regarded the doctrine that an acceptance is complete as soon as the letter containing it is posted as resting upon an implied authority by the person making the offer to the person receiving it to accept by those means. It strikes me as somewhat artificial to speak of the person to whom the offer is made as having the implied authority of the other party to send his acceptance by post. He needs no authority to transmit the acceptance through any particular channel; he may select what means he pleases, the post-office no less than any other. The only effect of the supposed authority is to make the acceptance complete so soon as it is posted, and authority will obviously be implied only when the tribunal considers that it is a case in which this result ought to be reached. I should prefer to state the rule thus: Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as posted.[31] It matters not in which way the proposition be stated, the present case is in either view within it. The learned Vice-Chancellor appears to have based his decision to some extent on the fact that before the acceptance was posted the defendants had sold the property to another person. The case of Dickinson v. Dodds [2 Ch. D. 463] was relied upon in support of that defence. In that case, however, the plaintiff knew of the subsequent sale before he accepted the offer, which, in my judgment, distinguishes it entirely from the present case. For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment must be reversed and the usual decree for specific performance made. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal and of the action.

ELIASON et al. v. HENSHAW.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1819. 4 Wheat. 225, 4 L. Ed. 556.)

Error to Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON, J. This is an action, brought by the defendant in error, to recover damages for the non-performance of an agreement, alleged to have been entered into by the plaintiffs in error, for the purchase of a quantity of flour at a stipulated price. The evidence of this contract given in the court below, is stated in a bill of exceptions, and is to the following effect: A letter from the plaintiffs to the defendant, dated the 10th of February, 1813, in which they say: "Captain Conn informs us that you have a quantity of flour to dispose of. We are in the practice of purchasing flour at all times, in Georgetown, and will be glad to serve you, either in receiving your flour in store, when the markets are dull, and disposing of it when the markets will answer to advantage, or we will purchase at market price when delivered; if you are disposed to engage two or three hundred barrels at present, we will give you $9.50 per barrel, deliverable the first water in Georgetown, or any service we can. If you should want an advance, please write us by mail, and will send you part of the money in advance." In a postscript they add: "Please write by return of wagon whether you accept our offer." This letter was sent from the house at which the writer then was about two miles from Harper's Ferry, to the defendant at his mill, at Mill Creek, distant about 20 miles from Harper's Ferry, by a wagoner then employed by the defendant to haul flour from his mill to Harper's Ferry, and then about to return home with his wagon. He delivered the letter to the defendant on the 14th of the same month, to which an answer, dated the succeeding day was written by the defendant, addressed to the plaintiffs at Georgetown, and dispatched by a mail which left Mill Creek on the 19th, being the first regular mail from that place to Georgetown. In this letter the writer says: "Your favor of the 10th inst. was handed me by Mr. Chenoweth last evening. I take the earliest opportunity to answer it by post. Your proposal to engage 300 barrels of flour, delivered in Georgetown by the first water, at $9.50 per barrel, I accept, and shall send on the flour by the first boats that pass down from where my flour is stored on the river; as to any advance, will be unnecessary—payment on delivery is all that is required."

On the 25th of the same month, the plaintiffs addressed to the defendant an answer to the above, dated at Georgetown, in which they acknowledge the receipt of it, and add: "Not having heard from you before, had quite given over the expectation of getting your flour, more particularly as we requested an answer by return of wagon the next day, and as we did not get it, had bought all we wanted."

The wagoner, by whom the plaintiffs' first letter was sent, informed them, when he received it, that he should not probably return to Harper's Ferry, and he did not in fact return in the defendant's employ. The flour was sent down to Georgetown, some time in March, and the delivery of it to the plaintiffs was regularly tendered and refused.

Upon this evidence, the defendants in the court below, the plaintiffs in error, moved that court to instruct the jury, that, if they believed the said evidence to be true, as stated, the plaintiff in this action was not entitled to recover the amount of the price of the 300 barrels of flour, at the rate of $9.50 per barrel. The court being divided in opinion, the instruction prayed for was not given.

The question is, whether the court below ought to have given the instruction to the jury, as the same was prayed for? If they ought, the judgment, which was in favor of the plaintiff in that court, must be reversed.

It is an undeniable principle of the law of contracts, that an offer of a bargain by one person to another, imposes no obligation upon the former, until it is accepted by the latter, according to the terms in which the offer was made. Any qualification of, or departure from, those terms, invalidates the offer, unless the same be agreed to by the person who made it. Until the terms of the agreement have received the assent of both parties, the negotiation is open, and imposes no obligation upon either.

In this case, the plaintiffs in error offered to purchase from the defendant two or three hundred barrels of flour, to be delivered at Georgetown, by the first water, and to pay for the same $9.50 per barrel. To the letter containing this offer, they required an answer by the return of the wagon, by which the letter was dispatched. This wagon was, at that time, in the service of the defendant, and employed by him in hauling flour from his mill to Harper's Ferry, near to which place the plaintiffs then were. The meaning of the writers was obvious. They could easily calculate by the usual length of time which was employed by this wagon, in travelling from Harper's Ferry to Mill Creek, and back again with a load of flour, about what time they should receive the desired answer, and, therefore, it was entirely unimportant, whether it was sent by that, or another wagon, or in any other manner, provided it was sent to Harper's Ferry, and was not delayed beyond the time which was ordinarily employed by wagons engaged in hauling flour from the defendant's mill to Harper's Ferry. Whatever uncertainty there might have been as to the time when the answer would be received, there was none as to the place to which it was to be sent; this was distinctly indicated by the mode pointed out for the conveyance of the answer. The place, therefore, to which the answer was to be sent, constituted an essential part of the plaintiff's offer.

It appears, however, from the bill of exceptions, that no answer to this letter was at any time sent to the plaintiffs, at Harper's Ferry. Their offer, it is true, was accepted by the terms of a letter addressed Georgetown, and received by the plaintiffs at that place; but an acceptance communicated at a place different from that pointed out by the plaintiffs, and forming a part of their proposal, imposed no obligation binding upon them, unless they had acquiesced in it, which they declined doing.

It is no argument, that an answer was received at Georgetown; the plaintiffs in error had a right to dictate the terms upon which they would purchase the flour, and, unless they were complied with, they were not bound by them. All their arrangements may have been made with a view to the circumstance of place, and they were the only judges of its importance. There was, therefore, no contract concluded between these parties; and the court ought, therefore, to have given the instruction to the jury, which was asked for.

Judgment reversed. Cause remanded with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

SECTION 4.—ACCEPTANCE BY OVERT ACT

(But Not by Post)

ROGERS v. SNOW.

(In the King's Bench, 1578. Dalison, 94.)

In an action on the case between Daniel Rogers and Daniel Snow, the plaintiff alleged that whereas the brother of the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £303, in consideration that the plaintiff would taken the personal bond of the brother without surety and would not sue him until Michaelmas and would forbear to claim the money during that time, the defendant promised to pay it to the plaintiff. Issue was joined and verdict for plaintiff.

Gawdy, Jun., moved that the declaration was bad because the plaintiff did not allege that the consideration was performed on his part. Just as in case I promise a man 20s. if he will go to York for me, in an action on the case on this promise he must allege the performance on his own part.

THE COURT conceded this to be true and judgment was therefore arrested.[32]

MOTT v. JACKSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1911. 172 Ala. 448, 55 South. 528.)

Action by John D. Mott against M. R. Jackson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, rendered, and remanded.

The complaint is as follows:

Count 1: "Plaintiff claims of the defendants the sum of $1,500 damages, for that, whereas, on, to wit, the 22d day of January, 1908, the said defendants were engaged in running a steamboat, viz., the Liberty, as a common carrier on the navigable waters of Alabama, and on or about such time promised and agreed as such carriers to and with plaintiff to receive for him for hire on the next down trip of the boat, and on said trip to carry for him, a lot of staves, to wit, 10,000 in number, from Davis' Bluff, a landing on the Tombigbee river, and deliver the same safely at the wharves or docks in the city of Mobile, in the state of Alabama, for a reward then and there to be paid by the said plaintiff; that plaintiff, in consideration of said promise on the part of the defendants to carry said staves, had the same placed on the margin of the river at the usual and customary place for loading that kind of freight on said steamboat, the Liberty, and when the said boat arrived on the said down trip announced himself willing to load said staves on said boat, when defendants willfully, knowingly, and wrongly neglected and refused to take said staves. And plaintiff alleges that their refusal was without just cause or good excuse, and that before plaintiff had shipped said staves by any other carrier a freshet came in the river and washed said staves away, and they became entirely lost to plaintiff." * * *

The demurrers take the point that no consideration for the defendants' promise is alleged, and because the count does not allege that the plaintiff agreed and bound himself to ship some staves and pay the freight thereon, and others not necessary to be here set out.[33]

SIMPSON, J. This action is by the appellant against the appellees, as common carriers, by water, for damages for refusal to receive freight. Demurrers were sustained to the complaint, as amended, the plaintiff refused to amend, and the errors claimed are the action of the court in sustaining the demurrers to the several counts of the complaint.

The counts of the complaint (which will be set out by the reporter) are on the contract, and not ex delicto. Wilkinson v. Moseley, 18 Ala. 288, 290, et seq.; Mobile Life Ins. Co. v. Randall, 74 Ala. 170, 176; McDaniel v. Johnston, 110 Ala. 526, 532, 19 South. 35; Southern Railway Co. v. Rosenberg, 129 Ala. 287, 30 South. 32; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Littleton, 169 Ala. 99, 53 South. 97.

The insistence of the appellees is that the contract set out in the several counts of the complaint is unilateral, and does not allege any consideration for the promise or any acceptance of the offer. It is familiar contract law that where one party makes an offer, dependent upon some act of the other party, and the other party performs the act, that is an acceptance of the offer, and constitutes a sufficient consideration to support the contract. 6 Cyc. 429, and notes. It is true that a mere general offer by a carrier to receive and transport goods generally would be too indefinite, and would include nothing but its common-law liability, and under such an offer a failure to receive goods for shipment would be subject to the defenses applicable to an action on the common-law duty, such as that the vessel was already loaded to its full capacity; but when the carrier says to the shipper, "I will receive and carry your freight at a particular time [as on the next down trip of the boat] and at a particular place [as at Davis' Bluff]," it cannot mean anything except that "I will have the space and facilities, when the boat reaches said landing, to receive your goods, and if you will have them there at that time I will receive and transport them." It is true that, up to that time, the carrier's promise was but an offer, or a proposition; but, if it had desired to protect itself against the contingency of the shipper's not accepting the proposition, by having his goods ready for shipment, or of his receiving a boat load of freight before reaching said point, he should have required a specific acceptance of the proposal, or inserted a proviso as to space, etc.

The appellees insist that the offer should specify whether it is to be accepted by promise or by act. While a party making an offer has a right to specify how it shall be accepted, in order to complete the contract, yet, if he does not so specify, it is clear that anything which in law would be an acceptance, so long as the offer is left open, would be sufficient, and an acceptance by act is as effective as acceptance by words. In an early English case it was said: "If I say to another, 'If you will go to York, I will give you £100,' that is, in a certain sense, a unilateral contract. He has not promised to go to York. But, if he goes, it cannot be doubted that he will be entitled to receive the £100. His going to York at my request is a sufficient consideration for my promise." Gt. N. Ry. Co. v. Witham, 9 Law Rep. (C. C. P.) 12, 19. If the shipper had been standing on the river bank, and the captain of the boat had said, "I will take your staves and carry them to Mobile for a reasonable compensation," and the shipper, without saying a word, had immediately delivered the goods to the boat, or offered them to its employés, it cannot be doubted that that would have been a sufficient acceptance to close the contract. The offer, then, being still open and unrevoked, was necessarily a continuing one, and its acceptance at one time as effectual as at another. * * *

Reversed and demurrers overruled.[34]

(Appellate Court of Indiana. 1912. 50 Ind. App. 396, 98 N. E. 442.)

Action by the Journal Company of Troy against the High Wheel Auto Parts Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

ADAMS, J.[35] During the week of October 5–10, 1908, the appellee managed an automobile exhibit at Grand Central Palace, New York. The appellant was a manufacturer of automobiles, and desired to make a display at this exhibition. On August 8, 1908, the appellants sent the following order to appellee:

"Muncie, Ind., Aug. 8, 1908.

"Journal Company of Troy, Troy, N. Y.—Gentlemen: You will please reserve for us 234 square feet of space in 44th St., section main [34] In Lamb v. Prettyman, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 190 (1907) an agent sued for a commission: "The counsel for defendant contends that when Prettyman asked Lamb 'to get a deal,' Lamb did not agree to do so and therefore there was no contract. The answer to this is that it was not necessary for Lamb to say in words that he would act; he could make it a contract by performance, and there is evidence that he did procure a party to deal with the defendant. Where acceptance of a proposition is by a promise, it must presently follow the offer and notice of it be given to the other party. But where acceptance is by act, the mere performance of the act, without notice, concludes the contract."

exhibit floor, as per diagram below, for which we agree to pay you at the rate of one dollar ($1.00) per square foot, total $234.00. Terms: 25 per cent. to accompany signed contract; balance on Saturday, August 1, 1908. The rules and regulations printed on the last page of this contract form a part thereof. 9 ft. front, 26" deep. High Wheel Auto Parts Co., H. L. Warner, Mgr."

This order is made a part of the complaint; and it is averred that upon receipt thereof the appellee at once set apart the space in the exhibition building numbered and described in the contract, and held the same for appellants, unoccupied and unused by any other exhibitor during the exhibition. It is also averred that 25 per cent. of the contract price accompanied the order, and that appellants have failed and refused to pay the balance, after demand, and that the sum of $177 is due and wholly unpaid. * * *

A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and appellants filed three paragraphs of special answer, to which the court sustained a demurrer, and this ruling constitutes the error relied upon for reversal. These paragraphs of answer * * * also averred that on account of illness in the family of appellant Warner it was impossible for appellants to arrange to attend the exhibition and use the space subscribed for; that about the 21st of September, 1908, appellants notified appellee that, on account of such illness in the family of appellant Warner, defendants would not be able to attend and occupy the space subscribed for, and duly surrendered all claim to the same; that appellee "met such surrender by assuring the defendants that plaintiff would do its best to sell said space, stating that no man could do better than his best, and claiming that if it could not sell said space, it would hold defendants for the payment therefor." Appellants replied to appellee that they would lose what they had already paid, but would not pay for space which they would not use.

The points urged by appellant are (1) that the contract sued on is unilateral, and the complaint does not show an enforceable obligation: and (2) that the usage set up in the answers became a part of the contract, and proof of the same would defeat a recovery in this case.

A unilateral contract is a legal solecism. There is no such thing as a one-sided contract. The term, however, has found a place in the books, as expressing the idea of a contract lacking in mutuality. The order sued on in this action was primarily unilateral; but upon acceptance by appellee it became binding upon the parties, and upon performance either might enforce it. It is a rule so well settled as to be almost elemental that, where a contract or order is signed by one of the contracting parties and accepted by the other, and affirmative acts constituting the consideration done by the latter, the party signing cannot assert a want of mutuality in the instrument. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

TROUNSTINE et al. v. SELLERS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1886. 35 Kan. 447, 11 Pac. 441.)

This was an action of replevin, brought by A. & J. Trounstine & Co. to recover from A. H. Sellers the possession of a stock of ready-made clothing of the alleged value of $2,085.20. To a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiffs excepted.[86]

JOHNSTON, J. The right of possession to the clothing in controversy depends upon whether the proposition made to the plaintiffs by Moore & Weaver, on November 16, 1884, was accepted and became a contract before the execution of the mortgages by Moore & Weaver to their creditors on the fifteenth day of December, 1884. It appears that the plaintiffs, who were engaged in the wholesale clothing business at Cincinnati, Ohio, sold on credit a stock of clothing, through one of their agents, to Moore & Weaver, at Ottawa, Kansas. The goods were sold and shipped in the early part of September, 1884, upon the terms that Moore & Weaver were to have a discount of 6 per cent. off the prices named not later than 10 days after January 1, 1885, and credit was given them until the expiration of that time for a discount. On November 10, 1884, Moore & Weaver wrote to the plaintiffs, claiming that if they did not choose to discount the bill within 10 days after January 1, 1885, they were entitled to a credit of four months from that time. The plaintiffs answered this letter on the fourteenth of November, 1884, insisting that the credit did not extend beyond 10 days after January 1, 1885. Moore & Weaver again wrote to the plaintiffs on November 16, 1884, insisting on the additional credit of four months from January 1st, and, in closing their letter stated: "If you think we are misrepresenting the facts in the case, we will return the goods which we have on hand, and pay for what we have sold out of them. Hoping to hear from you soon, we remain," etc. This letter was received by the usual course of mail, but was never answered. It seems that, soon after the plaintiffs received the letter of November 16th, Mr. Harper, one of their firm, started out from Cincinnati on a business trip, with the intention of attending to some important business matters of the firm in Indiana and Illinois which demanded immediate attention, and with a view of coming on to Ottawa as soon as those matters were disposed of. He reached Ottawa on the evening of December 16, 1884, one month after the proposition was made, when he demanded the possession of the goods from the defendant, Sellers, who was in charge of them under the mortgages executed the preceding day.

It is insisted by the plaintiffs that the court erred in not holding the conduct of the plaintiff in starting from Cincinnati as an acceptance of the proposal made by Moore & Weaver, and as a completion of the contract, which vested the title and right of possession of the goods in the plaintiffs. In our opinion, the conduct of the plaintiffs did not indicate a purpose to accept the proposal made by Moore & Weaver, and cannot be regarded as an acceptance. Although the proposition did not, within itself, limit the time or manner of acceptance, it cannot be regarded as a perpetual one, forever open to be accepted or rejected, at the will of the plaintiffs. In Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262, the rule laid down with respect to a proposal made by letter is that the offer continues until the letter containing it is received, "and the party has had a fair opportunity to answer it." It has also been held that "a letter written would not be an acceptance so long as it remained in the possession or under the control of the writer. An offer, then, made through a letter, is not continued beyond the time that the party has a fair opportunity to answer it." Averill v. Hedge, 12 Conn. 424. Upon receipt of Moore & Weaver's letter the plaintiffs were bound "to accept in a reasonable time, and give notice thereof, or the defendant was no longer bound by the offer." Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240. See, also, Martin v. Black's Ex'rs, 21 Ala. 721; Moxley's Adm'rs v. Moxley, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 309; Minnesota Oil Co. v. Collier Lead Co., 4 Dill. 431, Fed. Cas. No. 9,635; Judd v. Day, 50 Iowa, 247; Taylor v. Rennie, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 272; Benj. Sales, 61, note 7.

The offer which was made was the result of correspondence through the mails, and, as the dates of the letters indicate, they had been promptly answered and responded to by both the parties. Besides, the letter containing the proposal, by its terms, enjoined an early reply. It closes with the words, "Hoping to hear from you soon," etc. While the mode of acceptance was not indicated in the letter making the offer, the nature of the negotiations, as well as the manner in which they were carried on, suggested, not only the desire and necessity for an early reply, but also that the parties making the offer would expect an answer through and by the usual course of the mails. It has been said that "where an individual makes an offer by post, stipulating for, or by the nature of the business having the right to expect, an answer by return post, the offer can only endure for a limited time, and the making of it is accompanied by the implied stipulation that the answer will be sent by return post. If that stipulation is not satisfied, the person making the offer is released from it." Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525, 32 Am. Rep. 35; Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 387.

If the plaintiffs intended to accept the proposal, it was their duty to have signified their acceptance, either through the mails, or by some equally expeditious means. The plaintiffs say that they determined to accept the proposition as soon as the offer was received, and that Mr. Harper's act in starting to Ottawa was an overt act, amounting to an acceptance. Every overt act caused by a determination to accept a proposition does not constitute an acceptance. If it was the intention of the plaintiffs to accept the offer, they could, and most likely would, have written Moore & Weaver a letter, which was the usual mode of communication between the parties, and which is the usual mode of accepting an offer made by letter. Instead of sending a letter or telegram announcing a determination to accept, one of them started on a business trip through the country, intending finally to come to Kansas, and take the goods, which trip consumed almost 30 days' time, during which time they were at liberty to change their purpose, and reject the proposition. The mere determination to accept an offer does not constitute an acceptance which is binding on the parties. "The assent must either be communicated to the other party, or some act must have been done which the other party has expressly or impliedly offered to treat as a communication." Benj. Sales, 54. Where parties are distant, and the contract is to be made by correspondence the writing of a letter or telegram containing a notice of acceptance is not, of itself, sufficient to complete a contract. In such a case the act must involve an irrevocable element, and the letter must be placed in the mail, or the telegram deposited in the office, for transmission, and thus placed beyond the power or control of the sender, before the assent becomes effectual to consummate a contract, and not then, unless the offer is still standing. See authorities above cited. The action of the plaintiffs in sending a member of the firm, by a circuitous route, to Kansas, was no more than a mere mental assent, which, as we have seen, is insufficient. There was no act of acceptance until Harper arrived at Ottawa, and demanded the goods. This was not within a reasonable time, and, when the proposition was not met within a reasonable time, Moore & Weaver were at liberty to regard their proposition as rejected, and to make other disposition of their property, which they manifestly did do. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

DOOLITTLE v. CALLENDER.

(Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1911. 88 Neb. 747, 130 N. W. 436.)

FAWCETT, J.[87] Plaintiff brought suit to recover an unpaid balance upon the following contract:

"The Art League, Cut Makers, 656 Broadway, New York. No. 2,541. Book ———, A Series. Any arrangement made with representative must be specified plainly on this order.

"Gentlemen: Send one cut (about 2 in. by 2 in., your A series) and copy of reading matter per week to use in this city only, both such as you think best to advertise the grocery business, for one year and after that until further notice. I will pay you fifty-five cents for each cut, at the end of the quarter they are sent. In consideration of above, this exclusive right is given. The Art League agrees upon accepting this, not to send any of the cuts sent under this agreement to any one else in the city mentioned, during the time.

"Dated, The Art League, Nov. 10, 1905. Per Jos. F. Taylor.

"C. E. Callender. [Name.]

"York, Nebr. [Address.]"

Defendant prevailed, and plaintiff appeals.

Within a few days after the execution of the above contract, plaintiff began mailing, weekly, to the defendant the cuts and reading matter called for by the contract, and defendant continued to receive them without objection or complaint of any kind until February 6th following, when he wrote plaintiff, acknowledging receipt of a statement, and stating, "And before remitting for same would ask how much I must remit, and you discontinue after 10th this month. I do not need any more of them and shall not after that date. It is not necessary to say why, except that it is not to use something else instead." To this plaintiff replied February 15th, stating that he could not afford to cancel the contract for anything less than 10 per cent. from the contract price. Plaintiff continued to mail the cuts and defendant to receive them without objection until the 30th of March, when defendant again wrote plaintiff, stating, "I am now out of business and need no more cuts. Discontinue sending them. I have paid for them to April 1st." Plaintiff continued thereafter to mail the cuts and reading matter until the end of the year; defendant refusing to take them from the post office. * * *

We do not think the contract was void for lack of consideration, or for want of mutuality, as urged by defendant. The consideration on the part of plaintiff was that he would furnish one cut a week and copy of reading matter, both such as he might think best to advertise defendant's grocery business. For that defendant agreed to pay 55 cents for each cut at the end of the quarter in which they were sent. We think the promise of each was a sufficient consideration for the promise of the other, and that there was no lack of consideration on either side. The fact that the contract provided that both the design of the cut and the wording of the reading matter were to be such as plaintiff might think best did not render the contract void. Plaintiff was in the advertising business, making a specialty of furnishing this kind of cuts and of reading matter to accompany the same, and, if defendant saw fit to make a contract to take cuts and reading matter for a year and to leave the design of the cuts and the wording of the reading matter to plaintiff's judgment, that was defendant's own concern. It may have been a departure in advertising for a business man in the city of York. It may have been an experiment, so to speak, but many a business man has greatly improved his business by departing from the beaten path. Such departure has often led to fortune; and the fact that defendant saw fit to make such a departure in the present case cannot be imputed to plaintiff as fraud. The fact that, if plaintiff failed to send the cuts and reading matter as agreed, defendant might have some difficulty in making proof of his damages sustained by reason thereof, will not avoid the contract.

Many such cases arise, but we are not aware that it has ever been held that for such a reason alone a contract will be held void. The contract is fair upon its face, was entered into by defendant without undue influence on plaintiff's part, was subsequently recognized by defendant for more than four months by the receipt of the cuts without complaint, and by payment therefor. Plaintiff was at all times ready to perform his part of the contract, and we are unable to discover from the record before us any good reason why defendant should not respond in damages for his refusal to perform his part. * * *

Plaintiff also testified that he received notice from the postal authorities about April 12, 1906, that defendant was refusing to take the cuts from the office, and that at that time he had expended all that was necessary to expend to fill the order for the entire year, except the sum of $3.60, and that therefore the difference between this $3.60 and the contract price for the full year would be the amount of plaintiff's damage for defendant's breach of the contract. This would seem to be a fair adjustment of the difference between the parties, and we think that, under the evidence in the record before us, plaintiff should have recovered that amount.

The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed and remanded.

SECTION 5.—WHEN NOTICE OF ACCEPTANCE IS REQUIRED

ANONYMOUS.

(In the Court of Common Pleas, 1478. Y. B. 17 Edw. IV, 2.)

In trespass for entering the close and taking and carrying away grain, barley and grass.[38]

Catesby [for defendant]. No action lies, because a long time before the alleged trespass the plaintiff and the defendant bargained at a certain place in London, that the defendant should go to the place where, etc., and there look at the said grain, barley and grass and if he was pleased with what he saw that he should then take the said grain, barley, and grass, paying to the said plaintiff 3s. 4d. for each acre, one with another. And we say that we went there and looked at them as aforesaid, and were well content with the bargain, wherefore we took the goods, which is the alleged trespass. We therefore pray judgment, etc.

[38] Parts of the report are omitted.

Pigot [for plaintiff]. This is not a good plea for several reasons. One is that he has said that the place, etc. is 10 acres of grain, etc. Whereas he ought to have said 10 acres of land sown with grain, etc. Also he has confessed the taking and has not shown that he paid us the money according to the bargain, for I believe that it was not permitted to him to take the goods before making payment, for it would be very mischievous law that would let him have them without paying, etc. Also as to his having seen the grain, etc. he ought to have notified us whether or not he was pleased with it, so that we might know that he took it for that reason, for it could not be a completed bargain if it does not appear that each party is agreed, etc.

Catesby [for defendant]. The plea is good enough in spite of all the reasons he has given. As to the first matter, that we have said acres of grain, etc. and not of land, etc. this is in accordance with common usage (vulgariter). As to the second, that we have not alleged payment of the money, I believe that many bargains in this realm are void, if this be law. But I hold that it is lawful in the case of such a bargain for him to take the goods before making payment: there is no mischief in that, for the plaintiff would have an action of debt for the money, because we have received the thing, wherefore, etc. And to my mind in such bargains the law is that the one puts his trust in the other to have the thing for which they bargained, and so should the other also. And on the point that we ought to notify him of our agreement, this would be too inconvenient, to have to come back here to tell him that we are satisfied with the looks of the thing (which is perhaps in another country a long way from London). Also the bargain shows in itself that this is not necessary, in that he made his assent depend on our assent, i. e. that if we were satisfied on inspection of the goods we should have them, by reason of which he cannot be better notified than he is by our taking, etc.

LITTLETON, [J.] As to the payment, it seems to me that he should allege this or the plea is not good. E. g. if I go to a draper and ask him how much I must pay for a certain piece of cloth, and he replies a certain sum, and I say that I will take it; whereupon I take the cloth, but without paying him any cash in hand: he would have an action of trespass against me, and it would be no defense to say that I had bought it of him, without showing that I had paid him, etc. So here.

CHOKE, [J.] agreed, for a contract is not perfected without the agreement of each party, quia dicitur de con, quod est simul: for if you ask me in Smithfield how much you should give me for my horse, and I say so much, and you reply that you will take him but you do not pay the price, do you believe that it is my will that for this only you are to have the horse without paying over the price? I say no, and that I may still sell him to another, and you would have no remedy against me, for otherwise I should be compelled to keep the horse even against my will, if the property be in you, and you could come and take him whenever you pleased, which would be unreasonable. So here.

BRIAN, [C. J.,] agreed, and it seems to me from the language of the bargain that he is not permitted to enter and take the grain, for it cannot be meant that he was willing that the defendant might have the grain without paying the price. But if he had said take the grain and pay when you please, or if he had specified a certain period of credit, then I think he might have taken the grain and that a plea like the present one would be good. * * * As to the other point, it seems to me the plea is not good without alleging that he had notified the other of his assent, for it is common knowledge that the mental assent of a man cannot be determined by evidence, for the devil himself does not know the mere thoughts of men. If, however, the agreement had been that if the bargain should please you then you should so express yourself to a certain third person, I grant you that you would not need to do more, for that would be a matter of fact [and capable of proof]. Suppose I am bound to you in a penal bond for the sum of £10 payable several days later, upon condition to be void in case you are pleased to take a certain horse of mine in satisfaction of a wrong that I have done you, etc., and you look at the horse but do not tell me whether he pleases you or not, for which reason I do not pay the £10, would the obligation be forfeit? I think not. Wherefore, etc.

Catesby [for defendant]. Sir, if he does not take the horse, so that his act indicates his assent, then you forfeit your obligation. And as to the statement that there is no duty to deliver the thing sold before payment of the price, it is equally true that there is no duty to pay the price before delivery of the thing sold. However, as I have said before, by both law and reason, each must put confidence in the other; and if payment be regarded as necessary, I believe that we should have seen decisions upon the point in our books, but I have never seen any. * * *

WHITE v. CORLIES.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1871. 46 N. Y. 467.)

Appeal from First Judicial District.

The action was for an alleged breach of contract.

The plaintiff was a builder with his place of business in Fortieth street, New York City.

The defendants were merchants at 32 Dey street.

In September, 1865, the defendants furnished the plaintiff with specifications, for fitting up a suit of offices at 57 Broadway, and requested him to make an estimate of the cost of doing the work.

On September 28th the plaintiff left his estimate with the defendants, and they were to consider upon it, and inform the plaintiff of their conclusions.

On the same day the defendants made a change in their specifications and sent a copy of the same, so changed, to the plaintiff, for his assent under his estimate which he assented to by signing the same and returning it to the defendants.

On the day following the defendants' bookkeeper wrote the plaintiff the following note:

"New York, September 29th. Upon an agreement to finish the fitting up of offices 57 Broadway in two weeks from date you can begin at once. The writer will call again, probably between five and six this p. m. W. H. R., for J. W. Corlies & Co., 32 Dey street."

No reply to this note was ever made by the plaintiff; and on the next day the same was countermanded by a second note from the defendants.

Immediately on receipt of the note of September 29th, and before the countermand was forwarded, the plaintiff commenced a performance by the purchase of lumber and beginning work thereon.

And after receiving the countermand, the plaintiff brought this action for damages for a breach of contract.

The court charged the jury as follows: "From the contents of this note which the plaintiff received, was it his duty to go down to Dey street (meaning to give notice of assent) before commencing the work. In my opinion it was not. He had a right to act upon this note and commence the job, and that was a binding contract between the parties."

To this defendants excepted.

FOLGER, J. We do not think that the jury found, or that the testimony shows that there was any agreement between the parties before the written communication of the defendants of September 30 was received by the plaintiff. This note did not make an agreement. It was a proposition, and must have been accepted by the plaintiff before either party was bound in contract to the other. The only overt action which is claimed by the plaintiff as indicating on his part an acceptance of the offer, was the purchase of the stuff necessary for the work, and commencing work as we understand the testimony, upon that stuff.

We understand the rule to be that where an offer is made by one party to another when they are not together, the acceptance of it by that other must be manifested by some appropriate act. It does not need that the acceptance shall come to the knowledge of the one making the offer before he shall be bound. But though the manifestation need not be brought to his knowledge before he becomes bound, he is not bound if that manifestation is not put in a proper way to be in the usual course of events, in some reasonable time communicated to him. Thus a letter received by mail containing a proposal may be answered by letter by mail containing the acceptance. And in general as soon as the answering letter is mailed, the contract is concluded. Though one party does not know of the acceptance, the manifestation thereof is put in the proper way of reaching him.

In the case in hand the plaintiff determined to accept. But a mental determination not indicated by speech, or put in course of indication by act to the other party, is not an acceptance which will bind the other. Nor does an act which in itself is no indication of an acceptance, become such because accompanied by an unevinced mental determination. Where the act uninterpreted by concurrent evidence of the mental purpose accompanying it is as well referable to one state of facts as another, it is no indication to the other party of an acceptance, and does not operate to hold him to his offer.

Conceding that the testimony shows that the plaintiff did resolve to accept this offer, he did no act which indicated an acceptance of it to the defendants. He, a carpenter and builder, purchased stuff for the work. But it was stuff as fit for any other like work. He began work upon the stuff, but as he would have done for any other like work. There was nothing in his thought formed but not uttered, or in his acts that indicated or set in motion an indication to the defendants of his acceptance of their offer, or which could necessarily result therein.

But the charge of the learned judge was fairly to be understood by the jury as laying down the rule to them, that the plaintiff need not indicate to the defendants his acceptance of their offer; and that the purchase of stuff and working on it after receiving the note, made a binding contract between the parties. In this we think the learned judge fell into error.

The judgment appealed from must be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event of the action. All concur, but ALLEN, J., not voting.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.[89]

CARLILL v. CARBOLIC SMOKE BALL CO.

(Court of Appeal, 1892. [1893] 1 Q. B. 256.)

Appeal from a decision of Hawkins, J. [1892] 2 Q. B. 484.

The defendants, who were the proprietors and vendors of a medical preparation called "The Carbolic Smoke Ball," inserted in the Pall Mall Gazette of November 13, 1891, and in other newspapers, the following advertisement:

"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic influenza, colds, or [89] In accord: Beckwith v. Cheever, 21 N. H. 41 (1850).

The sending of a notice is so generally looked upon as the final and operative act that votes and other acts prior to notice may not be operative. In Powell v. Lee, 99 L. T. 284 (1908), the plaintiff had applied for a position; the defendant school board voted to appoint him, but reconsidered the vote before any formal notice to him. It was held that there was no contract. In re London & Northern Bank, [1900] 1 Ch. 220, held that an applicant for shares could revoke his offer after the company had voted to allot the shares to him and had started a letter of notification by a messenger.

any disease caused by taking cold, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball. £1000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent Street shewing our sincerity in the matter.

"During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand carbolic smoke balls were sold as preventives against this disease, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the carbolic smoke ball.

"One carbolic smoke ball will last a family several months, making it the cheapest remedy in the world at the price, 10s., post free. The ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. Address, Carbolic Smoke Ball Company, 27 Princes Street, Hanover Square, London."

The plaintiff, a lady, on the faith of this advertisement, bought one of the balls at a chemist's and used it as directed, three times a day, from November 20, 1891, to January 17, 1892, when she was attacked by influenza. Hawkins, J., held that she was entitled to recover the £100. The defendants appealed.

LINDLEY, L. J.[40] * * * We must first consider whether this was intended to be a promise at all, or whether it was a mere puff which meant nothing. Was it a mere puff? My answer to that question is "No," and I base my answer upon this passage: "£1000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, shewing our sincerity in the matter." Now, for what was that money deposited or that statement made except to negative the suggestion that this was a mere puff and meant nothing at all? The deposit is called in aid by the advertiser as a proof of his sincerity in the matter—that is, the sincerity of his promise to pay this £100 in the event which he has specified. I say this for the purpose of giving point to the observation that we are not inferring a promise; there is the promise, as plain as words can make it.

Then it is contended that it is not binding. In the first place, it is said that it is not made with anybody in particular. Now that point is common to the words of this advertisement and to the words of all other advertisements offering rewards. They are offers to anybody who performs the conditions named in the advertisement, and anybody who does perform the condition accepts the offer. In point of law this advertisement is an offer to pay £100 to anybody who will perform these conditions, and the performance of the conditions, is the acceptance of the offer. That rests upon a string of authorities, the earliest of which is Williams v. Carwardine, 4 Barn. & Adol. 621, which has been followed by many other decisions upon advertisements offering rewards.

But then it is said, "Supposing that the performance of the conditions is an acceptance of the offer, that acceptance ought to have been notified." Unquestionably, as a general proposition, when an offer is made, it is necessary in order to make a binding contract, not only that it should be accepted, but that the acceptance should be notified. But is that so in cases of this kind? I apprehend that they are an exception to that rule, or, if not an exception, they are open to the observation that the notification of the acceptance need not precede the performance. This offer is a continuing offer. It was never revoked, and if notice of acceptance is required,—which I doubt very much, for I rather think the true view is that which was expressed and explained by Lord Blackburn in the case of Brogden v. Railway Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, 691,—if notice of acceptance is required, the person who makes the offer gets the notice of acceptance contemporaneously with his notice of the performance of the condition. If he gets notice of the acceptance before his offer is revoked, that in principle is all you want. I, however, think that the true view, in a case of this kind, is that the person who makes the offer shows by his language and from the nature of the transaction that he does not expect and does not require notice of the acceptance apart from notice of the performance. * * *

I come now to the last point which I think requires attention: that is, the consideration. It has been argued that this is nudum pactum—that there is no consideration. We must apply to that argument the usual legal tests. Let us see whether there is no advantage to the defendants. It is said that the use of the ball is no advantage to them, and that what benefits them is the sale; and the case is put that a lot of these balls might be stolen, and that it would be no advantage to the defendants if the thief or other people used them. The answer to that, I think, is as follows: It is quite obvious that in view of the advertisers a use by the public of their remedy, if they can only get the public to have confidence enough to use it, will react and produce a sale which is directly beneficial to them. Therefore, the advertisers get out of the use an advantage which is enough to constitute a consideration.

But there is another view. Does not the person who acts upon this advertisement and accepts the offer put himself to some inconvenience at the request of the defendants? Is it nothing to use this ball three times daily for two weeks according to the directions at the request of the advertiser? Is that to go for nothing? It appears to me that there is a distinct inconvenience, not to say a detriment, to any person who so uses the smoke ball. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is ample consideration for the promise. * * *

Bowen, L. J. * * * Then it was said that there was no notification of the acceptance of the contract. One cannot doubt that, as an ordinary rule of law, an accepance of an offer made ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together. Unless this is done, the two minds may be apart, and there is not that consensus which is necessary according to the English law—I say nothing about the laws of other countries—to make a contract. But there is this clear gloss to be made upon that doctrine, that as notification of acceptance is required for the benefit of the person who makes the offer, the person who makes the offer may dispense with notice to himself if he thinks it desirable to do so, and I suppose there can be no doubt that where a person in an offer made by him to another person, expressly or impliedly intimates a particular mode of acceptance as sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the other person to whom such offer is made to follow the indicated method of acceptance; and if the person making the offer, expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating acceptance of it to himself, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification.

That seems to me to be the principle which lies at the bottom of the acceptance cases, of which two instances are the well-known judgment of Mellish, L. J., in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587, and the very instructive judgment of Lord Blackburn in Brogden v. Railway Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, 691, in which he appears to me to take exactly the line I have indicated.

Now, if that is the law, how are we to find out whether the person who makes the offer does intimate that notification of acceptance will not be necessary in order to constitute a binding bargain? In many cases you look to the offer itself. In many cases you extract from the character of the transaction that notification is not required, and in the advertisement cases it seems to me to follow as an inference to be drawn from the transaction itself that a person is not to notify his acceptance of the offer before he performs the condition, but that if he performs the condition notification is dispensed with. It seems to me that from the point of view of common sense no other idea could be entertained. If I advertise to the world that my dog is lost, and that anybody who brings the dog to a particular place will be paid some money, are all the police or other persons whose business it is to find lost dogs to be expected to sit down and write a note saying that they have accepted my proposal? Why, of course, they at once look after the dog, and as soon as they find the dog they have performed the condition. The essence of the transaction is that the dog should be found, and it is not necessary under such circumstances, as it seems to me, that in order to make the contract binding there should be any notification of acceptance. It follows from the nature of the thing that the performance of the condition is sufficient acceptance without the notification of it, and a person who makes an offer in an advertisement of that kind makes an offer which must be read by the light of that common sense reflection. He does, therefore, in his offer impliedly indicate that he does not require notification of the acceptance of the offer. * * *

Appeal dismissed.[41]

[41] In Weaver v. Wood, 9 Pa. 220 (1848), Gibson, C. J., said: "If a party promise another a definite or a reasonable reward if he will do a particular thing, the party promised is not bound to do it; yet if he does it without

HALLOCK v. COMMERCIAL INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1857. 26 N. J. Law, 268.)

VREDENBURGH, J.[42] G. W. Breck was the agent of the defendants at Bath, New York, to make surveys, receive proposals for insurance, and receive premiums on risks accepted by the company, but was not authorized to make insurances or issue policies. The proposals for insurance were sent by him to the company at Jersey City, and if accepted by them, the policies were to be sent to him to deliver.

On the 2d of March, 1855, the plaintiff applied to him to insure his building in Bath, for one year from the 10th of March, for $1,200. Breck made the survey, and told him what the premium would be. The plaintiff thereupon offered the premium to Breck, who said he would consider it as paid, but would leave it with the plaintiff, who was a banker, and with whom he kept his account, until the policy arrived, when he would call and get the money. The application was signed by the plaintiff, and with the survey attached, was sent by Breck to the company, on the 2d or 3d of March. The defendants deferred acting on the application until the secretary could procure a map of Bath, referred to by Breck.

On the 13th of March, between 10 and 12 a. m., the map having been received, a policy was filled up on said building, insuring it from the 10th of March for one year, signed by the proper officers, and mailed at Jersey City, directed to Breck at Bath, which by due course of mail would have reached him on the 14th March, but which, owing to the snow, did not until the 16th of March. At the same time that Breck received the policy he also received a telegraphic despatch, dated the 15th March, as follows: "Risk not taken when burnt. Return policy when received."

Accompanying the policy was also a letter from the secretary, of the tenor following:

"Office of the Commercial Insurance Company, No. 3.

"Montgomery St., Jersey City, March 13th, 1855.

"Messrs. Breck and Sawyer, Esq'rs, Bath, N. Y.

"Dear Sirs: Your application on G. W. Hallock's saloon has been held under advisement till we could procure a copy of the map, of which you speak in your letter. We do not look on it as a very desir-

Rep. 731 (1882), promise of reward for rescue of person from a fire.

Where an offer is made to buy goods on certain terms, to be shipped, the shipment, without more, may be a sufficient acceptance. Sturdivant v. Mt. Dixie Sanitarium, Land & Investment Co., 197 Ala. 280, 72 South. 502 (1916).

able risk, but nevertheless, as the rate seems a fair one, we enclose a policy, relying very much on your representation in regard to the good character of the occupant. Enclosed please find policy, No. 1054, for $1,200, premium $24.

"Respectfully, J. M. Chapman, Sec'y."

On the 16th of March, after the policy arrived, the plaintiff tendered the premium in gold to Breck, and demanded the policy. Breck accepted the money, because he had refused to accept it when the application was made, and considered it on deposit, meaning to put the plaintiff in the same situation as if he had received it on the 2d of March, but refused to deliver the policy, because so directed by the defendants.

The building insured was entirely consumed by fire on the 13th of March, at 8. a. m., about two hours before the risk was accepted or the policy signed. * * * The suit is on the policy, and the plea the general issue. * * *

Secondly. The defendants insist that the application, having been made on the 2d of March, and no action having been taken by the defendants until the 13th, we cannot consider the plaintiff as still continuing his offer to the defendants; that we are bound to consider it as withdrawn. But why so? There is no pretence of any express withdrawal. The question and the answer can never, in any case, be simultaneous; the question must always remain for some length of time with the one to whom it is put, and abide the answer. In every negotiation, whether by telegraph, by letter, or by word of mouth, the application and the answer can never be at the same precise instant. The application must wait upon the answer. If the application is considered to be withdrawn as soon as made, no two minds ever could meet upon any proposition. The aggregatio mentium never could take place. In all cases, the application is construed to stand until the contrary appears; until it is either withdrawn or answered. Pothier Traite du Contrat du vente, p. 1, § 2, art. 3, No. 32; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262.

But here the plaintiff avers the application to be still standing. The defendants treat it as still before them on the 13th of March, by accepting it, and making out the policy We must therefore treat it as the parties treat it, as still at noon on the 13th of March a standing and valid offer by the plaintiff to the defendants.[43]

Thirdly. The defendants contend that the policy never was delivered, so as to make it a living contract. But it appears, by the case, that the contract to insure was complete before they mailed the policy to Breck. Their telegraphic despatch, dated on the 15th of March, says "risk not taken when burnt; return policy when received." This necessarily implies that the risk was taken, but taken after the fire. Breck had no authority to insure. After the proposals were accepted by the company, they made out the policies, and sent them to Breck to deliver; so that it appears, by the case, that before they mailed the policy to Breck, they must have received the premium and accepted the risk, and thus completed the contract to insure. If the case had gone no further, and no policy had ever been made out, it is well settled that the plaintiff could have sued them upon this contract at law or forced from them a policy in equity. Perkins v. Washington Ins. Co., 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 660; Hamilton v. Lycoming Ins. Co., 5 Pa. 339; Angell on Fire Ins. §§ 34, 47; Union Mutual v. Commercial Mutual (March, 1856) 18 Law Rep. 610, Fed. Cas. No. 14,372.

Under these circumstances, a policy drawn up and signed by the proper officers wants no further delivery. It is a vital policy as soon as signed, becomes instantly the property of the insured, and is held by the insurer for his use. Ang. on Fire Ins. § 33, 31; Pim v. Reed, 6 Man. & Grang. 1; Kohne v. Insurance Co., 1 Wash. C. C. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 7,920.

But here were further acts of delivery of the policy. It was, on the 13th of March, mailed and sent to Breck, to deliver to the plaintiff. This was sending it to the plaintiff by Breck. Breck and the mail were only the vehicles to carry it to him. It was the same thing as if mailed or sent directly to the plaintiff. The defendants suggest, in answer, that Breck was their agent, and that, by sending it to him, they did not part with the possession of the policy, and that they only gave authority to Breck to deliver, which they could and did revoke before actual delivery. But when they mailed the policy to Breck to deliver, they did not constitute him their agent, to receive or keep it for them, nor to retain it as their agent. He was, in that regard, no agent of theirs; he had nothing further to do for them. By sending him the policy to deliver, they made Breck trustee for the plaintiff; they made it a deposit with Breck to the credit of the plaintiff. It was a delivery to Breck to deliver to the plaintiff, which was a good delivery to the plaintiff. Shep. Touch. 58. This is not a question of the authority or acts of an agent; but whether the defendants, by sending the policy to Breck to deliver, did an overt act intended to signify that the policy should have a present vitality. This certainly was such an act. Without any further interference on their part, it would have resulted in actual delivery to the plaintiff. It was intended to signify to the plaintiff not only that the policy was a present contract, but to effect an actual delivery of it to him.[44] Kentucky Mutual Ins. Co. v. Jenks, 5 Ind. 96; Hamilton v. Lycoming Ins. Co., 5 Pa. 339; Tayloe v. Merchants Fire Ins. Co., 9 How. 390, 13 L. Ed. 187.

Suppose the defendants had retained the policy, and had merely told Breck to tell the plaintiff that they held the policy subject to the plaintiff's order, would they not have been deemed as holding the policy for the plaintiff?

The defendants next suggest that the plaintiff was ignorant of their acceptance of the risk, of their making out and mailing the policy to Breck until after they had countermanded its delivery, and that the aggregatio mentium could not take place until after the acceptance of the proposition by the defendants came to the plaintiff's knowledge, and that before that, the defendants had changed their own minds, so that in fact it never did take place, and that consequently there was no legal delivery of this policy.

This involves the more general question, does a contract arise when an overt act is done intended to signify the acceptance of a specific proposition, or not until that overt act comes to the knowledge of the proposer? This question may arise upon every mode of negotiating a contract, whether the parties be in each other's presence or not. First comes the mental resolve to accept the proposition; but the law can only recognize an overt act. Whether that act be a word spoken, a telegraphic sign, or a letter mailed, some interval of time, more or less appreciable, must intervene between the doing of the act and its coming to the knowledge of the party to whom it is addressed. In the mean time, what is the condition of affairs? Is it a contract or no contract? If the bidder does not see the auctioneer's hammer fall; if the article written for and sent never arrives; if the verbal answer, when the parties are in each other's presence, is in a foreign tongue, or by sudden noise or distraction is not heard; if the telegraphic circuit is broken; if the mail miscarries; if the word spoken or the letter sent is overtaken, and countermanded by the electric current, is there no contract? In the progress of the negotiation, at what precise point of time does mind meet mind, does the contract spring into life?

Upon this subject, with respect to negotiations conducted by written communications, there has been some variety of decision, but it appears to me that the weight of authority, as well as reason and necessity, admit of but one solution.

The meeting of two minds, the aggregatio mentium necessary to the constitution of every contract, must take place eo instanti with the doing of any overt act intended to signify to the other party the acceptance of the proposition, without regard to when that act comes to the knowledge of the other party; everything else must be question of proof or of the binding force of the contract by matters subsequent. The overt act may be as various as the form and nature of contracts. It may be by the fall of the hammer, by words spoken, by letter, by telegraph, by remitting the article sent for, by mutual signing or by delivery of the paper, and the delivery may be by any act intended to signify that the instrument shall have a present vitality. Whatever the form, the act done is the irrevocable evidence of the aggregatio mentium; at that instant the bargain is struck. The acceptor can no more overtake and countermand by telegraph, his letter mailed, than he can his words of acceptance after they have issued from his lips on their way to the hearer.[45] If the two minds do not meet eo instanti with the act signifying acceptance, when can they, in the nature of things, ever approach each other more closely? The defendants say, when the act of acceptance comes to the knowledge of the other party. But this knowledge would be a fact without any force, unless we suppose in the proposer a power still of electing not to accept the acceptance. But if we do this, it is apparent that the negotiation is yet precisely in the same stage of development it was in when the first proposition was waiting upon the first answer. The notion that there is no contract until the acceptance comes to the knowledge of the other party, proceeds upon the ground, in the first place, that the proposal has been withdrawn or lost its force, which is against the intent of the parties and the necessities of the case; and in the second place, upon the ground that the answer is conditional, whereas, we suppose it to be absolute. We suppose the acceptor to say not simply I agree, but to say I agree if you do, which requires an answer from the proposer; so that the minds do not meet till he answers. But in the mean time the acceptor may have changed his mind, and for the same reason as before, there is no bargain until this last answer comes to the knowledge of the other party; and so, upon this theory, it must go on ad infinitum without the possibility of the aggregatio mentium ever taking place. There is in fact no difference between the acceptance of a proposition by word of mouth and a letter stating an acceptance. In the one case it is articulate sounds carried by the air, in the other, written signs carried by the mail or by telegraph. The vital question is, was the intention manifested by any overt act, not by what kind of messenger it

45 The French courts say there is still a power to countermand. In S—— v. F——, Merlin, Rép. de Jur. (1813) tit. Vente, 1, art. III, No. XI bis, the court said: "A man has in his cabinet an acoustic vault, constructed in such a manner that, by reason of the various and extremely multiplied windings of the tubes which compose it, the words transmitted through one of the extremities do not reach the other till after a space of five minutes. I am in the presence of that man, and in his cabinet in question. There, after saying to me: Will you buy of me such a thing for such a sum? he adds: Answer me by my acoustic vault. Thereupon we take our places, I at one of the extremities of his vault, he at the other and I say to him by this speaking trumpet: I will. But a minute after I change my resolution; I run to him, and before he has been able to hear my answer, I say to him: I will not. Could he, after having heard the answer which I made to him at first by his acoustic vault, pretend that this answer having been transmitted to him by tubes of which he was proprietor, and having consequently become his property at the very instant that it left my mouth, I could not retract it before it had struck his ear? No, emphatically no; a hundred times no!" From Langdell's Cases on Contracts.

To the same effect is In re Bouton, Journal du Palais (1902), II, 174. But see Aubry et Rau (4th Ed.) t. 4, 294, 295, § 343; Baudry-Lacantinerie et Barde, Des Oblig. (2d Ed.) t. 1, n. 37.

The following rule appears to be reasonable and just, although not supported as to the second part by any judicial decisions: The offeror's power of revocation is extinguished as soon as the offeree has performed a requested or otherwise reasonable act of acceptance; the offeree has the power of revocation until, and only until, the offeror learns that the act of acceptance has been performed.

was sent. The bargain, if ever struck at all, must be eo instanti with such overt act. Mailing a letter containing an acceptance, or the instrument itself intended for the other party, is certainly such an act. Adams v. Lindsell, 1 B. & Ald. 681; Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381; Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225; Potter v. Saunders, 6 Hare, 1; Tayloe v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 9 How. 390, 13 L. Ed. 187; Hamilton v. Lycoming Ins. Co., 5 Pa. 339; Vassar v. Camp, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 341; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Kentucky Mutual v. Jenks, 5 Ind. 96. This last case, in all its essential features is identical with the one before us.

The only English case sustaining the defendants in their view, that I have seen, is that of Cooke v. Oxley, 3 Term R. 653, which it will be perceived, by the above references, has been effectually overruled in their courts.

In the state of New York, the case of Frith v. Lawrence, 1 Paige, 434, was reversed in their Court of Errors by a very large vote. Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 111, 21 Am. Dec. 262, and the doctrine sustained as contended for by the plaintiff.

The only other American case on this side of the question is that of McCulloch v. Eagle Ins. Co., 1 Pick. (Mass.) 278. This last is against the whole current of authorities both in England and in this country, and appears to me requires for the creation of a contract a fact without significance, or a condition that would render its creation impossible.

Let judgment be entered on the verdict for the plaintiff.

BISHOP v. EATON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1894. 161 Mass. 496, 37 N. E. 665, 42 Am. St. Rep. 437.)

Contract, on a guaranty. Writ dated February 2d, 1892. Trial in the Superior Court without a jury, before Braley, J., who found the following facts:

The plaintiff in 1886 was a resident of Sycamore in the State of Illinois, and was to some extent connected in business with Harry H. Eaton, a brother of the defendant. In December, 1886, the defendant in a letter to the plaintiff said, "If Harry needs more money, let him have it, or assist him to get it, and I will see that it is paid."

On January 7th, 1887, Harry Eaton gave his promissory note for two hundred dollars to one Stark, payable in one year. The plaintiff signed the note as surety, relying on the letter of the defendant, and looked to the defendant solely for reimbursement, if called upon to pay the note. Shortly afterward the plaintiff wrote to the defendant a letter stating that the note had been given and its amount, and deposited the letter in the mail at Sycamore, postage prepaid, and properly addressed to the defendant at his home in Nova Scotia.

The letter, according to the testimony of the defendant, was never received by him. At the maturity of the note the time for its payment was extended for a year, but whether with the knowledge or consent of the defendant was in dispute. In August, 1889, in an interview between them, the plaintiff asked the defendant to take up the note still outstanding, and pay it, to which the defendant replied: "Try to get Harry to pay it. If he don't, I will. It shall not cost you anything."

On October 1st, 1891, the plaintiff paid the note, and thereafter made no effort to collect it from Harry Eaton, the maker. The defendant testified that he had no notice of the payment of the note by the plaintiff until December 22d, 1891.

The defendant requested the judge to rule: 1. The letter of the defendant constituted in law no more than an offer of guaranty. 2. The defendant did not become bound by a contract of guaranty unless it appeared from a preponderance of the evidence that, within a reasonable time after his offer was accepted and acted upon, he had notice of such acceptance, and the giving of credit thereon. 3. The mere deposit in the mail of a letter accepting an offer of guaranty which has been made by mail, such letter being properly stamped and addressed to the party making the offer, and mailed within a reasonable time after the acceptance, does not in law constitute such notice to the latter as thereupon to bind him. 4. The defendant did not become bound by a contract of guaranty, if at all, unless he actually received such letter of acceptance. 5. A delay for two years and a half after accepting and acting upon an offer of guaranty to give notice to the person making the offer is an unreasonable delay. 7. If for a year and a half after the maturity of the note and the default of payment by the maker, the defendant had no notice of the default, he was discharged from his contract unless he subsequently waived his rights arising from the plaintiff's laches.

The judge declined so to rule, and ruled, as matter of law upon the findings of fact, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and ordered judgment for him; and the defendant alleged exceptions.[46]

KNOWLTON, J. * * * The defendant requested many rulings in regard to the law applicable to contracts of guaranty, most of which it becomes necessary to consider. The language relied on was an offer to guarantee, which the plaintiff might or might not accept. Without acceptance of it there was no contract, because the offer was conditional and there was no consideration for the promise. But this was not a proposition which was to become a contract only upon the giving of a promise for the promise, and it was not necessary that the plaintiff should accept it in words, or promise to do anything before acting upon it. It was an offer which was to become effective as a contract upon the doing of the act referred to. It was an offer to be bound in consideration of an act to be done, and in such a case the doing of the act constitutes the acceptance of the offer and furnishes the consideration. Ordinarily there is no occasion to notify the offerer of the acceptance of such an offer, for the doing of the act is a sufficient acceptance, and the promisor knows that he is bound when he sees that action has been taken on the faith of his offer. But if the act is of such a kind that knowledge of it will not quickly come to the promisor, the promisee is bound to give him notice of his acceptance within a reasonable time after doing that which constitutes the acceptance. In such a case it is implied in the offer that, to complete the contract, notice shall be given with due diligence, so that the promisor may know that a contract has been made. But where the promise is in consideration of an act to be done, it becomes binding upon the doing of the act so far that the promisee cannot be affected by a subsequent withdrawal of it, if within a reasonable time afterward he notifies the promisor. In accordance with these principles, it has been held in cases like the present, where the guarantor would not know of himself, from the nature of the transaction, whether the offer has been accepted or not, that he is not bound without notice of the acceptance, seasonably given after the performance which constitutes the consideration. Babcock v. Bryant, 12 Pick. 133; Whiting v. Stacy, 15 Gray, 270; Schlessinger v. Dickinson, 5 Allen, 47.

In the present case the plaintiff seasonably mailed a letter to the defendant, informing him of what he had done in compliance with the defendant's request, but the defendant testified that he never received it, and there is no finding that it ever reached him. The judge ruled, as matter of law, that upon the facts found, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the question is thus presented whether the defendant was bound by the acceptance when the letter was properly mailed, although he never received it.

When an offer of guaranty of this kind is made, the implication is that notice of the act which constitutes an acceptance of it shall be given in a reasonable way. What kind of a notice is required depends upon the nature of the transaction, the situation of the parties, and the inferences fairly to be drawn from their previous dealings, if any, in regard to the matter. If they are so situated that communication by letter is naturally to be expected, then the deposit of a letter in the mail is all that is necessary. If that is done which is fairly to be contemplated from their relations to the subject-matter and from their course of dealing, the rights of the parties are fixed, and a failure actually to receive the notice will not affect the obligation of the guarantor.

The plaintiff in the case now before us resided in Illinois, and the defendant in Nova Scotia. The offer was made by letter, and the defendant must have contemplated that information in regard to the plaintiff's acceptance or rejection of it would be by letter. It would be a harsh rule which would subject the plaintiff to the risk of the defendant's failure to receive the letter giving notice of his action on the faith of the offer. We are of opinion that the plaintiff, after assisting Harry to get the money, did all that he was required to do when he seasonably sent the defendant the letter by mail informing him of what had been done.

How far such considerations are applicable to the case of an ordinary contract made by letter, about which some of the early decisions are conflicting, we need not now consider. * * *

Exceptions sustained.[47]

[47] There are many apparently conflicting cases as to whether a guarantor is bound in the absence of any notice by the creditor. See Ames' Cases on Suretyship, p. 225 et seq.

Offer by Creditor.—If the offer is made by the creditor to the surety, the latter must usually give notice of his acceptance, because he is asked for a promise; but no further notice by the creditor is necessary. Stauffer v. Koch, 225 Mass. 525, 114 N. E. 750 (1917). It is often said that, when the guaranty is given at the creditor's request, the creditor need give no notice of acceptance. Peck v. Precision Mach. Co., 20 Ga. App. 429, 93 S. E. 106 (1917); Hibernia Bank & Trust Co. v. Succession of Cancienne, 140 La. 969, 74 South. 267, L. R. A. 1917D, 402 (1917). Contra: Evans v. McCormick, 167 Pa. 247, 31 Atl. 563 (1895).

Offer by Guarantor.—(1) Promise for Act. The offer by the guarantor must of necessity be an offer of a promise. He may request a non-promissory act in return. (a) This act may be the giving of credit to the principal debtor. The doing of this act (giving credit to M.) is the acceptance of the offer, and no notice should be required. Lennox v. Murphy, 171 Mass. 370, 50 N. E. 644 (1898), "there is no universal doctrine of the common law that acceptance of an offer must be communicated in order to make a valid simple contract"; Bishop v. Eaton, supra; Powers v. Bumcratz, 12 Ohio St. 273 (1861); Eddowes v. Niell, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 133, 1 L. Ed. 772 (1793); Siegel v. Baily, 252 Pa. 231, 97 Atl. 401 (1916). Contra: Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Richards, 115 U. S. 524, 6 Sup. Ct. 173, 29 L. Ed. 480 (1885); Great Western Mfg. Co. v. Porter, 103 Kan. 84, 172 Pac. 1018 (1918); Balfour v. Knight, 86 Or. 165, 167 Pac. 484 (1917); Birmingham News Co. v. Read, 200 Ala. 655, 77 South. 29 (1917); Northern Nat. Bank v. Douglas, 135 Minn. 81, 160 N. W. 193 (1916); Mozley v. Tinkler (Exch.) 1 Cr., M. & R. 692 (1835). The guarantor's duty to pay may still be subject to a constructive condition precedent that some notice be given. This may be notice that the requested credit has been given, or that the balance due is some specific amount, or that there has been default. See Bishop v. Eaton, supra; Black v. Grabow, 216 Mass. 516, 104 N. E. 346, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 569 (1914); Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Richards, 115 U. S. 524, 6 Sup. Ct. 173, 29 L. Ed. 480 (1885); Evans v. McCormick, 167 Pa. 247, 31 Atl. 563 (1895); De Cremer v. Anderson, 113 Mich. 578, 71 N. W. 1090 (1897). Even before this notice, however, it is too late for the guarantor to withdraw; he is bound by a conditional contract. (b) The act requested may be the payment of money to the guarantor. The performance of this act involves notice perhaps; certainly no other notice is required. Davis v. Wells, 104 U. S. 159, 26 L. Ed. 686 (1881).

(2) Promise under Seal. The guaranty offered may be a sealed document. In such case it is binding as soon as delivered to the creditor or his representative. No notice is necessary, except possibly as a condition precedent to the secondary obligation, as explained above. See Davis v. Wells, supra; Powers v. Bumcratz, supra.

(3) Promise for a Promise. If the offer contemplates the undertaking of a return duty by the creditor, thus empowering the latter to make only a bilateral contract, a notice of acceptance will nearly always be necessary to the formation of a contract.

WHEELER v. McSTAY et al.

Action in equity to enforce performance of contract for conveyance of real estate. Petition dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

WEAVER, C. J.[48] The case made by the plaintiff is substantially as follows: Plaintiff being the owner of a quarter section of land in North Dakota and a house and lot in Waverly, Iowa, and the defendant F. E. McStay being the owner of certain other real estate in Waterloo, Iowa, said parties under date of January 25, 1911, at said city of Waterloo, entered into a written agreement for the exchange or mutual transfer of said properties on terms therein named, subject, however, to the following stipulations: "The party of the second part is to have 30 days from date in which to examine the properties described above as being owned by first party, and this contract is not to become binding upon said second party until the expiration of said 30 days unless such time is waived by said party. At the end of 30 days this contract is to become binding upon said party unless he sooner notifies first party, in writing, of his intention to abandon and cancel the same. In case this contract becomes binding upon both parties hereto in the manner above stated, then said parties are each to deliver to the other good and sufficient warranty deeds to their respective properties, and abstracts of title to the same showing clear and merchantable title thereto, except, of course, the mortgages above referred to, which are liens against the North Dakota property conveyed by first party and the Waterloo property conveyed by second party. Deeds and abstracts to be exchanged within a reasonable time after this contract becomes binding on both parties hereto."

The making of the alleged agreement is conceded, but the defendant contends that, within the time stipulated, he notified the plaintiff, in writing, of his election to abandon the deal, and that no enforceable contract was ever completed between them. The defendant as a witness testifies that late in the evening of February 24, 1911, at Waterloo, Iowa, he wrote a letter to the plaintiff informing him of his intention to abandon the contract, which letter he addressed to plaintiff at Waverly, Iowa, the place of his residence, and, having duly sealed and stamped the same, deposited it in a street or hotel letter box provided for such purposes by the United States. The letter itself, being produced, appears to bear the date of February 24, 1911, but the postmark stamped thereon is dated February 25, 9 a. m., 1911, while the Waverly postmark shows its receipt at that office February 25, 11:30 a. m., 1911. It was actually received by the plaintiff about 3 o'clock p. m. of the 25th. Upon the facts thus briefly stated, the trial court found plaintiff not entitled to the relief asked.

[48] The dissenting opinion of Evans, J., is omitted.

The first and principal question presented by the record is whether the defendant signified his election to abandon the contract in such time and in such manner as to relieve himself from obligation to perform the same. It appears that, while the terms of the exchange were agreed upon and reduced to writing, the defendant was given 30 days in which to examine and satisfy himself as to the Dakota property, with the option on his part to withdraw from the transaction at any time within 30 days from the date of the writing. As expressed by the instrument itself, it was not to become binding upon the defendant "until the expiration of said 30 days," unless such time was waived by him. It then provides that: "At the end of 30 days this contract is to become binding upon said second party unless he sooner notifies the first party in writing of his intention to abandon and cancel the same."

It is the theory of the appellee, and such is said by counsel to have been the view of the trial court, that when properly construed the contract gives to the defendant the full period of 30 days to examine the property, and that a notice of his refusal to proceed farther, given with reasonable promptness after the expiration of that period, would be timely and relieve him from liability. To reach this conclusion, we must ignore the provision by which at the "end of 30 days" the contract was to become binding upon the defendant, "unless he sooner notified first party, in writing, of his intention to abandon the same." But counsel say the writing also provides that defendant shall have 30 days from date in which to examine the property, and, as this privilege continues up to the last hour of the thirtieth day, it could not have been meant that he must exercise his option or election before that period expired. These provisions, it is argued, are so far repugnant or at least so obscure as to justify the construction by which notice within reasonable time after the expiration of the stated period may be held sufficient.

We are disposed to the view, however, that this reading requires too great a strain upon the court's power of construction. The language of the writing is not at all obscure. It provides, in fairly clear terms, for a period of 30 days in which the bargain or agreement shall remain tentative only. Within that time defendant was at liberty to satisfy himself concerning the property he was to receive in the exchange, and, unless he "sooner gave notice" of his withdrawal from the deal, the agreement was to become obligatory upon him "at the end of 30 days." In other words, to avoid the binding effect of the contract, he was required to reach his decision and to notify plaintiff thereof in writing, both before the expiration of 30 days. Notice given after that period had elapsed would be unavailing. Such also appears to have been the practical interpretation which defendant appears to have put upon his agreement. He says he had investigated the property and decided not to proceed with the exchange three days before the time expired, but, because of other business engagements, he neglected to give the notice until late in the evening of the last day, when he endeavored to do so in the manner indicated.

But one other debatable proposition remains. Assuming that defendant mailed his letter of withdrawal, as he says he did, by depositing it in a mail box at 10 o'clock in the evening of February 24, 1911, and that such letter reached the hand of plaintiff at Waverly on the afternoon of the following day, does this constitute a notice within the 30-day period? Excluding the day on which the writing bears date, the period of 30 days would expire with the close of February 24, 1911. To hold such notice sufficient it must be on the theory that the deposit of the letter in the mail box is the legal equivalent of placing it in the hands of the plaintiff. That a contract may result from an offer by mail or telegraph and an acceptance communicated by similar means, and that the contract obligation dates from the time of mailing or dispatching the acceptance, is of course familiar doctrine. But where parties by agreement condition the acquirement or loss of contract rights upon the giving of a notice within the specified period, not prescribing the manner or means of the delivery thereof, we think there is no rule or precedent to the effect that the mailing of such notice operates as a delivery or service from the time of its deposit in the post office. For instance, if A. lets his house to B. under an agreement by which the latter is to vacate the premises upon a week's written notice from the former, no court would be disposed to hold, in the absence of an express or implied stipulation to that effect, that such notice, sent by mail, would be of any avail to terminate the tenancy until its actual receipt by the lessee.

The cases distinctly in point are not very numerous, but they are sufficient to show that the distinction between cases of this character and those where the question at issue is an acceptance of an offer of purchase or sale has received judicial recognition. See Burhans v. Corey, 17 Mich. 282, in which it is held that a person entitled to notice, where there is no stipulation or consent for its delivery by mail or other specially named means, is not bound by such notice until it is actually received. So also it has been held in Vermont that one who has undertaken to give notice within a specified number of days does not comply with his obligation by depositing notice in the post office at the close of the last day of the stipulated period, too late to be forwarded or delivered within the time named. Field v. Mann, 42 Vt. 68. This authority is quite in point upon the facts in the case at bar.

A similar holding is to be found in Society v. Reed, 42 Vt. 76. In Association v. Schauss, 148 Ill. 304, 35 N. E. 747, the court, speaking with reference to a contract requirement of notice, coupled with a provision that "notice sent to the last address given shall be considered legal notification," says: "As there is no provision in the Constitution to the effect that the service of notice shall date from the time of mailing, it can only date from the time of its actual receipt by the member to whom it is addressed, or at least until sufficient time has elapsed to enable it to reach him in due course of mail." Upon the same subject it is said by the Massachusetts court that: "Ordinarily when the demand must be made or notice given merely posting the document or notice in the mail would not be a communication to the person addressed and would be ineffectual unless the same be received." Shea v. Association, 160 Mass. 289, 35 N. E. 855, 39 Am. St. Rep. 475. Any other rule would be unreasonable and productive of frequent unjust results. It follows that we must hold that there was a clear failure on the part of the defendant to give notice of his withdrawal from the contract within the time limited therefor, and that the contract became and is a binding and enforceable obligation.

For the reasons stated, the decree below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for the entry of a decree in accordance with the views here expressed.

SECTION 6.—SILENCE AS ACCEPTANCE

ROYAL INS. CO. v. BEATTY.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1888. 119 Pa. 6, 12 Atl. 607, 4 Am. St. Rep. 622.)

Error to Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia County.

This was an action by William Beatty against the Royal Insurance Company, on a policy of fire insurance, averring a renewal, and that it was in force at the time of the fire. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

GREEN, J. We find ourselves unable to discover any evidence of a contractual relation between the parties to this litigation. The contract alleged to exist was not founded upon any writing nor upon any words, nor upon any act done by the defendant. It was founded alone upon silence. While it must be conceded that circumstances may exist which will impose a contractual obligation by mere silence, yet it must be admitted that such circumstances are exceptional in their character, and of extremely rare occurrence. We have not been furnished with a perfect instance of the kind by the counsel on either side of the present case. Those cited for defendant in error had some other element in them than mere silence which contributed to the establishment of the relation. But, in any point of view, it is difficult to understand how a legal liability can arise out of mere silence of the party sought to be affected, unless he was subject to a duty of speech, which was neglected, to the harm of the other party. If there was no duty of speech, there could be no harmful omission arising from mere silence.

Take the present case as an illustration. The alleged contract was a contract of fire insurance. The plaintiff held two policies against the defendant, but they had expired before the loss occurred, and had not been formally renewed. At the time of the fire the plaintiff held no policy against the defendant. But he claims that the defendant agreed to continue the operation of the expired policies by what he calls "binding" them. How does he prove this? He calls a clerk who took the two policies in question, along with other policies of another person, to the agent of the defendant to have them renewed, and this is the account he gives of what took place: "The Royal Company had some policies to be renewed, and I went in and bound them. Question. State what was said and done. Answer. I went into the office of the Royal Company, and asked them to bind the two policies of Mr. Beatty expiring to-morrow. The Court. Who were the policies for? A. For Mr. Beatty. The Court. That is your name, is it not? A. Yes, sir. These were the policies in question. I renewed the policies of Mr. Priestly up to the 1st of April. There was nothing more said about the Beatty policies at that time. The Court. What did they say? A. They did not say anything, but I suppose that they went to their books to do it. They commenced to talk about the night privilege, and that was the only subject discussed." In his further examination he was asked: "Question. Did you say anything about those policies [Robert Beatty's] at that time? Answer. No, sir; I only spoke of the two policies for William Beatty. Q. What did you say about them? A. I went in and said, 'Mr. Skinner, will you renew the Beatty policies, and the night privilege for Mr. Priestly?' and that ended it. Q. Were the other companies bound in the same way? A. Yes, sir; and I asked the Royal Company to bind Mr. Beatty."

The foregoing is the whole of the testimony for the plaintiff as to what was actually said at the time when it is alleged the policies were bound. It will be perceived that all that the witness says is that he asked the defendant's agent to bind the two policies, as he states at first, or to renew them, as he says last. He received no answer; nothing was said, nor was anything done. How is it possible to make a contract out of this? It is not as if one declares or states a fact in the presence of another, and the other is silent. If the declaration imposed a duty of speech on peril of an inference from silence, the fact of silence might justify the inference of an admission of the truth of the declared fact. It would then be only a question of hearing, which would be chiefly, if not entirely, for the jury. But here the utterance was a question, and not an assertion; and there was no answer to the question. Instead of silence being evidence of an agreement to do the thing requested, it is evidence, either that the question was not heard, or that it was not intended to comply with the request. Especially is this the case when, if a compliance was intended, the request would have been followed by an actual doing of the thing requested. But this was not done; how, then, can it be said it was agreed to be done? There is literally nothing upon which to base the inference of an agreement, upon such a state of facts. Hence the matter is for the court, and not for the jury; for, if there may not be an inference of the controverted fact, the jury must not be permitted to make it.

What has thus far been said relates only to the effect of the non-action of the defendant, either in responding, or doing the thing requested. There remains for consideration the effect of the plaintiff's non-action. When he asked the question whether defendant would bind or renew the policies, and obtained no answer, what was his duty? Undoubtedly, to repeat his question until he obtained an answer; for his request was that the defendant should make a contract with him, and the defendant says nothing. Certainly, such silence is not an assent in any sense. There should be something done, or else something said, before it is possible to assume that a contract was established. There being nothing done and nothing said, there is no footing upon which an inference of agreement can stand. But what was the position of the plaintiff? He had asked the defendant to make a contract with him, and the defendant had not agreed to do so; he had not even answered the question whether he would do so. The plaintiff knew he had obtained no answer, but he does not repeat the question; he, too, is silent thereafter, and he does not get the thing done which he asks to be done. Assuredly, it was his duty to speak again, and to take further action, if he really intended to obtain the defendant's assent; for what he wanted was something affirmative and positive, and without it he has no status. But he desists, and does and says nothing further.

And so it is that the whole of the plaintiff's case is an unanswered request to the defendant to make a contract with the plaintiff, and no further attempt by the plaintiff to obtain an answer, and no actual contract made. Out of such facts it is not possible to make a legal inference of a contract. The other facts proved, and offered to be proved, but rejected, improperly as we think, and supposed by each to be consistent with his theory, tend much more strongly in favor of the defendant's theory than of the plaintiff's. It is not necessary to discuss them, since the other views we have expressed are fatal to the plaintiff's claim. Nor do I concede that if defendant heard plaintiff's request, and made no answer, an inference of assent should be made; for the hearing of a request, and not answering it, is as consistent, indeed more consistent with a dissent than an assent. If one is asked for alms on the street, and hears the request, but makes no answer, it certainly cannot be inferred that he intends to give them. In the present case there is no evidence that defendant heard the plaintiff's request, and, without hearing, there was of course no duty of speech.

DAY v. CATON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1876. 119 Mass. 513, 20 Am. Rep. 347.)

Contract to recover the value of one-half of a brick party wall built by the plaintiff.

The defendant requested the judge to rule that: "(1) The plaintiff can recover in this case only upon an express agreement. (2) If the jury find there was no express agreement about the wall, but the defendant knew that the plaintiff was building upon land in which the defendant had an equitable interest, the defendant's rights would not be affected by such knowledge, and his silence and subsequent use of the wall would raise no implied promise to pay anything for the wall."

The judge refused so to rule, but instructed the jury as follows: "A promise would not be implied from the fact that the plaintiff, with the defendant's knowledge, built the wall and the defendant used it, but it might be implied from the conduct of the parties. If the jury find that the plaintiff undertook and completed the building of the wall with the expectation that the defendant would pay him for it, and the defendant had reason to know that the plaintiff was so acting with that expectation, and allowed him so to act without objection, then the jury might infer a promise on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff."

There was a verdict for the plaintiff. Defendant alleged exceptions.[51]

DEVENS, J. The ruling that a promise to pay for the wall would not be implied from the fact that the plaintiff, with the defendant's knowledge, built the wall, and that the defendant used it, was substantially in accordance with the request of the defendant, and is conceded to have been correct. ister, 4 Mass. 514; Knowlton v. Plantation No. 4, 14 Me. 20; Davis v. School Dist., 24 Me. 349.

The defendant, however, contends that the presiding judge incorrectly ruled that such promise might be inferred from the fact that the plaintiff undertook and completed the building of the wall with the expectation that the defendant would pay him for it, the defendant having reason to know that the plaintiff was acting with that expectation, and allowed him thus to act without objection.

The fact that the plaintiff expected to be paid for the work would certainly not be sufficient of itself to establish the existence of a contract, when the question between the parties was whether one was made. Taft v. Dickinson, 6 Allen, 553. It must be shown that in some manner the party sought to be charged assented to it. If a party, however, voluntarily accepts and avails himself of valuable services rendered for his benefit, when he has the option whether to accept or reject them, even if there is no distinct proof that they were rendered by his authority or request, a promise to pay for them may be inferred. His knowledge that they were valuable, and his exercise of the option to avail himself of them, justify this inference. Abbot v. Hermon, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 118; Hayden v. Madison, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 76. And when one stands by in silence, and sees valuable services rendered upon his real estate by the erection of a structure (of which he must necessarily avail himself afterwards in his proper use thereof), such silence, accompanied with the knowledge on his part that the party rendering the services expects payment therefor, may fairly be treated as evidence of an acceptance of it, and as tending to show an agreement to pay for it.

The maxim, "Qui tacet consentire videtur," is to be construed indeed as applying only to those cases where the circumstances are such that a party is fairly called upon either to deny or admit his liability. But, if silence may be interpreted as assent where a proposition is made to one which he is bound to deny or admit, so also it may be if he is silent in the face of facts which fairly call upon him to speak. Lamb v. Bunce, 4 Maule & S. 275; Connor v. Hackley, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 613; Preston v. Linen Co., 119 Mass. 400.

If a person saw day after day a laborer at work in his field doing services, which must of necessity inure to his benefit, knowing that the laborer expected pay for his work, when it was perfectly easy to notify him if his services were not wanted, even if a request were not expressly proved, such a request, either previous to or contemporaneous with the performance of the services, might fairly be inferred. But if the fact was merely brought to his attention upon a single occasion and casually, if he had little opportunity to notify the other that he did not desire the work and should not pay for it, or could only do so at the expense of much time and trouble, the same inference might not be made. The circumstances of each case would necessarily determine whether silence with a knowledge that another was doing valuable work for his benefit, and with the expectation of payment indicated that consent which would give rise to the inference of a contract. The question would be one for the jury, and to them it was properly submitted in the case before us by the presiding judge.

AUSTIN v. BURGE.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. 1911. 156 Mo. App. 286, 137 S. W. 618.)

Action by O. D. Austin against Charles Burge. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

ELLISON, J. This action was brought on an account for the subscription price of a newspaper. The judgment in the trial court was for the defendant. It appears that plaintiff was publisher of a newspaper in Butler, Mo., and that defendant's father-in-law subscribed for the paper, to be sent to defendant for two years, and that the father-in-law paid for it for that time. It was then continued to be sent to defendant, through the mail, for several years more. On two occasions defendant paid a bill presented for the subscription price, but each time directed it to be stopped. Plaintiff denies the order to stop, but for the purpose of the case we shall assume that defendant is correct. He testified that, notwithstanding the order to stop it, it was continued to be sent to him, and he continued to receive and read it, until finally he removed to another state.

We have not been cited to a case in this state involving the liability of a person who, though not having subscribed for a newspaper, continues to accept it by receiving it through the mail. There are, however, certain well-understood principles in the law of contracts that ought to solve the question. It is certain that one cannot be forced into contractual relations with another and that therefore he cannot, against his will, be made the debtor of a newspaper publisher. But it is equally certain that he may cause contractual relations to arise by necessary implication from his conduct. The law in respect to contractual indebtedness for a newspaper is not different from that relating to other things which have not been made the subject of an express agreement. Thus one may not have ordered supplies for his table, or other household necessities, yet if he continue to receive and use them, under circumstances where he had no right to suppose they were a gratuity, he will be held to have agreed, by implication, to pay their value. In this case defendant admits that, notwithstanding he ordered the paper discontinued at the time when he paid a bill for it, yet plaintiff continued to send it, and he continued to take it from the post office to his home. This was an acceptance and use of the property, and, there being no pretense that a gratuity was intended, an obligation arose to pay for it.

[52] Observe that in this and in the three succeeding cases the contract is unilateral, the only legal duty created being on the offeree, with the correlative right in the offeror. Such transactions are often described, somewhat inaccurately, as an offer of an act for a promise.

A case quite applicable to the facts here involved arose in Fogg v. Atheneum, 44 N. H. 115, 82 Am. Dec. 191. There the Independent Democrat newspaper was forwarded weekly by mail to the defendant from May 1, 1847, to May 1, 1849, when a bill was presented, which defendant objected to paying on the ground of not having subscribed. Payment was, however, finally made, and directions given to discontinue. The paper changed ownership, and the order to stop it was not known to the new proprietors for a year; but, after being notified of the order, they nevertheless continued to send it to defendant until 1860, a period of 11 years, and defendant continued to receive it through the post office. Payment was several times demanded during this time, but refused on the ground that there was no subscription. The court said that: "During this period of time the defendants were occasionally requested, by the plaintiff's agent, to pay their bill. The answer was, by the defendants, 'We are not subscribers to your newspaper.' But the evidence is the defendants used or kept the plaintiff's * * * newspapers, and never offered to return a number, as they reasonably might have done, if they would have avoided the liability to pay for them. Nor did they ever decline to take the newspapers from the post office." The defendant was held to have accepted the papers, and to have become liable for the subscription price by implication of law.

In Ward v. Powell, 3 Har. (Del.) 379, it was decided that an implied agreement to pay for a newspaper or periodical arose by the continued taking and accepting the paper from the post office, and that "if a party, without subscribing to a paper, declines taking it out of the post office, he cannot become liable to pay for it; and a subscriber may cease to be such at the end of the year, by refusing to take the papers from the post office, and returning them to the editor as notice of such determination." In Goodland v. Le Clair, 78 Wis. 176, 47 N. W. 268, it was held that if a person receives a paper from the post office for a year, without refusing or returning it, he was liable for the year's subscription. And a like obligation was held to arise in the case of Weatherby v. Bonham, 5 C. & P. 228.

The preparation and publication of a newspaper involves much mental and physical labor, as well as an outlay of money. One who accepts the paper, by continuously taking it from the post office, receives a benefit and pleasure arising from such labor and expenditure as fully as if he had appropriated any other product of another's labor, and by such act he must be held liable for the subscription price. On the defendant's own evidence, plaintiff should have recovered.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.[53]

HOBBS v. MASSASOIT WHIP CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1893. 158 Mass. 194, 33 N. E. 495.)

Contract, upon an account annexed for one hundred and eight dollars and fifty cents, for 2,350 eelskins sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. At the trial in the Superior Court, before Hammond, J., it appeared in evidence that the plaintiff lived in Saugus, and the defendant had its usual place of business in Westfield, and was engaged in the manufacture of whips.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.[54]

HOLMES, J. This is an action for the price of eelskins sent by the plaintiff to the defendant, and kept by the defendant some months, until they were destroyed. It must be taken that the plaintiff received no notice that the defendants declined to accept the skins. The case comes before us on exceptions to an instruction to the jury, that, whether there was any prior contract or not, if skins are sent to the defendant, and it sees fit, whether it has agreed to take them or not, to lie back, and to say nothing, having reason to suppose that the man who has sent them believes that it is taking them, since it says nothing about it, then, if it fails to notify, the jury would be warranted in finding for the plaintiff.

Standing alone, and unexplained, this proposition might seem to imply that one stranger may impose a duty upon another, and make him a purchaser, in spite of himself, by sending goods to him, unless he will take the trouble, and be at the expense, of notifying the sender that he will not buy. The case was argued for the defendant on that interpretation. But, in view of the evidence, we do not understand that to have been the meaning of the judge, and we do not think that the jury can have understood that to have been his meaning. The plaintiff was not a stranger to the defendant, even if there was no contract between them. He had sent eelskins in the same way four or five times before, and they had been accepted and paid for. On the defendant's testimony, it is fair to assume that, if it had admitted the eelskins to be over twenty-two inches in length, and fit for its business, as the plaintiff testified, and the jury found that they were, it would have accepted them; that this was understood by the plaintiff; and, indeed, that there was a standing offer to him for such skins. In such a condition of things, the plaintiff was warranted in sending the defendant skins conforming to the requirements, and even if the offer was not such that the contract was made as soon as skins corresponding to its terms were sent, sending them did impose on the defendant a duty to act about them; and silence on its part, coupled with a retention of the skins for an unreasonable time, might be found by the jury to warrant the plaintiff in assuming that they were accepted, and thus to amount to an acceptance. See Bushel v. Wheeler, 15 Q. B. 442; Benjamin on Sales, §§ 162–164; Taylor v. Dexter Engine Co., 146 Mass. 613, 615, 16 N. E. 462. The proposition stands on the general principle that conduct which imports acceptance or assent is acceptance or assent in the view of the law, whatever may have been the actual state of mind of the party—a principle sometimes lost sight of in the cases. F. O. EVANS PIANO CO. v. TULLY.

Suit by the F. O. Evans Piano Company against A. J. Tully. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment entered for plaintiff.

ETHRIDGE, J. Appellant, a piano dealer of Chicago, Ill., placed a piano with Tully, at Laurel, Miss., under a contract signed by Tully, which is substantially as follows:

"I accept your offer to try one of your Evans Artist Model Pianos. Without any obligation on my part to purchase, you may ship the piano ordered below. After testing the instrument for thirty days, if I decide to keep it, I will pay for it as stated below, and will sign your selling contract which is a part hereof. If I decide not to keep it, I will return the piano to the freight depot, subject to your order."

Then follows a description of the piano and the terms of sale, in which it was agreed to pay for the piano in monthly installments. The piano was shipped to Tully on this order. On December 31, Tully wrote that the music rolls had been received, but that the piano had not arrived, although he had phoned all the freight offices. On January 8, 1913, Tully wrote to the piano company that the piano had arrived that day in bad condition, there being some marks on the keys, and the player out of commission; that it seemed to have been roughly handled in transit. He also returned the freight bills and requested check to cover same, also requesting the piano company to have its agent call and look over the piano. On January 13th the piano company wrote Tully, acknowledging receipt of his letter of the 8th, and inclosing check for the freight bills, but returned the freight bills and asked that Tully have the agent mark on the freight bills that the piano was received in bad condition, so that damages could be collected from the carrier, and directed Tully to have the piano returned, if it could not be satisfactorily fixed, and another would be sent. It was also suggested that he get a piano tuner to look over the piano and see if it could be put in proper condition, and to send the bill to the piano company for payment. To this letter the appellee did not reply.

On February 28th the piano company again wrote Tully, asking him to have the piano fixed, and to have the freight bills marked by the agent so they could collect damages from the company. There was no reply to this letter, and on March 11th the piano company again wrote Tully along the same lines. No reply was made to this letter, and on March 19th the piano company wrote another letter along the same lines. On March 27th the company wrote another letter, to which no reply was received, and again on April 4th, 10th, 18th, and 28th, and May 6th. May 10th, Mrs. Tully, wife of appellee wrote the piano company, stating that they had been away from home for some time, and that the piano was in good hands while they were away, stating, also, that when the piano was received the player mechanism had dropped about 1½ inches and was resting on the keys or hammers, and that they had a tuner fix the same, who only had to straighten the bolts that supported the player, and which had been bent, for which there was no charge; that the piano needed tuning, but was otherwise all right, and stating that every one who saw the piano thought it was a beautiful instrument. On May 20th appellant replied to this letter and requested a signature to the contract and a remittance, but no answer was received to this letter. On June 29th appellant again wrote Tully, and again on August 12th. On August 14th Mrs. Tully wrote in reply to the letter of the 12th that she did not think the piano was what they wanted. On August 18th appellant replied to this letter, calling attention to its numerous letters in which appellee had been urged to either return the piano or sign the contract, and to have the freight bill marked by the agent, and stating that they could not take back the piano under the circumstances.

Appellee testifies, and also Evans of the piano company. Appellee contended in his testimony that the piano was not in good condition, and was not up to representations, etc. At the conclusion of the evidence, plaintiff requested a peremptory instruction, which was refused by the court. Appellant also requested an instruction that the defendant was under obligation to return the piano within a reasonable time after the 30-day trial period, to some common carrier or railroad for reshipment, and if the jury believed the defendant did not, within a reasonable time, return the piano, their verdict must be for the plaintiff, which was also refused.

We think that, under the contract, the appellee, defendant below, was under the duty to either accept the piano or return it to the depot of a common carrier at the end of a 30-day trial period, and as the proof shows there was no effort whatever to return the piano, and that the defendant below did not respond to the numerous letters of the plaintiff between January 13th and May 8th, he must be treated in law as having accepted the piano. The peremptory instruction for the appellant should therefore have been given. The judgment of the court below is accordingly reversed, and judgment will be entered here for the appellant.

Reversed, and judgment here.[56]

STEVENS, J. (dissenting).[57] A reversal of this case is based upon the claimed right of the piano company to a peremptory instruction. This expression of my views will be directed solely to this point. As I construe the one and only contract executed by Mr. Tully, it is an agreement merely to permit the Evans Piano Company to place one of their musical instruments in Tully's home to be tried or tested without any obligation whatever on the part of Mr. Tully to buy. This is the express language of the contract itself. It says:

"I accept your offer to try one of your Evans Artist Model pianos. Without any obligation on my part to purchase, you may ship the piano ordered below."

The primary condition upon which Mr. Tully permitted the piano to be installed in his home was stated in the language, "without any obligation on my part to purchase." There is another significant statement in this contract, and that is when appellee had tested the instrument and had decided to keep it he would then for the first time execute a contract of purchase. The language is, "if I decide to keep it, I will pay for it as stated below, and will sign your selling contract, which is a part hereof." If he decides to keep it he will then "sign your selling contract." This so-called "selling contract" does not seem to be incorporated in the record, and I do not know what its proposed Klaholt, 178 Mass. 141, 59 N. E. 756 (1901); Ostman v. Lee, 91 Conn. 731, 101 Atl. 23 (1917); Place v. McIlvain, 38 N. Y. 96, 97 Am. Dec. 777 (1868).

In Cole-McIntyre-Norfleet Co. v. Holloway, 141 Tenn. 679, 214 S. W. 817, 7 A. L. R. 1683 (1919), the traveling agent of the defendant called on the plaintiff and there solicited and received an "order" for 50 barrels of meal, to be delivered at buyer's option at any time within four months. The written order expressly stated that it was not to be binding on defendant until its acceptance at the home office. No word was sent by the defendant to the plaintiff; and two months later the plaintiff asked that the meal be shipped. Meantime meal had advanced 50 per cent. in value. The defendant refused to ship, saying that it had never accepted the order. The court held that there was a contract, saying: "We think it is the duty of a wholesale merchant, who sends out his drummers to solicit orders for perishable articles, and articles consumable in the use, to notify his customers within a reasonable time that the orders are not accepted; and if he fails to do so, and the proof shows that he had ample opportunity, silence for an unreasonable length of time will amount to an acceptance, if the offerer is relying upon him for the goods." See 29 Yale L. Jour. 441.

terms and provisions are. It was evidently a blank form or contract to be filled out later with the privilege to pay for the piano on the installment plan. It may also have made provision whereby the vendor retained title as security. The contract then which Tully signed was not a contract of purchase. The court now makes him take the piano, and compels him to assume the attitude of purchaser simply because Tully did not return the piano to the depot within such time as the court thinks reasonable.

The question of what was or was not a reasonable time was submitted to the jury under instructions from the court, and the jury by their verdict has found that Tully did not keep the piano an unreasonable length of time. There is indeed room to suspect that Mr. Tully did not act in the utmost good faith, or at least did not act diligently, but his testimony explains this. He says that when the piano arrived "it was in bad condition. It was badly torn up and broken in transit, and badly out of tune, too." He furthermore testifies that "it was not as represented. It was of very poor grade." This testimony on the part of the appellee is uncontradicted. It was offered to explain the necessity for having the piano repaired before a fair test could be made. Mr. Tully furthermore testifies that he notified the house of his dissatisfaction, and "asked twice for shipping instructions on it"; that they never gave any shipping instructions, but insisted upon his signing the contract of purchase, the very contract which the preliminary agreement contemplated. It is significant also that the tentative agreement nowhere states the terms of the trade, but leaves blank spaces unfilled. The purchaser had the right to pay cash within 30 days, and receive one kind of discount, or to pay cash in 60 days, and receive another and different discount, or the option to pay at $10 cash after 30 days and the balance at the rate of $10 a month.

The declaration here sues for the entire price, and it is nowhere intimated that Tully agreed to pay cash for the piano. There is, then, not only an absence of an agreement to buy at all, but especially an absence of any agreement to pay cash. As I see it, there is an absence of mutuality. It is shown that appellant had an agent in this territory, and that appellee requested that the agent call. Instead of the agent calling to see about the damage to the piano, and having the instrument tuned, the piano house was writing letters to Mr. Tully asking him to have this done, and at the same time asking that he sign the contract. The piano company at no time requested Tully to reship the piano, and at no time gave shipping instructions. They do not seem to have been interested in having the piano reshipped, but at all times were demanding an execution of the written contract of purchase. The contract which the correspondence asked Tully to sign gave him benefit of the monthly payment plan. This is sufficient to show that there was no definite agreement as to terms. The agreement, then, was simply an agreement to agree; an agreement to experiment with, to try or test. This being so, when Tully declined to execute any contract after the expiration of the 30-day period for trial, he should not be compelled to pay for the piano, and cannot be compelled to do so except upon the doctrine of estoppel.

Of course, if Tully had, after the 30 days, signified an acceptance, or had, as in some cases of this kind, attempted to sell the property as his own, an acceptance would be conclusively presumed and the purchaser would be liable. But there is no showing that Tully exercised actual ownership over the property inconsistent with his expressions of dissatisfaction. There is no evidence whatever that he even used the piano after he decided it was not up to representations and what he wanted. He swears that he not only wrote letters to the house offering to return and asking for shipping instructions, but he also offered to return the piano to appellant's attorney, Mr. Welch, and he kept up this offer on the trial of the case. * * * The opinion of the court forces Tully to buy a piano and piano player against his will.

JENNESS v. MT. HOPE IRON CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1864. 53 Me. 20.)

WALTON, J.[58] This is an action for an alleged breach of contract, and is before us on report. If so much of the plaintiff's evidence as is admissible, is sufficient, prima facie, to entitle him to damages, the case is to stand for trial; otherwise a nonsuit is to be entered.

The plaintiff says that the defendants bargained and sold to him three hundred and three kegs of nails, to be delivered at Bangor, before the close of navigation, in the fall of 1862.

The defendants do not deny that there was a negotiation for the sale of nails; but they deny that the negotiation ever ripened into a contract, by which the parties were bound; and the question is whether the evidence is sufficient, prima facie, to show such a contract; that is, a contract completed.

The negotiation was carried on by letter; and, omitting what is irrelevant and immaterial, amounts substantially to this:

Plaintiff, (Oct. 20, 1862:) "What will you sell me 450 kegs of nails for, delivered at Bangor, in the course of a month, cash down?"

Defendants, (Oct. 23, 1862:) "We will sell you 450 casks common assorted nails, delivered on the dock at Bangor, at $3.62 per keg of 100 lbs. each, cash."

Plaintiff, (Oct. 27, 1862:) "Nails have advanced so much I am almost afraid to buy; but you will send me as soon as possible, 303 kegs, (naming the kinds,) and I will send you a check on Exchange Bank, Boston.

Plaintiff, (Nov. 11, 1862:) "Not having heard whether you have shipped the nails ordered, I thought I would write you as we shall have but a few weeks more of navigation."

[58] The statement of facts and part of the opinion are omitted.

Defendants, (Nov. 14, 1862:) "It will not be possible for us to get out the nails you have ordered this month, as previous orders must take precedence. It is next to impossible for us to get out nails enough to supply our back orders, and we thought it best to write you, as navigation may be closed too soon for us to forward them this fall. We will, however, do our best to satisfy all our customers, and your order shall receive attention when we get to it."

This is the whole substance of the written correspondence between these parties, and we look in vain to find in it evidence of a contract completed; a proposition by one party, accepted without modification, by the other.

The defendants offered to deliver four hundred and fifty casks at $3.62 per cask; but this offer was not accepted by the plaintiff; and his order for three hundred and three casks does not appear to have been accepted by the defendants.

We look in vain for a distinct proposition by either party, which is accepted without modification by the other.

To constitute a contract, there must be a proposition by one party, accepted by the other, without any modification whatever. If the acceptance modifies the proposition in any particular, however trifling, it amounts to no more than a counterproposition; it is not in law an acceptance which will complete the contract. The letters between these parties fail, therefore, to establish a prima facie case for the plaintiff.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff admit that the letters "do not probably of themselves constitute a contract;" but they insist that, under the circumstances, slight evidence would be sufficient to supply the defect, and show that in fact the plaintiff's modified order was accepted by the defendants. It is highly probable that when the defendants received the plaintiff's order of October 27, they intended to fill it; otherwise they should have notified him, and not by their silence left him to infer that the nails would be forwarded, when they had no intention of doing it. And if such an intention would be sufficient to complete the contract, and render it binding upon the parties, we might, perhaps, feel justified in inferring it from the defendant's silence, and other facts testified to by the plaintiff. But we are not satisfied that such an intention, locked up in the breast of a party, and not communicated to the other, is sufficient in any case to constitute such an acceptance of a proposition as to create a binding contract. We think it would not.

It would be unjust to the other party to hold him bound by such an acceptance; and, unless both parties would be bound by it, neither would be, for want of mutuality.[59] * * *

[59] Silence of the original offeror does not operate as an acceptance of a counter offer. Cincinnati Equipment Co. v. Big Muddy River Consol. Coal Co., 158 Ky. 247, 164 S. W. 704 (1914), unless expressly so agreed; Bowen v.

SECTION 7.—CONDITIONAL ACCEPTANCE AND REJECTION

BEAUMONT v. PRIETO et al.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1919. 249 U. S. 554, 39 Sup. Ct. 383, 63 L. Ed. 770.)

Suit by Hartford Beaumont, assignee of W. Borck, against Mauro Prieto and others. Decree for plaintiff was reversed by the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, and plaintiff appeals and brings error. Affirmed.

Mr. Justice HOLMES. This is a suit for the specific performance of an alleged contract to sell land. The court of first instance made a decree for the plaintiff, but the decree was reversed by the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands and the defendants were absolved from the complaint. There is a motion to dismiss, on the ground that the writ of error and citation were not made returnable in time. But without going into particulars, as the appellant had color of authority from the court and a judge of that court, it appears to us that justice will be better served by dealing with the merits of the case. See Southern Pine Co. v. Ward, 208 U. S. 126, 137, 28 Sup. Ct. 239, 52 L. Ed. 420.

On the merits the only question is whether the alleged contract was made. The first material step was the following offer, dated December 4, 1911:

"Mr. W. Borck, Real Estate Agent, Manila, P. I.—Sir: In compliance with your request I herewith give you an option for three months to buy the property of Mr. Benito Legarda, known as the Nagtahan hacienda, situated in the district of Sampaloc, Manila, and con-McCarthy, 85 Mich. 26, 48 N. W. 155 (1891), "he had a right to disregard it [counter offer]; nor was it his duty to notify complainant.

In the case of a late acceptance, the power of acceptance having lapsed, it has been suggested that silence by the original offeror should complete a contract. Phillips v. Moor, 71 Me. 78 (1880). See, also, German Civil Code, § 149; Swiss Code Oblig. § 5; Jap. Civil Code, art. 522; Morrell v. Studd, [1913] 2 Ch. 648. But in the case of Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525, 530, 32 Am. Rep. 35 (1878), where the plaintiff mailed her acceptance two days later than by return mail as requested, the court said: "Appellant seeks to recover upon the strict letter of a special contract, and it is, therefore, incumbent on her to prove such contract. It is required of her, as we have seen, to prove an acceptance of appellee's offer within the time to which it was limited—that is to say, by the placing in the post-office of an answer unequivocally accepting the offer in time for the return mail, which she did not do. Appellee was, thereafter, under no obligation to regard the contract as closed. He might, it is true, have done so, but he was not legally bound in that respect, nor was he legally bound to notify appellant that her acceptance had not been signified within the time to which his offer was limited. She is legally chargeable with knowledge that her acceptance was not in time, and in order to fix a liability thereby upon appellee, it was incumbent upon her, before assuming that appellee waived this objection, to ascertain that he in fact did so." In accord is Ferrier v. Storer, 63 Iowa, 484, 19 N. W. 288, 50 Am. Rep. 752 (1884).

sisting of about 1,993,000 square meters of land, for the price of its assessed government valuation. B. Valdes."

There is no dispute that the assessed government valuation was 307,000 pesos, that Legarda owned the land and that Valdes had power to make the offer. On January 17, 1912, Borck wrote to Valdes:

"In reference to our negotiations regarding" the property in question, "I offer to purchase said property for the sum of three hundred and seven thousand (307,000.00) pesos, Ph. C., cash, net to you, payable the first day of May, 1912, or before and with delivery of a torrens title free of all encumbrances as taxes and other debts."

There was dispute about the admissibility of this letter and its being signed, but we see no occasion to disturb the opinion of the Supreme Court that it was a part of the transaction and was admissible. No answer was received, and on January 19 Borck wrote again, saying that he was ready to purchase the property at the price and that full payment would be made on or before March 3, provided all documents in connection with the hacienda were immediately placed at his disposal and found in good order. On January 23, Borck wrote again that he could improve the condition of payment and would pay ten days after the documents had been put at his disposal for inspection, etc., and finally, on February 28, wrote that the price was ready to be paid over and requesting notice when it was convenient to allow inspection of all papers. Before this last letter was written Valdes had indicated that he regarded compliance as an open question by saying in conversation that he wished to communicate with Mr. Legarda. Subsequently conveyance was refused.

The letter of January 17 plainly departed from the terms of the offer as to the time of payment and was, as it was expressed to be, a counter offer. In the language of a similar English case:

"The plaintiff made an offer of his own * * * and he thereby rejected the offer previously made by the defendant. * * * It was not afterwards competent for him to revive the proposal of the defendant, by tendering an acceptance of it." Hyde v. Wrench, 3 Beavan, 334; Langdell, Cont. § 18.

We do not find it necessary to go into the discussion of the later communications, which led the Supreme Court to the conclusion that they also would not have been sufficient. The right to hold the defendant to the proposed terms by a word of assent was gone, and after that all that the plaintiff could do was to make an offer in his turn. It would need a very much stronger case than this to induce us to reverse the decision of the court below. Cardona v. Quinones, 240 U. S. 83, 88, 36 Sup. Ct. 346, 60 L. Ed. 538.

Action by Frans Poel and another, copartners doing business as Poel & Arnold, against the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of New York. From an order of the Appellate Division, First Department (144 N. Y. Supp. 725), and the judgment entered thereon, unanimously affirming a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

SEABURY, J.[61] In this action the plaintiffs sued to recover damages from this defendant for the breach of an executory contract. * * * The theory of the action is that the defendant agreed to accept and pay for certain rubber which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to it, and that the refusal of the defendant to accept and pay for said rubber caused a breach of that contract. * * *

There are in this case four writings, and upon three of them this controversy must be determined. * * * The writings referred to are as follows: * * *

New York, April 4, 1910.

Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., Long Island City, L. I.—Gentlemen: Inclosed, we beg to hand you contract for 12 tons Upriver Fine Para Rubber, as sold you to-day, with our thanks for the order.

Very truly yours. Poel & Arnold,
Per W. J. Kelly.

Inclosed with this letter was the following:

Apr. 4/10.

Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., Long Island City, L. I.

Sold to You: For equal monthly shipments January to June, 1911, from Brazil and/or Liverpool, about twelve (12) tons Upriver Fine Para Rubber at two dollars and forty-two cents ($2.42) per pound; payable in U. S. gold or its equivalent, cash twenty (20) days from date of delivery here.

On April 6th Rogers [representing the defendant] sent the following order to the plaintiffs. It is partly printed and partly written. The part in writing is italicized: * * *

after various intervening cable messages, the defendant cabled a conditional acceptance and counter offer at 3:40 p. m. Twenty minutes later, at 4 p. m. the defendant cabled an unconditional acceptance. As to the effect of these messages the court said: "The telegram of 3:40 appears to have arrived at Manila at 5:30 p. m. There was no evidence to show when that of 4 p. m. arrived there. An interesting argument was addressed to us to the effect that the telegram of 3:40 operated from the time of its despatch, and had the effect of a refusal which could not be followed by an acceptance of the original offer, even if an acceptance of that offer were in fact received before it, and a fortiori if the acceptance were received after the refusal." The court found it unnecessary to pass upon the point.

[61] Parts of the opinion have been omitted.

The fundamental question in this case is whether these writings constitute a contract between the parties. If they do not, no question as to whether these writings meet the requirements of the statute of frauds need be considered. An analysis of their provisions will show that they do not constitute a contract. It is not contended, and in face of the provisions of the plaintiffs' letter of April 4th it cannot be claimed, that that letter is in itself a contract. It is a mere offer or proposal by the plaintiffs that the defendant should accept the proposed contract inclosed which is said to embody an oral order that the defendant had that day given the plaintiffs. The object of this letter was to have the terms of the oral agreement reduced to writing so that there could be no uncertainty as to the terms of the contract. The letter of the defendant of April 6th did not accept this offer. If the intention of the defendant had been to accept the offer made in the plaintiffs' letter of April 4th, it would have been a simple matter for the defendant to have indorsed its acceptance upon the proposed contract which the plaintiffs' letter of April 4th had inclosed. Instead of adopting this simple and obvious method of indicating an intent to accept the contract proposed by the plaintiffs, the defendant submitted its own proposal and specified the terms and conditions upon which it should be accepted.

The defendant's letter of April 6th was not an acceptance of this offer made by the plaintiffs in their letter of April 4th. It was a counter offer or proposition for a contract. Its provisions make it perfectly clear that the defendant: (1) Asked the plaintiffs to deliver rubber of a certain quality and quantity at the price specified in designated shipments; (2) it specified that the order therein given was conditional upon the receipt of its order being promptly acknowledged; and (3) upon the further condition that the plaintiffs would guarantee delivery within the time specified. It may be urged that the condition specified in defendant's order that the plaintiffs would guarantee the delivery of the goods within the time specified added nothing of substance to the agreement, because if the offer was accepted the acceptance itself would involve this obligation on the part of the plaintiffs. The other condition specified by the defendant cannot be disposed of in the same manner. That provision of the defendant's offer provided that the offer was conditional upon the receipt of the order being promptly acknowledged. It embodied a condition that the defendant had the right to annex to its offer. The import of this proposal was that the defendant should not be bound until the plaintiffs signified their assent to the terms set forth. When this assent was given and the acknowledgment made, this contract was then to come into existence and would be completely expressed in writing.

The plaintiffs did not acknowledge the receipt of this order and the proposal remained unaccepted. As the party making this offer deemed this provision material, and as the offer was made subject to compliance with it by the plaintiffs, it is not for the court to say that it is immaterial. When the plaintiffs submitted this offer in their letter of April 4th to the defendant, only one of two courses of action was open to the defendant. It could accept the offer made and thus manifest that assent which was essential to the creation of a contract, or it could reject the offer. There was no middle course. If it did not accept the offer proposed it necessarily rejected it. A proposal to accept the offer it modified or an acceptance subject to other terms and conditions was equivalent to an absolute rejection of the offer made by the plaintiffs. Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240; Sidney Glass Works v. Barnes & Co., 86 Hun, 374, 33 N. Y. Supp. 508; Mahar v. BRUCE et al. v. PEARSON.

This was an action of assumpsit, for goods sold and delivered. The cause was tried at the last sittings in New York, before Mr. Justice Van Ness.

On the 11th December, 1805, the defendant, who resides at Albany, wrote a letter to the plaintiffs, who are merchants in the city of New York, as follows:

"Albany, 11th December, 1805.

"Gent: Should you find it perfectly agreeable to yourselves, (not otherwise,) you can send me by any sloop, provided you think the river will keep open, the goods I have noted at foot, and payable the 15th May next. If you think the time too long, you need not send them."

The goods mentioned were: "6 hogsheads rum; 1 hogshead sugar; 1 pipe gin; 1 pipe brandy; 4 quarter-chests hyson-skin tea; 20 or 40 small boxes pipes, if low; 10 barrels of codfish."

The plaintiffs, on the 21st December, 1805, shipped on board of a sloop, for the defendant, "3 hogsheads rum; 1 pipe brandy; 2 chests tea; 1 hogshead sugar, and 1 pipe of gin." At the bottom of the bill were these words: "At three months; interest after, till paid."

They also wrote to the defendant, as follows:

"Dear sir: Your much esteemed favour of the 11th inst. we only received on the 19th. We were much at a loss to know how to act; we, however, have calculated to risk the getting up, and have reduced the order, and shipped per the Fair Play, as on the other side."

The vessel having the goods on board, (the river being much obstructed with ice,) was, during her passage, cast away, and part of the goods wholly lost. The master, on the 8th January, 1806, having left the vessel, went to Albany, and delivered the letter of the plaintiffs to the defendant, who, having read it, said that he did not consider the goods as his, as the plaintiffs had not sent all the goods ordered, nor on the terms proposed. On the same day, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs, informing them, that the vessel was ashore, and that he did not consider the goods at his risk, and advising them to give di-of land with warranty of 40 million feet of timber—acceptance, subject to a "cruise" showing warranty correct; Jordan v. Norton (Ex.) 4 M. & W. 153 (1838); Duke v. Andrews, 2 Ex. 290 (1848), application for shares not accepted by allotting "nontransferable" shares; Crossley v. Maycock, L. R. 18 Eq. Cas. 180 (1874); Carter v. Bingham, 32 Up. Can. 615 (1872).

Where the offer requires acceptance in a particular form, an acceptance in a different form is inoperative, even though the legal relations that would be created by it are identical with those that would be created by the required form. Phœnix Iron & Steel Co. v. Wilkoff Co., 253 Fed. 165, 165 C. C. A. 65, 1 A. L. R. 1497 (1918).

"An acceptance may be complete, though it expresses dissatisfaction at some of the terms, if the dissatisfaction stops short of dissent, so that the whole thing be described as a 'grumbling assent.'" Pollock, Contracts; Johnson v. Federal Union Surety Co., 187 Mich. 454, 153 N. W. 788, 792 (1915).

rections for their preservation, offering, if the plaintiffs considered him as liable, to leave the question to be decided by arbitrators.

The goods were charged at the market price of goods, at three months credit.

The plaintiffs offered to prove, that the defendant had frequently, prior to the 11th December, 1804, sent orders to the plaintiffs for goods, which were executed only in part, and that the defendant had always received the goods sent, without making any objection; and that it was a general usage among merchants in the city of New York, to send to their customers in the country, a part only of the goods ordered; but this evidence was objected to, and overruled. The judge was about to order the plaintiffs to be called, when the counsel agreed that a verdict might be taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case containing the facts above stated; and that, if the opinion of the court should be in favour of the defendant, a nonsuit should be entered.

PER CURIAM. The order sent by the defendant to the plaintiffs, was for 6 hogsheads of rum, and other articles, at a credit of six months; and the plaintiffs sent only 3 hogsheads, and omitted part of the other articles, charging those sent, at a credit of three months. This cannot amount to a contract. There is no agreement, no aggregatio mentium between the parties, as to the thing, or subject-matter of the contract. The defendant wished to have the whole of the goods; a part of them might be of no use; and until he assented to receive a part instead of the whole, he cannot be said to have contracted to pay for a part; and there can be no implied assumpsit to pay, as the goods sent never came to his hands.

Judgment of nonsuit.

GENERAL LITHOGRAPHING & PRINTING CO. v. WASHINGTON RUBBER CO., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1909. 55 Wash. 461, 104 Pac. 650.)

Action by the General Lithographing & Printing Company against the Washington Rubber Company, Incorporated, for breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PARKER, J.[63] The facts in this cause as found by the court, the trial being by the court without a jury, are in substance as follows:

About June 24, 1907, the plaintiff and Mix Fire Apparatus Company entered into a contract, whereby the former agreed to perform the work and furnish material for the printing of 3,500 copies of a catalogue for the latter at the agreed price of $800. In pursuance of the terms of the contract, the plaintiff proceeded with the work, when the Mix Fire Apparatus Company requested plaintiff not to complete same until further orders, and thereupon plaintiff held the printed forms for the work for a period of two months, for which it was entitled to $50 as a reasonable charge for the holding of the forms. On the 15th day of November, 1907, in consideration of the release and discharge by the plaintiff of said claim of $50 for holding the forms, and a continuation and completion of the contract as originally made, the defendant entered into a contract in writing whereby plaintiff was to complete the catalogue, and the defendant was to accept and pay for the same. In pursuance of this last contract, the plaintiff proceeded to perform the same and submitted proofs for correction to defendant preparatory to final printing, but defendant wholly failed and refused to correct and return said proof, and refused to allow the work to proceed or to fulfill the terms of the contract on its part. The reasonable value of the work and labor in and about the composition performed by plaintiff is $200. The reasonable value of labor incident to the furnishing of proof to defendant is $25. The depreciation in the value of paper purchased by plaintiff for the work, and left on hand is $100, and the profit plaintiff would have made upon the contract had it been allowed to complete the same is $200.

From these facts the court concluded as a matter of law that plaintiff was entitled to recover from defendant $525, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which defendant has appealed.

Appellant, having filed its exceptions to the court's findings, contends that there was no contract shown by the evidence to have been entered into between the parties, the breach of which would warrant a recovery. The contract referred to in the court's findings as being entered into between the appellant and respondent is evidenced by two letters as follows:

"Seattle, Wash., 11—6—07. General Lithographing & Printing Co., City—Gentlemen: Referring to the writer's conversation with your Mr. Graff about six weeks ago, at which time he proposed to him that the Washington Rubber Co. would be willing to assume the payment of $800.00 for the catalogue ordered from his Company by the Mix Fire Apparatus Co. on delivery of said catalogue in accordance with the contract, as placed, we herewith confirm said offer on condition that there will be no additional charges beyond the original contract price of Eight Hundred Dollars ($800.00). Kindly advise us what decision you have come to on this offer and oblige, Yours respectfully, The Washington Rubber Co., by Franz F. Richter, Pr."

"Nov. 15, 1907. Washington Rubber Co., 216 Jackson St., City—Gentlemen: In answer to your letter dated November 6th, 1907, we beg to accept your proposition with the understanding that we are to have $800.00 for the catalogue printed as originally agreed, and no changes to be made in your copy or corrections except at your expense. The job has been set and waiting for you at some time, ready to run. We believe there will be no changes necessary but in case there are, we will expect $1.25 per hour for composition changes. Yours truly, General Lithographing & Printing Co."

Counsel for appellant argue that the language of the second letter does not constitute an unconditional acceptance of the proposition contained in the first letter because of the words therein: "And no changes to be made in your copy or corrections except at your expense." There may be room for argument as to whether or not these words so qualify the acceptance as to make it conditional, and thereby prevent the meeting of the minds of the parties. We are not inclined to so regard it; but rather as a statement indicating that there would be extra charge for any extra work beyond the strict terms of the contract. The latter part of the letter lends support to this view. However, this involves only a question of construction, which we are relieved from solving if as a matter of fact the parties subsequently treated the contract as existing. Mr. Graff, the president of respondent company, referring to a time immediately following the exchange of the letters, testified: "We immediately took new proofs as requested. Mr. Richter told me to go ahead with the work and to furnish new proofs for Mr. Mix to correct, which we did." If this be true, and we think the trial court was warranted in so believing from the evidence, it at once becomes apparent that both parties regarded the contract as complete. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

STEVENSON, JAQUES & CO. v. McLEAN.

(In the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1880. L. R. 5 Q. B. D. 346.)

LUSH, J. This is an action for non-delivery of a quantity of iron which it was alleged the defendant contracted to sell to the plaintiffs at 40s. per ton, net cash. The trial took place before me at the last assizes at Leeds, when a verdict was given for the plaintiffs for £1900, subject to further consideration on the question whether, under the circumstances, the correspondence between the parties amounted to a contract, and subject also, if the verdict should stand, to a reference, if required by the defendant, to ascertain the amount of damages. The question of law was argued before me on May 7th last.

The plaintiffs are makers of iron and iron merchants at Middlesborough. The defendant being possessed of warrants for iron, which he had originally bought of the plaintiffs, wrote on September 24th to the plaintiffs from London, where he carries on his business: "I see that No. 3 has been sold for immediate delivery at 39s., which means a higher price for warrants. Could you get me an offer for the whole or part of my warrants? I have 3800 tons, and the brands you know."

On the 26th one of the plaintiffs wrote from Liverpool: "Your letter has followed me here. The pig-iron trade is at present very excited, and it is difficult to decide whether the prices will be maintained or fall as suddenly as they have advanced. Sales are being made freely for forward delivery chiefly, but not in warrants. It may, however, be found advisable to sell the warrants as maker's iron. I would recommend you to fix your price, and if you will write me your limit to Middlesborough, I shall probably be able to wire you something definite on Monday." This letter was crossed by a letter written on the same day by the clerk of one Fossick, the defendant's broker in London, and which was in these terms:

"Referring to R. A. McLean's letter to you re warrants, I have seen him again to-day, and he considers 39s. too low for same. At 40s. he says he would consider an offer. However, I shall be obliged by your kindly wiring me, if possible, your best offer for all or part of the warrants he has to dispose of."

On the 27th (Saturday) the plaintiffs sent to Fossick the following telegram:

"Cannot make an offer to-day; warrants rather easier. Several sellers think might get 39s. 6d. if you could wire firm offer subject reply Tuesday noon."

In answer to this Fossick wrote on the same day: "Your telegram duly to hand re warrants. I have seen Mr. McLean, but he is not inclined to make a firm offer. I do not think he is likely to sell at 39s. 6d., but will probably prefer to wait. Please let me know immediately you get any likely offer."

On the same day the defendant, who had then received the Liverpool letter of the 26th, wrote himself to the plaintiffs as follows:

"Mr. Fossick's clerk showed me a telegram from him yesterday mentioning 39s. for No. 3 as present price, 40s., for forward delivery. I instructed the clerk to wire you that I would now sell for 40s., net cash, open till Monday." No such telegram was sent by Fossick's clerk.

The plaintiffs were thus on the 28th (Sunday) in possession of both letters, the one from Fossick stating that the defendant was not inclined to make a firm offer; and the other from the defendant himself, to the effect that he would sell for 40s., net cash, and would hold it open all Monday. This it was admitted must have been the meaning of "open till Monday."

On the Monday morning, at 9:42, the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendant: "Please wire whether you would accept forty for delivery over two months, or if not, longest limit you would give."

This telegram was received at the office at Moorgate at 10:01 a. m., and was delivered at the defendant's office in the Old Jewry shortly afterward.

No answer to this telegram was sent by the defendant, but after its receipt he sold the warrants, through Fossick, for 40s., net cash, and at 1:25 sent off a telegram to the plaintiffs: "Have sold all my warrants here for forty net to-day." This telegram reached Middlesborough at 1:46, and was delivered in due course.

Before its arrival at Middlesborough, however, and at 1:34, the plaintiffs telegraphed to defendant: "Have secured your price for payment next Monday—write you fully by post."

By the usage of the iron market at Middlesborough, contracts made on a Monday for cash are payable on the following Monday.

At 2:06 on the same day, after receipt of the defendant's telegram announcing the sale through Fossick, the plaintiffs telegraphed: "Have your telegram following our advice to you of sale, per your instructions, which we cannot revoke, but rely upon your carrying out."

The defendant replied: "Your two telegrams received, but your sale was too late; your sale was not per my instructions." And to this the plaintiffs rejoined: "Have sold your warrants on terms stated in your letter of 27th."

The iron was sold by plaintiffs to one Walker at 41s. 6d., and the contract note was signed before 1 o'clock on Monday. The price of iron rapidly rose, and the plaintiffs had to buy in fulfilment of their contract at a considerable advance on 40s.

The only question of fact raised at the trial was, whether the relation between the parties was that of principal and agent, or that of buyer and seller. The jury found it was that of buyer and seller, and no objection has been taken to this finding.

Two objections were relied on by the defendant: First, it was contended that the telegram sent by the plaintiffs on the Monday morning was a rejection of the defendant's offer and a new proposal on the plaintiffs' part, and that the defendant had therefore a right to regard it as putting an end to the original negotiation.

Looking at the form of the telegram, the time when it was sent, and the state of the iron market, I cannot think this is its fair meaning. The plaintiff Stevenson said he meant it only as an inquiry, expecting an answer for his guidance, and this, I think, is the sense in which the defendant ought to have regarded it.

It is apparent throughout the correspondence, that the plaintiffs did not contemplate buying the iron on speculation, but that their acceptance of the defendant's offer depended on their finding some one to take the warrants off their hands. All parties knew that the market was in an unsettled state, and that no one could predict at the early hour when the telegram was sent how the prices would range during the day. It was reasonable that, under these circumstances, they should desire to know before business began whether they were to be at liberty in case of need to make any and what concession as to the time or times of delivery, which would be the time or times of payment, or whether the defendant was determined to adhere to the terms of his letter; and it was highly unreasonable that the plaintiffs should have intended to close the negotiation while it was uncertain whether they could find a buyer or not, having the whole of the business hours of the day to look for one. Then, again, the form of the telegram is one of inquiry. It is not "I offer forty for delivery over two months," which would have likened the case to Hyde v. Wrench [3 Beav. 334], where one party offered his estate for £1,000, and the other answered by offering £950. Lord Langdale, in that case, held that after the £950 had been refused, the party offering it could not, by then agreeing to the original proposal, claim the estate, for the negotiation was at an end by the refusal of his counter proposal. Here there is no counter proposal. The words are, "Please wire whether you would accept forty for delivery over two months, or, if not, the longest limit you would give." There is nothing specific by way of offer or rejection, but a mere inquiry, which should have been answered and not treated as a rejection of the offer. This ground of objection therefore fails.

The remaining objection was one founded on a well-known passage in Pothier, which has been supposed to have been sanctioned by the Court of Queen's Bench in Cooke v. Oxley [3 T. R. 653], that in order to constitute a contract there must be the assent or concurrence of the two minds at the moment when the offer is accepted; and that if, when an offer is made, and time is given to the other party to determine whether he will accept or reject it, the proposer changes his mind before the time arrives, although no notice of the withdrawal has been given to the other party, the option of accepting it is gone. The case of Cooke v. Oxley does not appear to me to warrant the inference which has been drawn from it, or the supposition that the judges ever intended to lay down such a doctrine. The declaration stated a proposal by the defendant to sell to the plaintiff 266 hogsheads of sugar at a specific price, that the plaintiff desired time to agree to, or dissent from, the proposal till four in the afternoon, and that defendant agreed to give the time, and promised to sell and deliver if the plaintiff would agree to purchase and give notice thereof before 4 o'clock. The court arrested the judgment on the ground that there was no consideration for the defendant's agreement to wait till 4 o'clock, and that the alleged promise to wait was nudum pactum.

All that the judgment affirms is, that a party who gives time to another to accept or reject a proposal is not bound to wait till the time expires. And this is perfectly consistent with legal principles and with subsequent authorities, which have been supposed to conflict with Cooke v. Oxley. It is clear that a unilateral promise is not binding, and that if the person who makes an offer revokes it before it has been accepted, which he is at liberty to do, the negotiation is at an end. See Routledge v. Grant [4 Bing. 653]. But in the absence of an intermediate revocation, a party who makes a proposal by letter to another is considered as repeating the offer every instant of time till the letter has reached its destination and the correspondent has had a reasonable time to answer it. Adams v. Lindsell [1 B. & Ald. 681]. "Common sense tells us," said Lord Cottenham, in Dunlop v. Higgins [1 H. L. C. 381], "that transactions cannot go on without such a rule." It cannot make any difference whether the negotiation is carried on by post, or by telegraph, or by oral message. If the offer is not retracted, it is in force as a continuing offer till the time for accepting or rejecting it has arrived. But if it is retracted, there is an end of the proposal. Cooke v. Oxley [3 T. R. 653], if decided the other way, would have negatived the right of the proposing party to revoke his offer.

Taking this to be the effect of the decision in Cooke v. Oxley, the doctrine of Pothier before adverted to, which is undoubtedly contrary to the spirit of English law, has never been affirmed in our courts. Singularly enough, the very reasonable proposition that a revocation is nothing till it has been communicated to the other party, has not, until recently, been laid down, no case having apparently arisen to call for a decision upon the point. In America it was decided some years ago that "an offer cannot be withdrawn unless the withdrawal reaches the party to whom it is addressed before his letter of reply announcing the acceptance has been transmitted." Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Insurance Co. [9 How. 390]; and in Byrne & Co. v. Leon Van Tienhoven & Co. [49 L. J. (C. P.) 316], my brother Lindley, in an elaborate judgment, adopted this view, and held that an uncommunicated revocation is, for all practical purposes and in point of law, no revocation at all.

It follows, that as no notice of withdrawal of his offer to sell at 40s., net cash, was given by the defendant before the plaintiffs sold to Walker, they had a right to regard it as a continuing offer, and their acceptance of it made the contract, which was initiated by the proposal, complete and binding on both parties.

My judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiffs for £1,900, but this amount is liable to be reduced by an arbitrator to be agreed on by the parties, or, if they cannot agree within a week, to be nominated by me. If no arbitrator is appointed, or if the amount be not reduced, the judgment will stand for £1,900. The costs of the arbitration to be in the arbitrator's discretion.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.[64]

[64] "A mere inquiry as to the terms of the proposal, or a request to modify or change the offer, does not have the effect of rejecting the offer, and, if the offer has not been revoked, a party may accept it, although he previously asked the proposer to modify it." Johnson v. Federal Union Surety Co., 187 Mich. 454, 153 N. W. 788 (1915).

PURRINGTON v. GRIMM.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1910. 83 Vt. 466, 76 Atl. 158.)

Action by Frank G. Purrington against Gustave H. Grimm. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings exceptions. Reversed and remanded.

MUNSON, J.[65] The suit is to recover damages for the non-delivery of goods purchased. The defendant denies that there was a sale. The question is whether certain correspondence shows a contract.

The defendant was engaged in the manufacture and sale of sugar utensils and supplies. The plaintiff, wishing to fit up his sugar place for the making of maple sugar, applied to the defendant by letter for his catalogue of evaporators and sugaring utensils. The defendant replied, inclosing a price list of evaporators, and stating that he had mailed him a catalogue, and that if he would place an order by return mail and pay on delivery he would allow him a special discount of 10 per cent., or that he might purchase at regular price by paying one-half cash May 1st and the balance in one year. Plaintiff acknowledged receipt of the catalogue, and inquired the prices of evaporators of two specified sizes. Defendant replied, giving prices of such sized evaporators with arch complete, including chimney, grate bars, etc., and saying that if plaintiff would send cash with order he would allow him a discount of 5 per cent.: that his regular terms were one-half cash May 1st and balance in one year; and that if he bought on those terms the price would be net.

February 13th plaintiff wrote defendant proposing to buy an evaporator of a specified size and quality, an eight-barrel store tank of a certain description, 300 No. 4 spouts with hooks, and 300 galvanized iron buckets of $16 quality, if the defendant would give three years' time, first payment to be made May 1, 1907. February 16th defendant wrote plaintiff that he would accept his order and make out three notes of equal payments May 1, 1907, 1908, and 1909, but saying that he had no galvanized buckets of the $16 quality, and that the only thing he could give him was his best bucket, selling for $24 per 100, or I. C. Coke tin buckets, for $18 per 100. To this plaintiff replied under date of February 18th: "Would say of the buckets that you may send us 300 AAAA 14 bright charcoal tin buckets, also a 7/16-inch tapping bit and ½-inch reamer"—concluding with a request that he ship as soon as possible, and thanking him for the extra time allowed. Defendant did not ship the goods, and after repeated communications of inquiry wrote plaintiff, under date of March 19th, that he could not ship them because the information he had regarding plaintiff's financial standing was not satisfactory. It appears that the buckets mentioned in plaintiff's letter of February 18th were the same as the $18 bucket mentioned in the defendant's last preceding letter, and that the tapping bit and reamer first mentioned in plaintiff's letter of February 18th together cost 75 cents. These facts, with the letters, make the case. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff had not proved a contract.

It is argued in support of the judgment that the letters say nothing about the price of some of the articles ordered. It was not necessary that they should. It is evident from the correspondence that the parties were negotiating on the basis of a price list; the defendant offering a discount for cash, and the plaintiff seeking a longer time of credit at regular prices. When this was settled, the price list would determine the amount of the purchase. It is said that the giving of notes was first referred to in defendant's letter of February 16th, and that the plaintiff's letter of February 18th contains no agreement to give them. We think the plaintiff's agreement to the proposed change in the list ordered with thanks for the extra time allowed for payment, was an implied assent to the manner in which it was proposed that the terms of payment should be evidenced. It is said that the defendant nowhere proposed to sell plaintiff 300 buckets. His whole correspondence was an offer to supply the defendant, and his letter of February 16th plainly gave the plaintiff his choice between two kinds of buckets then in stock. It is said that in the plaintiff's letter regarding the buckets the other articles previously mentioned in the negotiation were entirely omitted. It was not necessary that the previous steps in the negotiation should be recited in each succeeding letter.[66] Plaintiff's letter of February 13th was a proposal to buy a specified list of goods if the defendant would give a certain period of credit. Defendant's letter of February 16th agreed to give the credit asked for, but proposed a substitution of one grade of goods for another as to a part of [66] In C. W. Hull Co. v. Marquette Cement Mfg. Co., 208 Fed. 260, 264, 125 C. C. A. 460 (1913), the court said: "Counsel for appellant builds up an imposing argument in this way: He starts with the basic principle that in order to create a contract there must be a definite proposal on one side and an unconditional acceptance on the other. He then takes up the letters and shows that each offer was met by some new term and, applying his rule, lays aside each letter as a nullity because it failed to produce a complete agreement. Parties, however, have the right to reach their agreements in their own way. They may settle upon one term at a time, and, if it is reasonably clear that this has been their method, then, when the last term is agreed upon, their contract is just as complete and binding as if all its terms had been settled by a single act. Here the parties first agree upon territory, then upon quantity, then upon general features, such as terms of payment, return of sacks, etc., then upon the amount of the monthly deliveries, and finally upon the price. At every stage, as the negotiations advance, it seems clear to us that the parties carry forward the terms as to which they have already agreed." See, also, Kehlor Flour Mills Co. v. Linden, 230 Mass. 119, 119 N. E. 698 (1918).

In Dougherty v. Briggs, 231 Pa. 68, 75, 79 Atl. 924 (1911), the court said: "When it is sought to establish a contract by letters which pass between the parties, containing proposals, answers and counter proposals, it must be made to appear that at some point in the correspondence there was a definite and unqualified proposal by one party which was unconditionally and without qualification accepted by the other party."

the order. Plaintiff's letter of February 18th agreed to the proposed change. It is plain that these three letters resulted in an agreement, unless this was prevented by plaintiff's mention of the bit and reamer.

It is certain that an acceptance which varies from the offer will not conclude a contract. Davenport v. Newton, 71 Vt. 11, 21, 42 Atl. 1087. But the reply may go beyond the terms of the proposal without qualifying the acceptance. The addition may be such as fairly to import a request instead of a condition. In determining what one party intended, and the other ought to have understood, regard must be had to the situation and purpose of the parties, and the subject-matter and course of the negotiations. These parties had been negotiating regarding the substantial outfit of a sugar orchard, with proposals and counter-proposals induced by the condition of the defendant's stock and the plaintiff's desire to secure a longer term of credit. This negotiation was brought to an agreement by plaintiff's letter of February 18th, unless it was held open by the introduction of a new subject-matter—the tapping bit and reamer. The language of this letter is not so complete and exact as to leave no room for construction. If the meaning is that the defendant might make the proposed substitution of buckets provided he would add to the shipment a bit and a reamer, there was no contract. But we think the purport of the letter is the same as if the plaintiff had written: "You may also put in, if you have them on hand, a tapping bit and reamer." It seems clear that, if the defendant had shipped the goods without the bit and reamer, the plaintiff could not have refused to take them on the ground that those articles were omitted.

There are a few cases somewhat in point. In Culton v. Gilchrist, 92 Iowa, 718, 61 N. W. 384, plaintiff wrote defendant that he would lease to him for three or five years as he might choose. Defendant thereupon wrote plaintiff that he might make out a lease for five years; that his reason for wanting the place for five years was that he would like to put up a small cookroom; that he would like to do this himself, if the plaintiff would give him in the lease the privilege of removing the addition if he did not buy the place. It was held that the acceptance was complete; that the matter subsequently introduced was not a condition, but a request. * * *

[67] In accord: Simpson v. Emmons, 116 Me. 14, 99 Atl. 658 (1917), a request to "rush shipment" does not invalidate acceptance; Wilkins v. Vass Cotton Mills, 176 N. C. 73, 97 S. E. 151 (1918), "accept offer; make it 25,000 if can make sixteens," held valid; Turner v. McCormick, 56 W. Va. 161, 49 S. E. 28, 67 L. R. A. 853, 107 Am. St. Rep. 904 (1904), "respectfully request you to make delivery of deed in Morgantown"; Culton v. Gilchrist, 92 Iowa, 718, 61 N. W. 384 (1894), acceptance of lease, with request to build a small cook room; Portage Rubber Co. v. Fruin Drop Forge Co., 186 Ill. App. 11 (1914).

WHEATON BUILDING & LUMBER CO. v. CITY OF BOSTON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1910. 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598.)

Action by the Wheaton Building & Lumber Company against the City of Boston. There was a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Overruled.

RUGG, J.[68] The plaintiff in common with several others, in response to an advertisement issued by the schoolhouse commissioners of Boston, submitted a bid for the erection of a certain schoolhouse, transmitting with it a check to the order of defendant for $2,000. The city claims the right to hold this money upon these facts: The bid contained the provision that the plaintiff "proposes and agrees that if within 20 days after the day named below for leaving the proposal, notice that this proposal will be accepted for the city shall be mailed to him at the address given below or shall be delivered to him, he will at 11 o'clock a. m. of some day of the six week days next after such mailing or delivery * * * deliver * * * a contract and bond for doing the work properly executed in the form annexed, * * * and also agrees that the certified check payable to the city left herewith is the property of the city, and the amount thereof is the amount of damages which the city will sustain by failure to carry out the proposal, but if this proposal is not accepted or if notice is mailed and delivered and the undersigned executes and delivers said contract and bond the check or its amount is to be paid to him on receipt therefor."

The bid of the lowest bidder was accepted, but he declined to execute a contract, and the city forfeited his check. Thereupon, the proposal of the plaintiff, being the next lowest, was accepted by letter mailed within the time limited in the bid, and it refused to execute a contract. The proposal of the next lowest bidder was then accepted, but he refused to execute the contract, and his check was taken by the city. Between these three bids and the next lowest was a gap of about $24,000, and his proposal being accepted, he executed a contract. The plaintiff did not attempt to withdraw its proposal until after it had been accepted by the schoolhouse commission.

1. It is urged that the acceptance of one bid by the city constituted a rejection of all the other bids, and that hence the attempted acceptance of the plaintiff's bid was of no effect. Undoubtedly an advertisement and proposal might be so framed as to sustain such contention. But that is not the effect of the acts of the defendant and the statute under which they were performed. The terms of the proposal as to the time during which it was to remain open indicate that the city intended to reserve to itself time to make at least three attempts to hold bidders before its rights should have expired. St. 1890, p. 370, c. 418, required the execution of a formal written contract in addition to the acceptance of the proposal. The acceptance of the bid by the schoolhouse commissioners did not of itself constitute a formal contract. The city could not be bound under the statute until the formal contract was executed. Edge Moor Bridge Works v. Bristol, 170 Mass. 528, 49 N. E. 918. The only way in which the city could secure a binding agreement for the construction of its building was through such a written contract. But it is plain that the statute contemplated some obligation on the part of the bidders, even though there was none on the part of the city. St. 1890, c. 418, § 5, provides that "every proposal * * * shall be accompanied by a suitable bond, certified check or certificate of deposit for the faithful performance of such proposal. * * *" This section must be given a reasonable effect. It would be a nullity if it should be held that the bidder was at liberty to withdraw without any liability at any time before the formal contract, which alone could bind the city, should be executed. The reasonable construction is to hold that the bidder is bound to stand by his proposal, at least after its acceptance, and to the extent of his bond or deposit, but no further.

If the case was free from statutory regulation, and it did not appear that a more formal contract was contemplated, the mere acceptance of the proposal would constitute a contract, and neither party could refuse to carry it out without becoming liable to all the damage sustained. Beach & Clarridge Co. v. American Steam Gauge & Valve Mfg. Co., 202 Mass. 177, 88 N. E. 924. The Legislature, perhaps in recognition of the hardship, which might follow requiring the bidder to be bound though the city was not, restricted the liability of the former to the extent of the deposit. From this interpretation of the statute it follows that an acceptance of the proposal of one bidder did not constitute a binding contract even on the part of the bidder to execute a formal contract, but only to forfeit his deposit if he failed to do so. The proposal stated that the bid should remain open a definite number of days, not until some one of the bids should be accepted. The acceptance of a bid was only one step toward the execution of the contract. The bidder first accepted might be unable to secure the required bond for the performance of the contract. The mayor might for some just reason refuse to approve the contract, or some other cause might intervene to prevent the execution of a final contract. The tenor of the proposal, which was upon a blank furnished by the defendant, read in the light of the statute, indicates an intent that the city reserves all its rights under all the bids until a contract shall have been formally executed and delivered, and to hold all the bidders to the terms of their proposals until it has either rejected all of them as provided in St. 1890, c. 418, § 4, or become bound by the execution of a contract with one, or the time limited for acceptance has expired. Hence the acceptance of a bid without the execution of a contract cannot be regarded as an unequivocal and definite determination on the part of the city to consider no other proposal. So long as the time limited for the deposit to remain had not expired and no formal contract had been executed, the city was at liberty to accept any proposal, and require the bidder to respond either by signing the contract or sustaining the loss of the deposit. Gibson v. Owens, 115 Mo. 258, 21 S. W. 1107.

2. It is next argued by the plaintiff that, the city's acceptance of the bid being made subject to the approval of the mayor, there was not an unconditional acceptance of the terms of the offer. An offer must be accepted in the terms in which it is made, in order to become binding, and a conditional acceptance or one that varies from the offer in any substantial respect is in effect a rejection and amounts to a new proposition. The phrase in the acceptance by the schoolhouse commissioners, which is relied on as rendering it conditional, was simply a reference to the statute under which the matter was proceeding. It was by implication a part of the invitation for proposal and also of the bid which the plaintiff had submitted. It added no new term to the proposal or to the contract. It did not vary in any respect the offer, and was therefore an unconditional and valid acceptance of it. * * *

5. The final contention of the plaintiff is that the deposit was a penalty, and hence cannot be enforced. The terms of the agreement indicate an intent to treat the deposit as liquidated damages, and this appears to be the purpose of the statute. The amount of the check must be regarded as liquidated damages. It was in fact much smaller than the loss sustained by the city, for by the failure of the plaintiff to take the contract it was awarded to another bidder for a sum about $24,000 larger. The plaintiff refused to sign the contract except for an additional price of $21,000. Therefore no reason appears why the intent of the parties as manifested by their written communication and the purpose of the statute should not be carried out. Guerin v. Stacy, 175 Mass. 595, 56 N. E. 892; Garcin v. Pennsylvania Furnace Co., 186 Mass. 405, 71 N. E. 793; Morrison v. Richardson, 194 Mass. 370, 80 N. E. 468.

Exceptions overruled.[69]

SECTION 8.—MEETING OF THE MINDS—MISTAKE

RAFFLES v. WICHELHAUS et al.

(In the Court of Exchequer, 1864. 2 Hurl. & C. 906.)

Declaration. For that it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants, to wit, at Liverpool, that the plaintiff should sell to the defendants, and the defendants buy of the plaintiff, certain goods, to wit, 125 bales of Surat cotton, guaranteed middling fair merchant's Dhollorah, to arrive ex Peerless from Bombay; and that the cotton should be taken from the quay, and that the defendants would pay the plaintiff for the same at a certain rate, to wit, at the rate of 17¼*d.* per pound, within a certain time then agreed upon after the arrival of the said goods in England. Averments: that the said goods did arrive by the said ship from Bombay in England, to wit, at Liverpool, and the plaintiff was then and there ready and willing and offered to deliver the said goods to the defendants, etc. Breach: that the defendants refused to accept the said goods or pay the plaintiff for them.

[69] The amount deposited as a forfeit cannot be recovered by the bidder in case he withdraws his bid. City of Baltimore v. J. L. Robinson Const. Co., 123 Md. 660, 91 Atl. 682, L. R. A. 1915A, 225, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 425 (1914). And see note, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 427.

Plea. That the said ship mentioned in the said agreement was meant and intended by the defendants to be the ship called the Peerless, which sailed from Bombay, to wit, in October; and that the plaintiff was not ready and willing, and did not offer to deliver to the defendants any bales of cotton which arrived by the last-mentioned ship, but instead thereof was only ready and willing, and offered to deliver to the defendants 125 bales of Surat cotton which arrived by another and different ship, which was also called the Peerless, and which sailed from Bombay, to wit, in December.

Demurrer, and joinder therein.

Milward, in support of the demurrer. The contract was for the sale of a number of bales of cotton of a particular description, which the plaintiff was ready to deliver. It is immaterial by what ship the cotton was to arrive, so that it was a ship called the Peerless. The words "to arrive ex Peerless," only mean that if the vessel is lost on the voyage, the contract is to be at an end. [POLLOCK, C. B. It would be a question for the jury whether both parties meant the same ship called the Peerless.] That would be so if the contract was for the sale of a ship called the Peerless; but it is for the sale of cotton on board a ship of that name. [POLLOCK, C. B. The defendant only bought that cotton which was to arrive by a particular ship. It may as well be said, that if there is a contract for the purchase of certain goods in warehouse A., that is satisfied by the delivery of goods of the same description in warehouse B.] In that case there would be goods in both warehouses; here it does not appear that the plaintiff had any goods on board the other Peerless. [MARTIN, B. It is imposing on the defendant a contract different from that which he entered into. POLLOCK, C. B. It is like a contract for the purchase of wine coming from a particular estate in France or Spain, where there are two estates of that name.] The defendant has no right to contradict by parol evidence a written contract good upon the face of it. He does not impute misrepresentation or fraud, but only says that he fancied the ship was a different one. Intention is of no avail, unless stated at the time of the contract. [POLLOCK, C. B. One vessel sailed in October and the other in December.] The time of sailing is no part of the contract.

Mellish (Cohen with him), in support of the plea. There is nothing on the face of the contract to show that any particular ship called the Peerless was meant; but the moment it appears that two ships called the Peerless were about to sail from Bombay there is a latent ambiguity, and parol evidence may be given for the purpose of showing that the defendant meant one Peerless and the plaintiff another. That being so, there was no consensus ad idem, and therefore no binding contract. He was then stopped by the Court.

PER CURIAM. There must be judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.[70]

EMBRY v. HARGADINE-McKITTRICK DRY GOODS CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. 1907. 127 Mo. App. 383, 105 S. W. 777.)

Action by Charles R. Embry against the Hargadine-McKittrick Dry Goods Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

GOODE, J.[71] We dealt with this case on a former appeal (115 Mo. App. 130, 91 S. W. 170). It has been retried, and is again before us for the determination of questions not then reviewed. The appellant was an employé of the respondent company under a written contract to expire December 15, 1903, at a salary of $2,000 per annum. His duties were to attend to the sample department of respondent, of which he was given complete charge. It was his business to select samples for the traveling salesmen of the company, which is a wholesale dry goods concern, to use in selling goods to retail merchants.

Appellant contends that on December 23, 1903, he was re-engaged by respondent, through its president, Thos. H. McKittrick, for another year at the same compensation and for the same duties stipulated in his previous written contract. On March 1, 1904, he was discharged, having been notified in February that, on account of the necessity of retrenching expenses, his services and that of some other employés would no longer be required. The respondent company contends that its president never re-employed appellant after the termination of his written contract, and hence that it had a right to discharge him when it chose. The point with which we are concerned requires an epitome of the testimony of appellant and the counter testimony of McKittrick, the president of the company, in reference to the alleged re-employment.

Appellant testified: That several times prior to the termination of his written contract on December 15, 1903, he had endeavored to get an understanding with McKittrick for another year, but had been put off from time to time. That on December 23d, eight days after the expiration of said contract, he called on McKittrick, in the latter's office, and said to him that as appellant's written employment had lapsed eight days before, and as there were only a few days between then and the 1st of January in which to seek employment with other firms, if respondent wished to retain his services longer he must have a contract for another year, or he would quit respondent's service then and there. That he had been put off twice before and wanted an understanding or contract at once so that he could go ahead without worry. That McKittrick asked him how he was getting along in his department, and appellant said he was very busy, as they were in the height of the season getting men out—had about 110 salesmen on the line and others in preparation. That McKittrick then said: "Go ahead, you're all right. Get your men out, and don't let that worry you." That appellant took McKittrick at his word and worked until February 15th without any question in his mind. It was on February 15th that he was notified his services would be discontinued on March 1st.

McKittrick denied this conversation as related by appellant, and said that, when accosted by the latter on December 23d, he (McKittrick) was working on his books in order to get out a report for a stockholders' meeting, and, when appellant said if he did not get a contract he would leave, that he (McKittrick) said: "Mr. Embry, I am just getting ready for the stockholders' meeting to-morrow. I have no time to take it up now. I have told you before I would not take it up until I had these matters out of the way. You will have to see me at a later time. I said: 'Go back upstairs and get your men out on the road.' I may have asked him one or two other questions relative to the department, I don't remember. The whole conversation did not take more than a minute."

Embry also swore that, when he was notified he would be discharged, he complained to McKittrick about it, as being a violation of their contract, and McKittrick said it was due to the action of the board of directors, and not to any personal action of his, and that others would suffer by what the board had done as well as Embry. Appellant requested an instruction to the jury setting out, in substance, the conversation between him and McKittrick according to his version, and declaring that those facts, if found to be true, constituted a contract between the parties that defendant would pay plaintiff the sum of $2,000 for another year, provided the jury believed from the evidence that plaintiff commenced said work believing he was to have $2,000 for the year's work. This instruction was refused, but the court gave another embodying in substance appellant's version of the conversation, and declaring it made a contract "if you (the jury) find both parties thereby intended and did contract with each other for plaintiff's employment for one year from and including December 23, 1903, at a salary of $2,000 per annum." Embry swore that, on several occasions when he spoke to McKittrick about employment for the ensuing year, he asked for a renewal of his former contract, and that on December 23d, the date of the alleged renewal, he went into Mr. McKittrick's office and told him his contract had expired, and he wanted to renew it for a year, having always worked under year contracts. Neither the refused instruction nor the one given by the court embodied facts quite as strong as appellant's testimony, because neither referred to appellant's alleged statement to McKittrick that unless he was reemployed he would stop work for respondent then and there.

It is assigned for error that the court required the jury, in order to return a verdict for appellant, not only to find the conversation occurred as appellant swore, but that both parties intended by such conversation to contract with each other for plaintiff's employment for the year from December, 1903, at a salary of $2,000. If it appeared from the record that there was a dispute between the parties as to the terms on which appellant wanted re-employment, there might have been sound reason for inserting this clause in the instruction; but no issue was made that they split on terms; the testimony of McKittrick tending to prove only that he refused to enter into a contract with appellant regarding another year's employment until the annual meeting of stockholders was out of the way. Indeed, as to the proposed terms McKittrick agrees with Embry, for the former swore as follows: "Mr. Embry said he wanted to know about the renewal of his contract. Said if he did not have the contract made he would leave." As the two witnesses coincided as to the terms of the proposed re-employment, there was no reason for inserting the above-mentioned clause in the instruction in order that it might be settled by the jury whether or not plaintiff, if employed for one year from December 23, 1903, was to be paid $2,000 a year. Therefore it remains to determine whether or not this part of the instruction was a correct statement of the law in regard to what was necessary to constitute a contract between the parties; that is to say, whether the formation of a contract by what, according to Embry, was said, depended on the intention of both Embry and McKittrick. Or, to put the question more precisely: Did what was said constitute a contract of re-employment on the previous terms irrespective of the intention or purpose of McKittrick?

Judicial opinion and elementary treatises abound in statements of the rule that to constitute a contract there must be a meeting of the minds of the parties, and both must agree to the same thing in the same sense. Generally speaking, this may be true; but it is not literally or universally true. That is to say, the inner intention of parties to a conversation subsequently alleged to create a contract cannot either make a contract of what transpired, or prevent one from arising, if the words used were sufficient to constitute a contract. In so far as their intention is an influential element, it is only such intention as the words or acts of the parties indicate; not one secretly cherished which is inconsistent with those words or acts. * * *

In Smith v. Hughes, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597, 607, it was said: "If, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would believe that he was assenting to the terms proposed by the other party, and that other party upon that belief enters into the contract with him, the man thus conducting himself would be equally bound as if he had intended to agree to the other party's terms." And that doctrine was adopted in Phillip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 256. In 9 Cyc. 245, we find the following text: "The law imputes to a person an intention corresponding to the reasonable meaning of his words and acts. It judges his intention by his outward expressions and excludes all questions in regard to his unexpressed intention. If his words or acts, judged by a reasonable standard, manifest an intention to agree in regard to the matter in question, that agreement is established, and it is immaterial what may be the real, but unexpressed, state of his mind on the subject." Even more pointed was the language of Baron Bramwell in Brown v. Hare, 3 Hurlst. & N. *484, *495: "Intention is immaterial till it manifests itself in an act. If a man intends to buy, and says so to the intended seller, and he intends to sell, and says so to the intended buyer, there is a contract of sale; and so there would be if neither had the intention."

In view of those authorities, we hold that, though McKittrick may not have intended to employ Embry by what transpired between them according to the latter's testimony, yet if what McKittrick said would have been taken by a reasonable man to be an employment, and Embry so understood it, it constituted a valid contract of employment for the ensuing year.

[The court then held that Embry was quite reasonable in giving the construction that he did to McKittrick's words and acts. The judgment was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.] [72]

[72] In Woburn Nat. Bank v. Woods, 77 N. H. 172, 175, 89 Atl. 491 (1914), the court said: "A contract involves what is called a meeting of the minds of the parties. But this does not mean that they must have arrived at a common mental state touching the matter in hand. The standard by which their conduct is judged and their rights are limited is not internal, but external. In the absence of fraud or incapacity, the question is: What did the party say and do? 'The making of a contract does not depend upon the state of the parties' minds; it depends on their overt acts.'"

AYER v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1887. 79 Me. 493, 10 Atl. 495, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353.)

EMERY, J. On report. The defendant telegraph company was engaged in the business of transmitting messages by telegraph between Bangor and Philadelphia, and other points. The plaintiff, a lumber dealer in Bangor, delivered to the defendant company in Bangor, to be transmitted to his correspondent in Philadelphia, the following message: "Will sell 800 M laths, delivered at your wharf, two ten net cash. July shipment. Answer quick." The regular tariff rate was prepaid by the plaintiff for such transmission. The message delivered by the defendant company to the Philadelphia correspondent was as follows: "Will sell 800 M laths, delivered at your wharf, two net cash. July shipment. Answer quick." It will be seen that the important word "ten" in the statement of price was omitted.

The Philadelphia party immediately returned by telegraph the following answer: "Accept your telegraphic offer on laths. Cannot increase price spruce." Letters afterwards passed between the parties, which disclosed the error in the transmission of the plaintiff's message. About two weeks after the discovery of the error, the plaintiff shipped the laths, as per the message received by his correspondent, to-wit, at two dollars per M. He testified that his correspondent insisted he was entitled to the laths at that price, and they were shipped accordingly.

The defendant telegraph company offered no evidence whatever, and did not undertake to account for or explain the mistake in the transmission of the message. The presumption therefore is that the mistake resulted from the fault of the telegraph company. We cannot consider the possibility that it may have resulted from causes beyond the control of the company. In the absence of evidence on that point we must assume that for such an error the company was in fault. Bartlett v. Telegraph Co., 62 Me. 221, 16 Am. Rep. 437.

The fault and consequent liability of the defendant company being thus established, the only remaining question is the extent of that liability in this case. The plaintiff claims it extends to the difference between the market price of the laths and the price at which they were shipped. The defendant claims its liability is limited to the amount paid for the transmission of the message. It claims this limitation on two grounds. * * * [73]

D'Arcy, 201 Mass. 312, 87 N. E. 584 (1909), defendant wrote, "All you get above $2,000 per year you may have as your commission;" plaintiff got a tenant for 5 years at $2,200; held, he was entitled to $1,000; Gibbs v. Wallace, 58 Colo. 364, 147 Pac. 686 (1915); Frankfort Marine Accident & Plate Glass Ins. Co. v. California Artistic Metal & Wire Co., 28 Cal. App. 74, 151 Pac. 176 (1915); Inman Mfg. Co. v. American Cereal Co., 133 Iowa, 71, 110 N. W. 287, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1140, 12 Ann. Cas. 387 (1907); S. F. Bowser & Co. v. Marks, 96 Ark. 113, 131 S. W. 334, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 429, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 357 (1910).

Mistakes are often made in sending code telegrams. Where an offeror used the code word meaning 30,000 bushels, when he intended to offer only 3,000, he was bound to deliver 30,000, unless the offeree knew of the mistake at time of acceptance. Cargill Commission Co. v. Mowery, 99 Kan. 389, 161 Pac. 634, 162 Pac. 313 (1916). But if the code message is so negligently worded as to be unintelligible, the offeree is equally negligent in giving it a meaning, and there is no contract. Falck v. Williams, [1900] A. C. 176.

2. The defendant company also claims that the plaintiff was not in fact damaged to a greater extent than the price paid by him for the transmission. It contends that the plaintiff was not bound by the erroneous message delivered by the company to the Philadelphia party, and hence need not have shipped the laths at the lesser price. This raises the question whether the message written by the sender, and intrusted to the telegraph company for transmission, or the message written out and delivered by the company to the receiver at the other end of the line, as and for the message intended to be sent, is the better evidence of the rights of the receiver against the sender.

The question is important and not easy of solution. It would be hard that the negligence of the telegraph company, or an error in transmission resulting from uncontrollable causes, should impose upon the innocent sender of a message a liability he never authorized nor contemplated. It would be equally hard that the innocent receiver, acting in good faith upon the message as received by him, should through such error lose all claim upon the sender. If one, owning merchandise, write a message offering to sell at a certain price, it would seem unjust that the telegraph company could bind him to sell at a less price, by making that error in the transmission. On the other hand, the receiver of the offer may in good faith, upon the strength of the telegram as received by him, have sold all the merchandise to arrive, perhaps at the same rate. It would seem unjust that he should have no claim for the merchandise. If an agent receive instructions by telegraph from his principal, and in good faith act upon them as expressed in the message delivered him by the company, it would seem he ought to be held justified, though there were an error in the transmission.

It is evident that in case of an error in the transmission of a telegram either the sender or receiver must often suffer loss. As between the two, upon whom should the loss finally fall? We think the safer and more equitable rule, and the rule the public can most easily adapt itself to, is that, as between sender and receiver, the party who selects the telegraph as the means of communication shall bear the loss caused by the errors of the telegraph. The first proposer can select one of many modes of communication, both for the proposal and the answer. The receiver has no such choice, except as to his answer. If he cannot safely act upon the message he receives through the agency selected by the proposer, business must be seriously hampered and delayed. The use of the telegraph has become so general, and so many transactions are based on the words of the telegram received, that any other rule would now be impracticable.

[73] The court's discussion of one of these grounds is omitted.

Of course, the rule above stated presupposes the innocence of the receiver, and that there is nothing to cause him to suspect an error. If there be anything in the message, or in the attendant circumstances, or in the prior dealings of the parties, or in anything else, indicating a probable error in the transmission, good faith on the part of the receiver may require him to investigate before acting. Neither does the rule include forged messages, for in such case the supposed sender did not make any use of the telegraph.

The authorities are few and somewhat conflicting, but there are several in harmony with our conclusion upon this point. In Durkee v. Railroad Co., 29 Vt. 137, it was held that where the sender himself elected to communicate by telegraph, the message received by the other party is the original evidence of any contract. In Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431, the message received from the telegraph company was admitted as the original and best evidence of a contract, binding on the sender. In Morgan v. People, 59 Ill. 58, it was said that the telegram received was the original, and it was held that the sheriff receiving such a telegram from the judgment creditor was bound to follow it as it read. There are dicta to the same effect in Wilson v. Railway Co., 31 Minn. 481, 18 N. W. 291, and Howley v. Whipple, 48 N. H. 488.

Telegraph Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760, is almost a parallel case. The sender wrote his message: "Can deliver hundred turpentine at sixty-four." As received from the telegraph company it read: "Can deliver hundred turpentine at sixty," the word "four" being omitted. The receiver immediately telegraphed an acceptance. The sender shipped the turpentine, and drew for the price at 64. The receiver refused to pay more than 60. The sender accepted the 60, and sued the telegraph company for the difference between 60 and the market. It was urged, as here, that the sender was not bound to accept the 60, as that was not his offer. The court held, however, that there was a completed contract at 60, that the sender must fulfill it, and could recover his consequent loss of the telegraph company.

It follows that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover the difference between the two dollars and the market price, as to laths. The evidence shows that the difference was 10 cents per M.

Action by Henry Steinmeyer and others against John Schroeppel, which was consolidated with a suit by Schroeppel against Henry Steinmeyer and others. From a decree of the Appellate Court, reversing a decree, canceling a contract between the parties, Henry Steinmeyer and others appeal. Affirmed.

CARTWRIGHT, J. Appellants are in the lumber business at Collinsville, Ill., and appellee is a building contractor at the same place. On June 10, 1905, appellee was about to erect a building for himself, and left at the office of appellants an itemized list of lumber, containing 34 items, on which he desired them to give him a price. Appellants' bookkeeper set down upon that list, opposite each item, the selling price, but did not add up the column. If correctly added, the column would have footed up $1,867. One of the appellants made the addition, and, by mistake, made the total $1,446. The bookkeeper copied the list on one of appellants' billheads without the prices opposite the different items, and wrote at the bottom, "Above for $1,446," and delivered the paper to appellee the same evening. Appellee received bids for the lumber from two other firms, which were in the neighborhood of $1,890. On June 16th appellee called at the office of appellants and accepted their offer. He did not bring the paper with him, but the bookkeeper made another copy and at the bottom of it wrote the same memorandum. "Above for $1,446." One of the appellants signed it, and a memorandum was then written below to the effect that if delivery was made within 30 days the appellants were to have $20 more than the estimate, but if delivery was made after 30 days appellee was to have a rebate of $20 from the estimate, and this was signed by both parties. The same evening one of the appellants, looking over the bill, found that he had not added the amounts correctly, and the next morning one of them notified appellee by telephone of the mistake, and refused to furnish the lumber for less than $1,867. Appellants also sent appellee a notice that they had found an error of $421, and the estimate should read $1,867 instead of $1,446. Appellants did not furnish the lumber, and

The German Civil Code, §§ 120, 122, follows this rule but requires an indemnity, perhaps somewhat in the nature of a division of the loss.

If the offeree knew or ought to have known that there was an error, there is no contract. Germain Fruit Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 137 Cal. 598, 70 Pac. 658, 59 L. R. A. 575 (1902). Cf. J. L. appellee purchased it at the next lowest bid from another firm, and sued appellants for the difference between what he paid for the lumber, and what they had agreed to furnish it for.

Appellants then filed a bill to enjoin the prosecution of the suit at law, and to have the contract canceled on account of the mistake. The suits were consolidated and tried together without a jury. The circuit court entered a decree, canceling the contract, and restraining appellee from prosecuting his suit at law. The Appellate Court for the Fourth District reversed the decree, and remanded the cause to the circuit court, with directions to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill for want of equity. Appellants applied to the Appellate Court for a certificate of importance, which was granted, and this appeal was prosecuted.

The jurisdiction of equity to grant the remedy of cancellation because of a mistake of fact by one party to a contract is well recognized. Mutual consent is requisite to the creation of a contract, and if there is a mistake of fact by one of the parties going to the essence of the contract, no agreement is, in fact, made. 2 Kent's Com. 477. If there is apparently a valid contract in writing, but by reason of a mistake of fact by one of the parties, not due to his negligence, the contract is different with respect to the subject-matter or terms from what was intended, equity will give to such party a remedy by cancellation where the parties can be placed in statu quo. The ground for relief is, that by reason of the mistake there was no mutual assent to the terms of the contract. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 618. The fact concerning which the mistake was made must be material to the transaction and affect its substance, and the mistake must not result from want of the care and diligence exercised by persons of reasonable prudence under the same circumstances. Bonney v. Stoughton, 122 Ill. 536, 13 N. E. 833.

In this case the mistake was in the addition of the figures set down by the bookkeeper. The price of each item was written correctly, but appellants claimed that one item of about $400 was placed somewhat to the right, and in adding the column the 4 was counted in the 10-column instead of the 100-column. If that was done, it does not account for the difference of $421. But if it did, it would only show a want of ordinary care and attention. If the figures were not exactly in line, the fact could hardly escape notice by a competent business man giving reasonable attention to what he was doing. There was no evidence tending to prove any special circumstances excusing the blunder.

The case of Board of School Com'rs v. Bender, 36 Ind. App. 164, 72 N. E. 154 (decided by the Appellate Court of Indiana, Division No. 2), relied on by appellants, differs from this in various respects, one of which is that Bender was excusable for the mistake. His complaint alleged that he was misinformed by the architect that his bid must be in at or before 4 o'clock, when, in fact, he was allowed until 8 o'clock; that in ignorance of the fact and for want of time he was hurried in submitting his bid, and had no opportunity for verification of his estimate, and that under those circumstances he turned two leaves of his estimate book by mistake and omitted an estimate on a large part of the work. The case involved the question whether the bidder had forfeited a sum deposited as a guaranty that he would enter into a contract, and when notified that his bid was accepted, having discovered his mistake, he informed the architect and immediately gave notice that he would not enter into the contract. By the terms of the bid it was intended that if the bid was accepted a contract would be made, but the bid was not the contract contemplated by the parties and the bidder never did enter into the contract. The court concluded that the minds of the parties never, in fact, met, because the bidder fell into the error without his fault. In the case of Harran v. Foley, 62 Wis. 584, 22 N. W. 837, there was no agreement, for the reason that the minds of the parties never met. The plaintiff claimed to have purchased of the defendant some cattle for $161.50, but the defendant intended to state the price at $261.50. When the defendant was informed that the plaintiff understood the price to be $161.50 he refused to deliver the cattle and tendered back $20 received on the purchase price. No agreement was, in fact, made, since the statement of the price by the seller was clearly a mistake.

A mistake which will justify relief in equity must affect the substance of the contract, and not a mere incident or the inducement for entering into it. The mistake of the appellants did not relate to the subject-matter of the contract, its location, identity, or amount, and there was neither belief in the existence of a fact which did not exist or ignorance of any fact material to the contract which did exist. The contract was exactly what each party understood it to be and it expressed what was intended by each. If it can be set aside on account of the error in adding up the amounts representing the selling price, it could be set aside for a mistake in computing the percentage of profits which appellants intended to make, or on account of a mistake in the cost of the lumber to them, or any other miscalculation on their part. If equity would relieve on account of such a mistake there would be no stability in contracts, and we think the Appellate Court was right in concluding that the mistake was not of such a character as to entitle the appellants to the relief prayed for.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH v. KROPP.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1916. 135 Minn. 115, 160 N. W. 500, L. R. A. 1917D, 741.)

Action by the St. Nicholas Church against the Merchants' National Bank of St. Cloud, which interpleaded Carl Kropp. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying new trial, the interpleaded defendant appeals. Order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions.

HOLT, J.[76] Plaintiff, a religious body, desired to erect a church. It advertised for bids. Carl Kropp and two others responded. Each bid was accompanied by a certified check in the sum of $1,000 to insure the entering of a contract by the successful bidder to build the church according to the plans and specifications upon which the bids were made. When the three bids were opened in the presence of the bidders, Kropp's, being for $30,973, was found to be the lowest, about $3,900 below the next highest. Thereupon the committee of plaintiff in charge of the building of the church voted to award the work to Kropp and notified him that his bid was accepted. The contract was not then drawn, owing to the illness of the architect. The same day Kropp, on his return home, discovered that through some oversight the item of the structural iron required in the building had not been included in his bid. The value of furnishing this in place was estimated at $2,350. The next day he notified the building committee of his mistake, and that he could not enter the contract unless he received at least $2,000 more than the bid. This the committee declined to give. Kropp refused to enter the contract and stopped payment of his certified check. The erection of the church building was awarded to one Lange for $32,775 on a belated bid received three or four days after the others had been opened.

This action was brought by plaintiff against the bank upon which the check was drawn. The bank answered, deposited the amount of the check in court, and asked the court to require Kropp to interplead. This was done. Kropp's answer was that he had made a mistake in his bid as above indicated; that he at once, upon discovery of the mistake notified plaintiff; that this was done before all the bids were received; that plaintiff knew of the mistake made by him; and that the bid was withdrawn before accepted. Appellant demanded a jury trial. This was denied, but the court submitted three issues to a jury which found thereon: That the building committee awarded the contract to Kropp on the day the bids were opened; that Kropp made an honest mistake in his bid without being negligent; and that the building committee had no knowledge of Kropp's mistake when it accepted his bid. The court made findings of fact, adopting therein the verdict of the jury, and conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to the fund. A new trial was denied, and Kropp appeals. * * *

The jury and court found that in his bid Kropp had made an honest mistake without negligence. The mistake amounted to more than $2,000. Does this entitle him to any relief when plaintiff was not to blame in any way for the mistake, and had no knowledge that Kropp had made it? We think the facts herein bring the case within this principle governing a unilateral mistake stated in section 138i, Story's Equity Jurisprudence:

"But where the mistake is of so fundamental a character that the minds of the parties have never, in fact, met, or where an unconscionable advantage has been gained, by mere mistake or misapprehension, and there was no gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff, either in falling into the error or in not sooner making redress, and no intervening rights have accrued, and the parties may still be placed in statu quo, equity will interfere, in its discretion, to prevent intolerable injustice."

In Hearne v. Marine Ins. Co., 20 Wall. 488, 22 L. Ed. 395, it is said: "A mistake on one side may be a ground for rescinding, but not for reforming, a contract. Where the minds of the parties have not met, there is no contract, and hence none to be rectified."

The question here is whether a mistake of over $2,000 in the bid upon the construction of this church is merely incidental or fundamental. We think the amount is so large that it is unreasonable to suppose that Kropp would have made the bid he did make, if he had known that the structural iron work was not included therein. Here the finding is that it was an honest mistake made without negligence. Plaintiff was apprised of the error at once. No intervening rights accrued. The belated bid which plaintiff accepted was a trifle less than the one Kropp intended to make. There can be no question of not placing plaintiff in statu quo. It did nothing in reliance upon Kropp's bid, and did not change its position in the least between the time it notified him of the acceptance and the time it received notice of his mistake. This is said advisedly; for, although the checks of the other two bidders were returned to them, plaintiff accepted another bid obtained without any effort on its part, and in an amount very much lower than either of the two upon which the checks were returned.

In this situation, we think, the same principle which denied a specific performance in the case of a unilateral mistake in Buckley v. Patterson, 39 Minn. 250, 39 N. W. 490, should here interfere and cancel the bid of Kropp. In Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 33 N. W. 38, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, the doctrine is recognized that a contract "may be rescinded or canceled for the mistake of one only of the parties. * * * Of course, this should not be done unless the parties can be replaced in their former position." The bid was, at most, but a step in the making of the contract. It was well understood that before Kropp would be permitted to begin the erection of the building he must execute a formal contract and give adequate bond. The contract was therefore wholly executory. * * *

In Scott v. Hall, 58 N. J. Eq. 42, 43 Atl. 50, where the vendor in a conditional sale contract agreed to transfer the chattels to the one in possession for $525 on the mistaken supposition that there was $650 due on the contract instead of $950, and the check for $525 was already in the hands of the vendor's agent when the mistake was discovered, the court rescinded the bargain, Vice Chancellor Pitney saying:

"Now it seems to me plain enough that, having agreed upon a sum based on $650 being due, when there was in fact $950 due, this court ought to relieve him from a contract made upon such a mistaken basis, unless before notice the other party has so acted upon it that it would be unjust to him to be compelled to submit to rescission. Now in this case notice was given immediately to defendant's counsel and while the affair was unfinished and not concluded in the manner in which the parties intended to conclude it; for it was their intention that there should be a written transfer of title."

So here there was to be a formal contract executed. That a mistake by one party as to price is material and ground for holding that the minds of the parties did not meet, see Rowland v. New York, N. Haven & H. Ry. Co., 61 Conn. 103, 23 Atl. 755, 29 Am. St. Rep. 175; De Voin v. De Voin, 76 Wis. 66, 44 N. W. 839; and Webster v. Cecil, 30 Beav. 62.

Steinmeyer v. Schroeppel, 226 Ill. 9, 80 N. E. 564, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 114, 117 Am. St. Rep. 224, is really not in favor of plaintiff on the findings here made; for it was there held that the error in the computation occurred through the negligence of the party who asserted the mistake. Moreover it is clear that in a case of that kind, where the lumber, the subject of the contract, had been used, it was impossible to place the parties in statu quo. However, the court therein recognized the existence of the rule we hold applicable to the facts in the case at bar. We think also, where the parties have entered to such an extent upon a performance of their contract that it becomes difficult to restore them to their former position, rescission will not be decreed. To this class belongs Tatum v. Coast Lumber Co., 16 Idaho, 471, 101 Pac. 957, and other authorities cited in the annotation to that case in 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1109.

Such also is the rule where a bid has been acted upon so that cancellation would be unjust or inequitable to the party having accepted it without knowledge of the other party's mistake. Young v. Springer, 113 Minn. 382, 129 N. W. 773. The case of Crilly v. Board of Education, 54 Ill. App. 371, is very similar to the instant case, except there it was found that the mistake was due to the negligence of the party making the mistake, while here the finding is to the contrary, and that very fact brings the case within the operation of the rule. So far as we are aware the only decision upon facts as here found, supporting plaintiff's position is Brown v. Levy, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 69 S. W. 255; but therein no reference is made to the well-established equitable principle permitting relief from unilateral mistakes, and we are not inclined to follow its lead.

Our conclusion is that the order denying a new trial should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the court below to amend the conclusion of law so as to rescind and cancel the bid and award the fund in court to Kropp.

defendant appeals from the order denying his motion in the alternative for judgment or a new trial.

Plaintiff's contention, in brief, was: About the last of July, 1912, he offered to bid on the roofing and sheet metal work required in defendant's contract. Lacking time to put the bid, or estimate, in formal shape, he, on July 27th, gave to defendant's estimator the figures for the various items, namely, $963 for the new part of the building, $2,410 for the old part, $400 for registers, and $251 for metal covered doors; the total bid being about $4,025. On August 1st he was told the bid came too late, but, nevertheless, he could send it in in writing. Plaintiff undertook to do so on the 3d, but now claims the item of $963 for the new part of the building was left out through oversight. A few days thereafter, upon inquiring about his chance of securing the work, he was told that his bid was too high. However, he persisted in the attempt to induce defendant to use, instead of the specified metal doors, metal doors of plaintiff's make. He succeeded, and late in August, was awarded a separate contract for the doors for $295. Nothing further was heard from defendant until in September, when plaintiff was told to go ahead with the work. Defendant denies ever receiving any estimate, bid, or figures, except the written bid.

The court, in submitting the case, charged that the burden was upon plaintiff to show, by a fair preponderance of testimony, that when, in September, 1912, defendant gave plaintiff the direction to proceed with the work, it was done with knowledge of plaintiff's mistake of $963 in the written bid and of his resting under the belief that it conformed to the oral bid of $4,025, so that it might be truthfully found that defendant did not accept the written bid of $3,062 in good faith, then plaintiff could recover the reasonable value, otherwise the verdict must be limited to the amount tendered in the answer. We believe this theory sound. If cognizant of the mistake in plaintiff's bid, and that the latter was unaware of its occurrence, defendant had no right to claim that, when he told plaintiff to go ahead with the work, their minds met upon the price mistakenly stated in the bid. Nor should plaintiff be allowed to profit by his own mistake, so as to hold defendant to the oral bid. There was a failure to enter a binding contract. One cannot snap up an offer or bid knowing that it was made in mistake. Page on Contracts, § 86; Elliott on Contracts, § 107; Harran v. Foley, 62 Wis. 584, 22 N. W. 837; Everson & Co. v. The order is affirmed.

JONES v. CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO.

SEDGWICK, J.[79] The plaintiff brought this action in the district court for Lancaster county to recover the value of a carload of flour alleged to have been converted by the defendant. The flour was shipped by the Washburn-Crosby Company of Minneapolis, and a controversy arose between that company and the plaintiff as to the right to the flour. It was the duty of the defendant railroad company to deliver the flour to the true owner, and it was delivered to the Minneapolis company. The question, then, is whether the Minneapolis company or this plaintiff was the owner of the flour and entitled to the delivery thereof. The court instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which was done, and judgment entered thereon, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The Minneapolis company had contracted the flour to one Furman, of York, some time before the shipment. In the meantime the price of flour had advanced to nearly double the contract price to Furman. By mistake of the company, the Furman order had been entered as an order of this plaintiff, and it was by mistake shipped to Lincoln, consigned to the shipper's order, with instructions to notify the plaintiff. A draft for the price of the flour as contracted to Furman was attached to the bill of lading, and when this plaintiff was notified he paid the draft and demanded the flour. In the meantime the Minneapolis company had instructed the railroad company not to deliver the flour to the plaintiff, and to return the flour to the shipper at Omaha, which the railroad company did.

"Where a person contracts with another, believing him to be one with whom he intends to contract, while as a matter of fact it is another person, there is no agreement, as where * * * a person obtains goods by fraudulently impersonating a third person to whom the owner supposes he is selling, or by pretending to be the agent of a third person to whom the owner supposes he is selling." 35 Cyc. 60. It appears that the Minneapolis company supposed it had contracted this flour to this plaintiff, when, as a matter of fact, it had contracted to Furman, and did not ship the flour as an offer to sell to the plaintiff, and had no intention of making a contract of sale with the plaintiff. The minds of the parties, therefore, never met, so as to amount to a contract of sale. The plaintiff concedes that he had not ordered these goods, but testifies that he had instructed his son to order flour, and when he was notified of the shipment of this flour he supposed in good faith that it was in response to an order by his son. Thus it appears again that the

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1912. 150 Wis. 578, 137 N. W. 773.)

Action by the Jacob Johnson Fish Company against John Hawley, administrator. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Action for damages on contract.

Plaintiff applied to defendant's intestate, Batt. Hawley, to engage the tug "Tramp" in the fishing industry on Lake Superior for the season, using these words: "If tug 'Tramp' is not engaged will pay $300 for season. Wire me answer please." Defendant promptly replied: "Tug not engaged. Go for three hundred for thirty days, you pay expenses one way. Wire answer." Plaintiff answered: "Terms accepted, engage Capt. Garland, writing." Also wrote inclosing duplicate forms for leases, and requesting execution thereof and return of one duplicate so that the matters might be regarded as settled, assuring defendant that the lessee would pay expenses one way and saying, "We wired you this morning that your terms were accepted and to engage Capt. Garland. And we will write him also and engage his services. We want no other man if we can get him. We expect to want the boat Nov. 15th unless we wire you otherwise, you may be here on that date. Please have lease signed before notary public."

Upon Mr. Hawley receiving the papers, he promptly complained by

A distinction has been drawn where a defrauder deals in person with the party he is defrauding, but assumes the name and credit of a third person. telephone that the terms specified therein were not according to the offer, and the condition, as to hiring Capt. Garland, was objectionable. Plaintiff acknowledged the error as to terms; but, does not appear to have withdrawn the condition, mentioned in the letter, as to hiring Captain Garland. However, plaintiff followed the telephone communication by a letter, using these words: "If there is anything about the contract we sent you for your signature that you do not like, draw up one and send it to us at once. A contract is, really, not necessary, as we have your acceptance; but, it is best, in cases of this kind, to have a thorough understanding so there will be no friction later. * * * We are sorry to hear that you do not approve of Capt. Garland as we consider him a good man for the business and we hope that you will decide to forget the past and let him come up with her." To that reply was promptly made that the tug had been leased to other parties. Plaintiff thereupon hired the tug "Brower" which went out of commission in a few days and then secured the tug "Arthur" for remainder of the season. Because of inferiority of the "Arthur" plaintiff was compelled to confine the fishing operations to a different district than could have been reached by the tug "Tramp." Only 50 tons of fish were secured during the season. The party who used the Tramp secured 122½ tons. The net profit on a ton of fish was $8.

At the close of the evidence, a motion in defendant's behalf for a directed verdict was denied, upon the ground that the response by Mr. Hawley to plaintiff's telegram, contained the words, "Close contract," "Terms accepted;" that the reference to Capt. Garland was merely advisory and that the letter which followed did not change the matter. The cause was submitted to the jury with directions to find for the plaintiff. * * *

The jury returned a verdict for $250, and judgment was rendered thereon.

MARSHALL, J.[81] * * * The trial court construed the occurrences between Mr. Hawley and respondent as having operated to close a contract for the use of the former's tug boat, irrespective of whether Capt. Garland was secured to command it, prior to receipt by Mr. Hawley of the letter of November 3, 1907. The reasoning by which such conclusion was reached appears in the record, is sufficiently mentioned in the statement and seems infirm in several particulars.

Much stress was placed upon the word sent by Mr. Hawley to respondent in reply to the latter's offer to pay $300 for the season's use of the tug. It is said in the judge's opinion, that these words were used: "Close contract" "Terms accepted." We do not find the words "Close contract" were used—only the words "Terms accepted. Engage Capt. Garland, writing." The only terms mentioned in the offer were in these words: "Go for three hundred for thirty days. You pay expenses one way." That was referred to in plaintiff's letter of November 3d as an acceptance which closed a contract; but it is plainly not that. It was only a counter offer to the one mentioned in the communication to Mr. Hawley, offering $300 for use of the tug for the season to depend on conditions. The counter offer covered both subjects. So up to this point there, certainly, had not been any meeting of minds. The reply to the counter offer accepted the terms as to price and expense; but, added the words "Engage Capt. Garland, writing." Such reply was quite ambiguous. The natural inference therefrom was that the terms mentioned by Mr. Hawley, as to compensation and length of the season, were accepted; but that Capt. Garland should be engaged to command the boat and an explanation would be made by letter. The words "Engage Capt. Garland" and the word "writing" were tied together and prettly plainly suggested that the contractual details were still to be settled and the signification of the words "Engage Capt. Garland, writing" would be made known in due course. Now what followed by letter does not appear to have been given due weight by the trial judge in coming to a conclusion, as to whether the reference to Capt. Garland was merely suggestive or matter of condition. Standing alone, it might fairly be construed to be the former. Mr. Hawley seems to have been somewhat uncertain and so made no immediate reply; but, waited for the letter. When that came it, doubtless, seemed quite plain to him that the actual closing of the contract was, in the judgment of respondent, to wait upon acceptance of its choice of a person to command the boat and execution of a written lease as to terms.

The letter stated with reference to the proposed lease, "Please sign one copy and return it to us at once so that we will know the matter is settled." That plainly indicated it was not to be understood a contract had been closed in advance of the writing being signed. The letter further, unmistakably, indicates that the lease, as written, was not intended to cover the entire matter. It made no reference to the condition contained in Mr. Hawley's letter as to respondent paying expenses one way, nor to the ambiguous language in the telegram: "Engage Capt. Garland." The former was covered in the letter thus: "We have not mentioned this matter in the lease; but we agree to pay expenses one way en route." The latter was covered thus: "We wired you this morning that your terms were accepted and to engage Capt. Garland, and we will write him also and engage his services. We want no other man if we can get him." Thus emphasizing the words of acceptance as referring only to the price for use of the boat and the term of service, and giving the reference to Capt. Garland the cast of a condition.

How could Mr. Hawley otherwise have understood the telegram than as suggested in connection with the matter? If it be true that respondent did not mean to convey such an idea; but used language leading Mr. Hawley, in the exercise of ordinary care, to suppose it did, it must bear the burden of its fault. He had a right to act upon the meaning which respondent's words conveyed to him, if such, reasonably, might be the meaning an ordinary careful person would read out of such language under the same or similar circumstances. The letter not only declared that respondent wanted no other person to command the boat if he could be secured; but, took the matter of settling the question out of Mr. Hawley's hands, saying it would write Capt. Garland and engage him. Nothing occurred thereafter indicating that Mr. Hawley was agreeable to placing his boat in charge of Garland. On the contrary he made known, promptly, by telephone, that he would not accede to that, but stand by his choice which was Capt. McClain. It does not appear that respondent receded till the letter of November 3, 1909, was written. There the counter offer made by Mr. Hawley October 27th before, was referred to as an acceptance, —a very singular circumstance—showing a purpose to claim the existence of a contract by a misconstruction of Mr. Hawley's telegram. There was nothing in the nature of an acceptance until the telegram was sent by respondent in response to Mr. Hawley's counter offer. Note the peculiar language of respondent's letter: "On the day we received your wired acceptance of our offer we had almost concluded a deal for the 'Curry'; but were very glad that we did not have to engage her as she is altogether too slow. Now, however, we cannot, possibly, get along without your boat as all other boats suitable for herring fishing have been engaged." That was followed by language suggesting consent to Capt. McClain as commander of the boat; but still showing preference for Capt. Garland.

It seems clear that respondent did not recede from its demand until it found it could not obtain the use of the boat on the condition it had imposed and that there was no other boat obtainable. Before the November 3d letter was received Mr. Hawley had leased his boat to another party. Had the trial court given proper significance to the letter explaining the first reference to Garland, instead of leaving it entirely out of view, as is clearly indicated in the opinion was done on the motion to direct a verdict, and in some way viewed the case as if respondent's reply to Mr. Hawley's counter offer contained the words "close contract" when no such words were therein, it seems clear that the conclusion would not have been reached that by such telegram, the minds of the parties met and a contract was closed, irrespective of whether Capt. Garland was engaged to command the boat or not.

In view of the foregoing, it is considered that the motion to direct a verdict should have been granted.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded with directions to render judgment in favor of the defendant dismissing the cause with costs.

MORSE v. KENNEY.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1914. 87 Vt. 445, 89 Atl. 865.)

Action by Cleo D. Morse against Patrick Kenney. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts. Judgment affirmed.

TAYLOR, J. This is an action of general assumpsit. Plea the general issue and trial by court. The plaintiff is a livery stable keeper and seeks to recover for the board and care of a certain horse. One Badlam was the owner of the horse in question which was being kept for him by the plaintiff. On May 25, 1911, the defendant, a farmer, went to the plaintiff's stable to purchase a horse for use on his farm. The plaintiff being absent, his servant, one Spaulding, who was in charge of the stable, told the defendant that the Badlam horse was for sale; that it was a good work horse, suitable for defendant's use on his farm; that it was able to draw reasonable loads; and that it was worth $50. Spaulding called Badlam by telephone and had some talk with him (the nature of which and whether in the hearing of the defendant does not appear from the findings), upon which he sold the horse to the defendant for $50. The defendant paid the purchase price to Spaulding for Badlam and took the horse home.

The defendant had not had much experience in dealing in horses and was not much acquainted with their value. He relied wholly upon Spaulding's representations, believing them to be true. The next day he attempted to use the horse and found it "weak in its hind quarters," unable to draw a small load, and unfit to perform ordinary farm work. The defendant at once returned the horse to the plaintiff's stable, found Spaulding there, claimed the horse was not as represented, and asked to leave the horse where he got it; but Spaulding refused to accept the horse back and would not allow the defendant to put it in the stable. The defendant hitched the horse to a ring just outside the stable and went immediately to Badlam's place of business, where he demanded the return of his money, which Badlam refused. On plaintiff's return later the same day he found the horse hitched outside; knowing that the defendant had left it there for Badlam he put it in the stable, fed and cared for it, and on the same day wrote the defendant: "Your mare is here and it is 25¢ a feed." Upon receiving this letter the defendant replied: "The mare you refer to is not mine. Therefore don't look to me for any pay for her feed." Plaintiff kept the horse until July 12th, when this suit was brought for its board and care.

Can the plaintiff recover in general assumpsit on the foregoing facts? If so, it must be upon the theory of an implied promise to pay for the board and care of the horse.

There are two kinds of implied contracts, as the term is ordinarily used in the books: (1) Where the minds of the parties meet and their meeting results in an unexpressed agreement; (2) where there is no meeting of minds. Harley v. United States, 198 U. S. 229, 25 Sup. Ct. 634, 49 L. Ed. 1029. The former class embraces true contracts which are implied in the sense that the fact of the meeting of minds is inferred. Such contracts are more accurately defined as resting upon an implied promise in fact. The latter class embraces contractual obligations implied by the law where none in fact exist.

In many cases where there is no contract, the law upon equitable grounds imposes an obligation often called quasi contractual. Harriman on Con. § 20. Such obligations are not contracts in the proper sense, since they are created by law and not by the parties. Clark on Con. 14, 27. In such so-called contracts the law creates a fictitious promise for the purpose of allowing the remedy by action of assumpsit. Though created by law and clothed with the semblance of a contract, the obligation is not a contract at all. The proper term for such obligations is "quasi contracts," a term borrowed from the Roman law. Clark on Con. 752. They are called "quasi contracts" because, as the term implies, they are not contracts at all, but have a semblance of contract in that they may be enforced by an action of assumpsit. Keener, Quasi Con. 3. Much of the apparent confusion in the cases arises from a failure to distinguish clearly between implied contracts in fact and contracts implied in law, or constructive contracts.

The plaintiff cannot maintain this action as upon an implied promise in fact, for such a promise is implied from the understanding of the parties, inferred as a question of fact from their conduct and the surrounding circumstances; such facts and circumstances as show, according to the ordinary course of dealing and the common understanding of men, a mutual intent to contract. Wisconsin Steel Co. v. Maryland Steel Co., 203 Fed. 403, 121 C. C. A. 507. It is never inferred against the express understanding of the parties. Lunay v. Vantyne, 40 Vt. 501. The defendant's assent is necessary to such a promise. Mathie v. Hancock, 78 Vt. 414, 63 Atl. 143.

The source of the obligation, as in express contracts, is the intention of the parties. Bliss v. Hoyt's Estate, 70 Vt. 534, 41 Atl. 1026. It is implied only when the facts warrant the inference of mutual expectation; the defendant expecting to pay for the service and the plaintiff performing it relying upon that understanding. Parkhurst v. Krellinger, 69 Vt. 375, 38 Atl. 67. It is implied only in this: It is inferred from the conduct of the parties instead of from their spoken words; or, in other words, the contract is evidenced by conduct instead of by words.

Unless the party benefited has conducted himself in such a manner that his assent may fairly be inferred therefrom, he is not bound to pay. Johnson v. B. & M. R. Co., 69 Vt. 521, 38 Atl. 267; Bliss v. Hoyt's Estate, supra. Here the services sued for were performed in face of the express and emphatic denial of liability by the defendant.

Do the facts found bring the plaintiff within the other class of implied contracts? In case of constructive or quasi contracts, the law infers the promise without reference to the intention of the party, and often against his express dissent, when he is under legal obligation, paramount to his will, to perform some duty. It was such an implied promise that is referred to in Penniman et al. v. Patchin, 5 Vt. 346, 353, cited by the plaintiff, wherein it was said: "The law does in many cases imply a promise against the express dissent of the party." An implied promise of this kind rests upon the equitable doctrine that a man shall not be allowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another. Keener, Quasi Con. 19. The application of this principle is illustrated by the action of assumpsit for money had and received, which lies when one has the money of another which he has no right to retain, but which, ex æquo et bono, he should pay over to the other. In such case no promise need be proved, because from such relation between the parties, the law will imply a debt and give this action founded on the equity of the plaintiff's case, as it were on a contract, quasi ex contractu, and upon this debt founds the requisite undertaking to pay. Clark on Con. 757. Such is the case of one receiving money paid him by mistake, or of one obtaining money fraudulently. Bliss v. Hoyt's Estate, supra.

In Wojahn v. Nat. Bank of Oshkosh, 144 Wis. 646, 129 N. W. 1068, it is said: "A 'quasi contract' arises where there is a legal duty to respond in money, which by legal fiction may be enforced as on an implied promise; but in such case there is no element of contract so called, but there is only the duty to which the law affixes a legal obligation of performance, as in case of a promise between the parties." To the same effect is a recent case in Illinois: "A quasi or implied contract is one where liability exists from implication of law arising from facts and circumstances, independent of agreement or presumed intention, based on the doctrine of unjust enrichment; the implied agreement being one defining the duty of the defendant rather than his intention." Board of Com'rs v. Bloomington, 253 Ill. 164, 97 N. E. 280, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 471. The latter case contains a lucid discussion of the subject. The same doctrine is recognized in Mathie v. Hancock, 78 Vt. 414, 417, 63 Atl. 143. The distinction has been tersely stated in these words: "In the case of contracts, the agreement defines the duty, while in case of quasi contracts the duty defines the contract." Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. 465. See, also, C. H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Gaffney, 65 Ohio St. 104, 61 N. E. 152.

Applying these principles to the facts in this case, it is evident that plaintiff cannot recover. The same result is reached whether the attempt by the defendant to rescind the sale is regarded as effectual or ineffectual. If effectual, then the horse was no longer his, and confessedly no principle of equity and good conscience would demand that the law imply a contract for its keeping against his express dissent. If ineffectual, and for that reason the horse remained his, when the plaintiff, knowing the circumstances under which the horse was left by the defendant outside his stable, saw fit to take charge of and care for it, he acted as a volunteer. It cannot be said that the horse was left in the plaintiff's possession so that a duty to care for it was cast upon him. Mathie v. Hancock, supra. To be sure the defendant had asked Spaulding to receive the horse back, but this request was coupled with a demand for the return of the purchase money, and his request was denied.

The fact that the property is a live animal, in the absence of special circumstances raising a duty to care for it, does not change the situation. The plaintiff cannot be held liable on an implied contract to pay for that which he expressly declines to have done on his account, unless the law imposes upon him an obligation to do something which he declines to do, and which must be done to meet the legal requirement. There is no such obligation upon one to retain and preserve his property, whether it be live animals or anything else. He may abandon or destroy it, if he pleases (Keith v. De Bussigney et al., 179 Mass. 255, 60 N. E. 614), subject of course to prohibitions of the statute against cruelty to animals. The facts of this case do not disclose such necessity for the plaintiff's interference, on grounds of humanity or otherwise, as would authorize him to care for the horse at the defendant's expense against his protest. The general rule is as was said in State v. St. Johnsbury, 59 Vt. 332, 342, 10 Atl. 531, 535: "One cannot thrust himself upon me and make me his debtor whether I will or not." The plaintiff fails to bring himself within the exceptions to this rule. This being so, he must be taken at the best to be a mere volunteer and so precluded from recovering. Keener, Quasi Con. 349; Johnson v. B. & M. R. Co., supra.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERTS v. JAMES.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1912. 83 N. J. Law, 492, 85 Atl. 244, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 859.)

Action by William T. B. Roberts against Benjamin F. James. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and venire de novo awarded.

Action by vendor against purchaser to recover purchase price of lots. The written agreement of sale requires the payment of the purchase price in monthly installments, and provides that, upon default in payment, the vendor may treat the whole purchase money remaining unpaid as immediately due and payable. The deed is to be delivered upon payment of the whole purchase money, and the purchaser, it is provided, shall have no right of possession until the deed is delivered. No installment of purchase money has been paid. The defendant (the purchaser) has never had possession. He defended upon the ground that the contract was induced by fraudulent representations of the plaintiff's agent, Sands, by whom alone the contract on the part of the plaintiff was made. The lots were in a great field, and there was evidence that Sands represented that there was going to be a hotel near by at a spot pointed out by him, and that there was to be a railway station, cement walks, a park with swings; that Roberts was back of the enterprise; that he was going to build 100 houses; that 25 were then contracted for; that, when there were 50, they would get a railway station. The houses had not been built. There seems to be no railway station. The hotel was partly built, but sold by the sheriff, torn down, and the lumber sold at auction. There was no proof of rescission of the contract by the defendant, other than the fact that he defended this suit on the ground of fraud. A verdict was directed in favor of the plaintiff for the balance due upon the ground as stated by the trial judge that there was no proof to go to the jury of a legal rescission, and that the alleged representations were mere promises.

SWAYZE, J.[82] (after stating the facts as above). It is settled that, where a party seeks to be relieved from a contract upon the ground that it was induced by fraud, he must, except so far as he has some legal excuse for failure, restore his adversary to the position he was in at the time of the contract, and that there can be no rescission as long as he retains anything received under the contract, which he might have returned, and the withholding of which might be injurious to the other party. This statement of the rule is taken from the opinion of the Supreme Court in Byard v. Holmes, 33 N. J. Law, 119, 127. It has been approved by this court. Crosby v. Wells, 73 N. J. Law, 790, 801, 67 Atl. 295. The reason upon which it rests is the injustice of permitting a man to retain a benefit under a contract which he on his part repudiates. By its terms the rule requires only the return of what has been received. It is applicable only to a contract that has been partly executed, and not to a contract that still remains wholly executory on the part of the alleged fraud doer. In such a case the party who undertakes to rescind has received no advantage, he has nothing to return, and all he can do is to deny his obligation under the contract. If he does so in a reasonable time, he has rescinded the contract. Even where he has in fact received something under the contract, he is not always bound to return it. The rule, "like other rules of justice, must be so applied in the practical administration of justice as shall best subserve, in each particular case, the undoing of wrong, and the vindication of the right." Pidcock v. Swift, 51 N. J. Eq. 405, 408, 27 Atl. 470; Guild, Ex'r, v. Parker, Receiver, 43 N. J. Law, 430; Doughten v. Camden Building & Loan Ass'n, 41 N. J. Eq. 556, 7 Atl. 479.

It is also settled that one who desires to rescind a contract must act within a reasonable time. Dennis v. Jones, 44 N. J. Eq. 513, 14 Atl. 913, 6 Am. St. Rep. 899; Clampitt v. Doyle, 73 N. J. Eq. 678, 70 Atl. 129. What is a reasonable time necessarily depends on the circumstances of each particular case. It is settled in the English courts that, unless the situation of the other party has changed to his detriment, the contract continues until the party defrauded elects to avoid it, and he may keep the question open as long as he does nothing to affirm the contract. Clough v. London & Northwestern Railway (1871) L. R. 7 Ex. 26, 41 L. J. Exch. 17; Morrison v. Universal Marine Ins. Co. (1873) L. R. 8 Ex. 205, 42 L. J. Exch. 115; United Shoe Machinery Co. of Canada v. Brunet, [1909] A. C. 330. He may even wait until action is brought against him (Clough v. London & Northwestern Railway, ubi supra), and a plea setting up the fraud amounts to a rescission of the contract (Lawton v. Elmore, 27 L. J. Ex. 141; Dawes v. Harness, L. R. 10 C. P. 166, 44 L. J. C. P. 194; Aaron's Reefs v. Twiss, [1896] A. C. 273, 65 L. J. P. C. 54). The case last cited was an action by a company against a shareholder for calls upon his stock. In such cases the right of creditors and other stockholders to have the stock paid for requires a prompt disaffirmance of the subscription to stock; but, inasmuch as in the case before the court the rights of creditors and other stockholders were not involved, it was held enough to set up the fraud by way of defense when action was brought. Lord Watson put the case very neatly. He said: "The respondent is not seeking to rescind the contract. He is merely resisting its enforcement by the party guilty of the fraud."

[82] Part of the opinion is omitted. No attempt is made in this volume to develop the subject of fraud, but it was thought that one case dealing with the subject might be useful for purposes of legal analysis.

We have approved the same principle in a case where the vendor of chattels sought to rescind and reclaim his property because of the fraud of the vendee. Williamson v. N. J. Southern R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 311, 319. We there said: "The vendor may rescind the contract of sale and reclaim the property until, with a knowledge of the fraud, he elects to ratify and confirm the sale, or third persons, acting on the apparent ownership of the property by the fraudulent vendee, acquire rights therein bona fide and for a valuable consideration. Delay in exercising the power of rescission is evidence of an election to treat the sale as valid, of more or less weight, according to the circumstances of the case, but of itself does not operate as an estoppel, unless in the meantime superior rights of third persons have intervened." In a case like that then before us, rescission strictly so called is required, since the contract has been executed by a delivery of the property. In the case of an executory contract a refusal to perform any obligation thereunder and the defense of an action brought thereon are all that the defrauded party can do by way of asserting his right to disaffirm the contract, and, unless his silence or delay has operated to the prejudice of the other party, he may first assert his right when his adversary first asserts his claim by action. The failure of the vendee to disaffirm the contract might sometimes prevent the vendor from selling to another and a different question would arise from that now before us.

Here there is no proof that the plaintiff, the vendor, was in any way prejudiced, except by his failure to receive the purchase money, and to that he was not entitled, if the contract was induced by fraud. The defendant repudiated his obligation at the very start by failing to pay any installment of the price, and, if the plaintiff did not know the position taken by the defendant, he could easily have ascertained it. The existence of the written contract, however, is an important circumstance, since the plaintiff is entitled to be rid of his obligation thereunder if he cannot enforce that of the defendant. Whether the contract is recorded does not appear, but, whether recorded or not, it may possibly affect the plaintiff's title. A recent illustration of the difficulty that may arise is afforded by the case of Cornwall v. Henson (1900) 2 Ch. 298. We think, however, that the record of this suit, in which the defendant disaffirms the contract, is sufficient to protect the plaintiff against future claim. Upon the judgment herein, the contract will be either established as valid or annulled as void, and the question of liability thereon will become res adjudicata. It is upon this basis that the vendee is allowed to rescind at law by setting up fraud as a defense to an action for the purchase price without being compelled to go into equity—a right so well recognized that it is hardly necessary to cite authority. Cases are collected in 39 Cyc. 1417, and 1916, note 59. We think, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to defend on the ground that the contract was induced by fraud.

We are unable to agree with the learned trial judge that there was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury, because the false representations relied on by the defendant were mere promises. The representations that there were 25 houses contracted, and that the plaintiff was back of the enterprise, were representations that such were the existing facts. The representation as to the intention to build a railway station and cement walks stands on a somewhat different footing. It is, however, settled that a representation of an intention as existing may if false avoid a contract induced thereby. Where directors of a company procured a loan by representing that its object was to buy property and develop the business, when, in fact, the object was to pay off pressing liabilities, they were held in an action for deceit. "There must be," said Lord Bowen, "a misstatement of an existing fact, but the state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion. It may be difficult to prove the state of a man's mind at a particular time, but, if it can be ascertained, it is as much a fact as anything else. A misrepresentation as to the state of a man's mind is therefore a misstatement of fact." Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, L. R. 29 C. D. 483, 55 L. J. Ch. 650. The most familiar illustration perhaps is the fraudulent purchase of goods by one who does not intend to pay for them—a case in which there is usually no express representation of intention, but merely the representation of an intent to pay implied from the fact of purchase. Leake on Contracts, 294, 295. The New York Court of Appeals has recently held that a statement by the grantee that he intends to erect a dwelling house on the tract conveyed while in fact he intends to erect a garage is a statement of a material existing fact justifying the setting aside of the deed. Adams v. Gillig, 199 N. Y. 314, 92 N. E. 670. * * *

It was error to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment must be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

SECTION 9.—LAPSE OF OFFER—POWER OF REVOCATION

STARKWEATHER v. GLEASON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1915. 221 Mass. 552, 109 N. E. 635.)

Actions by Helen Burr Starkweather and by William G. Starkweather against Frederick J. Gleason. There was a verdict for defendant, and the case was reported to the Supreme Judicial Court. Judgment ordered on the verdict.

BRALEY, J. The correspondence between the parties would have warranted the jury in finding that the plaintiffs invested in the preferred and common shares of the Walpole Rubber & Tire Company in reliance on the advice and judgment of the defendant, its vice president and general superintendent. And having called his attention to the decline in market value of the stock, he wrote them from the company's office, on March 26, 1913:

If "at any time you feel really worried why come out and you can get your money to the value you paid for the stock from me."

To which they replied, March 27, 1913:

"For the present * * * we will not take advantage of your willingness to protect us, but will wait to see if the value of the preferred drops any further, for if this continues we would not care to retain our small holdings."

If this had been an unconditional acceptance the transaction would have been closed and the plaintiffs, upon delivery of the certificates, properly indorsed, would have been entitled to the amount invested. It was not, however, until August 26, 1913, after a receiver for the company had been appointed, that they accepted the offer and notified the defendant of their readiness to deliver the stock, but he refused performance. While the offer to buy was evidently for the purpose of protecting them from loss on the investment, and was not intended by the defendant as a purely business transaction, the words, "at any time," do not cover an unlimited period to be measured by the alternating hopes or fears of the plaintiffs, but must be construed as limited to a reasonable time. Holland v. Cheshire R. R., 151 Mass. 231, 236, 24 N. E. 206. And the facts not being in dispute this was a question of law for the court. Holbrook v. Burt, 22 Pick. 546, 555. The plaintiffs, with knowledge of the fluctuating financial condition of the company, and the corresponding decline in the market price of the stock, having remained inactive for five months, we are of opinion that under these circumstances the presiding judge correctly ruled that the option had expired. Park v. Whitney, 148 Mass. 278, 19 N. E. 161. We find nothing in the remaining contents of these letters that calls for discussion. By the terms of the report, judgment on the verdict is to be entered for the defendant.

So ordered.

MINNESOTA LINSEED OIL CO. v. COLLIER WHITE LEAD CO.

(United States Circuit Court, D. Minnesota, 1876. 4 Dill. 431, Fed. Cas. No. 9,635.)

This action was removed from the state court and a trial by jury waived. The plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $2,151.50, with interest from September 20, 1875—a balance claimed to be due for oil sold to the defendant. The defendant, in its answer, alleges that on August 3d, 1875, a contract was entered into between the parties, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant, at the city of St. Louis, during the said month of August, twelve thousand four hundred and fifty (12,450) gallons of linseed oil for the price of fifty-eight (58) cents per gallon, and that the plaintiff has neglected and refused to deliver the oil according to the contract; that the market value of oil after August 3d and during the month was not less than seventy (70) cents per gallon, and therefore claims a set-off or counter-claim to plaintiff's cause of action. The reply of the plaintiff denies that any contract was entered into between it and defendant.

The plaintiff resided at Minneapolis, Minnesota, and the defendant was the resident agent of the plaintiff, at St. Louis, Missouri. The contract is alleged to have been made by telegraph.

The plaintiff sent the following dispatch to the defendant: "Minneapolis, July 29, 1875. To Alex. Easton, Secretary Collier White Lead Company, St. Louis, Missouri: Account of sales not enclosed in yours of 27th. Please wire us best offer for round lot named by you—one hundred barrels shipped. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

The following answer was received: "St. Louis, Mo., July 30, 1875. To the Minnesota Linseed Oil Company: Three hundred barrels fifty-five cents here, thirty days, no commission, August delivery. Answer. Collier Company."

The following reply was returned: "Minneapolis, July 31, 1875. Will accept fifty-eight cents (58c), on terms named in your telegram. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

This dispatch was transmitted Saturday, July 31, 1875, at 9:15 p. m., and was not delivered to the defendant in St. Louis, until Monday morning, August 2, between eight and nine o'clock.

On Tuesday, August 3, at 8:53 a. m., the following dispatch was deposited for transmission in the telegraph office: "St. Louis, Mo., August 3, 1875. To Minnesota Linseed Oil Company, Minneapolis: Offer accepted—ship three hundred barrels as soon as possible. Collier Company."

The following telegrams passed between the parties after the last one was deposited in the office at St. Louis: "Minneapolis, August 3, 1875. To Collier Company, St. Louis: We must withdraw our offer wired July 31st. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

Answered: "St. Louis, August 3, 1875. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company: Sale effected before your request to withdraw was received. When will you ship? Collier Company."

It appeared that the market was very much unsettled, and that the price of oil was subject to sudden fluctuations during the month previous and at the time of this negotiation, varying from day to day, and ranging between fifty-five and seventy-five cents per gallon. It is urged by the defendant that the dispatch of Tuesday, August 3d, 1875, accepting the offer of the plaintiff transmitted July 31st, and delivered Monday morning, August 2d, concluded a contract for the sale of the twelve thousand four hundred and fifty gallons of oil. The plaintiff, on the contrary, claims, 1st, that the dispatch accepting the proposition made July 31st, was not received until after the offer had been withdrawn; 2d, that the acceptance of the offer was not in due time; that the delay was unreasonable, and therefore no contract was completed.

NELSON, District Judge. It is well settled by the authorities in this country, and sustained by the later English decisions, that there is no difference in the rules governing the negotiation of contracts by correspondence through the post-office and by telegraph, and a contract is concluded when an acceptance of a proposition is deposited in the telegraph office for transmission. See 14 Am. Law Reg. 401, "Contracts by Telegraph," article by Judge Redfield, and authorities cited; also, Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511.

The reason for this rule is well stated in Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681. The negotiation in that case was by post. The court said:

"That if a bargain could not be closed by letter before the answer was received, no contract could be completed through the medium of the post-office; that if the one party was not bound by his offer when it was accepted (that is, at the time the letter of acceptance is deposited in the mail), then the other party ought not to be bound until after they had received a notification that the answer had been received and assented to, and that so it might go on ad infinitum." See, also, Hamilton v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Pa. 339, Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Abbott v.

Shepard, 48 N. H. 14; 8 C. B. 225. In the case at bar the delivery of the message at the telegraph office signified the acceptance of the offer. If any contract was entered into, the meeting of minds was at 8:53 of the clock, on Tuesday morning, August 3d, and the subsequent dispatches are out of the case. 1 Pars. Cont. 482, 483.

This rule is not strenuously dissented from on the argument, and it is substantially admitted that the acceptance of an offer by letter or telegraph completes the contract, when such acceptance is put in the proper and usual way of being communicated by the agency employed to carry it; and that when an offer is made by telegraph, and acceptance by telegraph takes effect when the dispatch containing the acceptance is deposited for transmission in the telegraph office, and not when it is received by the other party. Conceding this, there remains only one question to decide, which will determine the issues: Was the acceptance of defendant deposited in the telegraph office Tuesday, August 3d, within a reasonable time, so as to consummate a contract binding upon the plaintiff?

It is is undoubtedly the rule that when a proposition is made under the circumstances in this case, an acceptance concludes the contract if the offer is still open, and the mutual consent necessary to convert the offer of one party into a binding contract by the acceptance of the other is established, if such acceptance is within a reasonable time after the offer was received.

The better opinion is, that what is, or is not, a reasonable time, must depend upon the circumstances attending the negotiation, and the character of the subject matter of the contract, and in no better way can the intention of the parties be determined. If the negotiation is in respect to an article stable in price, there is not so much reason for an immediate acceptance of the offer, and the same rule would not apply as in a case where the negotiation related to an article subject to sudden and great fluctuations in the market.

The rule in regard to the length of the time an offer shall continue, and when an acceptance completes the contract, is laid down in Parsons on Contracts (volume 1, p. 482). He says: "It may be said that whether the offer be made for a time certain or not, the intention or understanding of the parties is to govern. * * * If no definite time is stated, then the inquiry as to a reasonable time resolves itself into an inquiry as to what time it is rational to suppose the parties contemplated; and the law will decide this to be that time which as rational men they ought to have understood each other to have had in mind." Applying this rule, it seems clear that the intention of the plaintiff, in making the offer by telegraph, to sell an article which fluctuates so much in price, must have been upon the understanding that the acceptance, if at all, should be immediate, and as soon after the receipt of the offer as would give a fair opportunity for consideration. The delay here was too long, and manifestly unjust to the plaintiff, for it afforded the defendant an opportunity to take advantage of a change in the market, and accept or refuse the offer as would best subserve its interests.

Judgment will be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The counter-claim is denied. Judgment accordingly.[88]

MACTIER'S ADM'RS v. FRITH.

(Court of Errors of New York, 1830. 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262.)

Appeal from chancery.

At New York, in the autumn of 1822, the respondent and Henry Mactier the intestate, agreed to embark in a commercial adventure, in which they were to be jointly and equally interested. Frith was to direct a shipment of 200 pipes of brandy from France to N. Y., to be consigned to Mactier, who was to ship to the respondent at Jacmel in St. Domingo, provisions to the amount of the invoice cost of the brandy, and the respondent was to place the shippers of the brandy in funds by shipments of coffee to France in French vessels, and the parties were to share equally in result of the speculation all around. In pursuance of this arrangement, Frith, Sept. 5, 1822, wrote Firebrace, Davidson & Co., a mercantile house at Havre, to ship 200 pipes of brandy to N. Y. to the consignment of Mactier. Dec. 24, Frith, who had returned to Jacmel, where he did business as a merchant, wrote a letter to Mactier on a variety of subjects, in which was contained a paragraph in these words: "I also have the pleasure of handing you copies of Messrs. Firebrace, Davidson & Co.'s letters regarding the brandy order. By-the-bye, as your brother before I left New York, declined taking the interest I offered him in this speculation, and wishing to confine myself in business as much as possible, so as to bring my concerns to a certain focus, I would propose to you to take the adventure solely to your own account, holding the value to cover the transaction to my account in New York."

[88] When no limit is specified, the power of acceptance lasts only a reasonable time, this varying with the circumstances. Averill v. Hedge, 12 Conn. 424 (1838), offer made, and after two weeks' delay renewed on the 18th; acceptance mailed on 20th held too late; Caldwell v. E. F. Spears & Sons, 186 Ky. 64, 216 S. W. 83 (1919); Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525, 32 Am. Rep. 35 (1878); Traylor, Spencer & Co. v. Brimbery, 2 Ga. App. 84, 58 S. E. 371 (1907); Ortman v. Weaver (C. C.) 11 Fed. 358 (1882); Stone v. Harmon, 31 Minn. 512, 19 N. W. 88 (1884); Baker v. Holt, 56 Wis. 100, 14 N. W. 8 (1882). As to when an offer of a reward would lapse, see Loring v. City of Boston, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 409 (1844); Mitchell v. Abbott, 86 Me. 338, 29 Atl. 1118, 25 L. R. A. 503, 41 Am. St. Rep. 559 (1894); Matter of Kelly, 39 Conn. 159 (1872). Where a reward is offered for information, the power of acceptance lapses as soon as the information is given by the first informer. Lancaster v. Walsh (Exch.) 4 M. & W. 16 (1838).

Where there is a time limit specified, the power ends instantly at the expiration of this time. This is equally true in the case of irrevocable powers, called option contracts. Berg Co. v. Thomas & Son Co., 256 Pa. 584, 100 Atl. 951 (1917); Mackey Wall Plaster Co. v. United States Gypsum Co. (D. C.) 244 Fed. 275 (1917).

Jan. 17, 1823, Mactier wrote to Frith, acknowledging the receipt of his letter of the 24th ult.; thanks him for sending the copy of Firebrace, Davidson & Co.'s letter on the subject of the brandy order; says that he has received a letter from them, informing that the brandy would be shipped and leave Bordeaux about Dec. 1 then past; and adds: "This has been from the first a favorite speculation with me, and am pleased to say it still promises a favorable result; but to render it complete, I am desirous the speculation should go forward in the way first proposed, thereby making it a treble operation; as you have, however, expressed a wish that I should take the adventure to my own account, I shall delay coming to any determination till I again hear from you. The prospect of war between France and Spain may defeat the object of this speculation, as far as relates to the shipment of provisions hence to Hayti to be invested in coffee for France, in which case I will at once decide to take the adventure to my own account. Our London accounts, down to the fifth of December, speak confidently of a war between France and Spain, a measure which, if carried into effect, would operate to your disadvantage." Also: "The next arrival from Europe will probably decide the question of peace or war, and I will lose no time in communicating the same to you;" and also, "let what will happen, I trust you will in no way be a sufferer."

March 7, 1823, Frith wrote Mactier, making no other allusion to the last letter of Mactier than the following: "I have received your esteemed favors of the 17th and 31st January, and note their respective contents." March 12, 1823, the ship La Claire arrived at N. Y., laden with the brandy in question, and was at the wharf on the morning of March 13.

A clerk of Mactier testified that he had a conversation with Mactier about the time the brandy arrived, perhaps the morning after, and Mactier then said he should take it to himself. A merchant of N. Y. also testified that Mactier consulted with him on the subject of some brandy which he expected to arrive; there was some offer for his taking it on his own account, and he appeared inclined to take it. From the state of things, he advised Mactier to take it, and there was a letter drafted by Mactier upon the subject, in which the merchant made some alterations. The letter stated that he, Mactier, should take the brandy to his own account. March 17, Mactier entered the brandy at the custom-house as owner, and not as consignee, took the usual oath, and gave bond for the duties. March 22, he sold 150 pipes of the brandy on the wharf to several commercial houses, and took their notes for the price of the same. The remaining 50 pipes were put in the public store, and remained there in bond, the liquidated duties not having been secured to be paid by Mactier.

March 25, Mactier wrote a letter, directed to Frith at Jacmel, in which he said, "I have now to advise the arrival of French ship La Claire with the 200 pipes of brandy, and that in consequence of the probability of war between France and Spain, and in compliance with the wish expressed in your regarded favor of the 24th December and my answer thereto of the 17th January last, I have decided to take this adventure to my own account. I, therefore, credit you with the amount of the invoice," amounting to $14,254.57. To this letter was attached a postscript, dated March 31.

March 28, Frith wrote a letter to Mactier, dated at Jacmel, in which, speaking of the brandy in question he says: "With regard to this adventure, I would wish to confirm, if altogether satisfactory to you, what I mentioned to you some time ago, and which I omitted to repeat to you in my previous letter, in reply to yours of the 17th January. I find the more one does in this country, in the present state of trade, the more one's affairs get shackled." Previous to the arrival of these last two letters at their respective places of direction, Mactier was dead, he having departed this life April 10, 1823. April 21, Frith again wrote a letter addressed to Mactier, in which he acknowledges the receipt of his letter of March 25, says he has noted its contents, and requests Mactier to charter on his account a staunch first-class vessel, and send out to Jacmel by her 400 barrels of flour and other goods. Meantime, Mactier having died, his administrator obtained the rest of the brandy from the custom house and sold it at auction.

The respondent, unwilling to come in as a general creditor of Mactier and receive a pro rata distribution, filed his bill in the court of chancery, on April 1, 1824, alleging that the brandy was shipped from France on his sole account, and that Mactier was only the consignee thereof. He admits having offered to sell the brandy to Mactier, but declares that he regarded his offer as declined by the letter of Jan. 17. He sets forth a letter written by Mactier on March 13, 1823, in which he writes of the brandy as follows: "I am looking daily for its arrival; it is to be regretted the order was not more promptly executed, as the delay, I fear, will operate to our disadvantage. War between France and Spain may now be considered inevitable; France has recalled her minister, and 100,000 Frenchmen have been ordered to march into Spain." He alleges that the letter of Mactier to him of March 25 was not received until several days after the death of Mactier, and that his letter to Mactier of April 21 was written in ignorance of the death of Mactier, and that he did not intend thereby, and he conceives he did not finally consummate the sale as claimed.

The bill concludes by praying an account of the sales of the brandy, and a decree directing the defendants to retain in their hands sufficient of the funds belonging to the estate of Mactier to pay and satisfy the respondent when his accounts shall be settled and adjudged upon by the court.

The defendants put in their answer, insisting that the brandy, on its arrival at the port of New York, was the sole and exclusive property of Mactier, and that the portion thereof which came to their hands at his decease, and the proceeds of that part thereof which was sold by him in his lifetime, and which came to their hands, rightfully belonged to his estate, and was subject to be disposed of in a due course of administration.

On March 1, Mactier had effected an insurance on his commissions as consignee of the brandy, to the amount of $1,500; but on March 17, he had entered the brandy in the custom house as his own, using an invoice stating that the brandy was shipped "to the address and for the account of Henry Mactier." On the date of such entry, a clerk had charged a small custom house fee to "John A. Frith's sales of brandy" on Mactier's books; but later Mactier directed the account to be made out to himself, and on March 28 Frith was credited on the books with the invoice price of the brandy.

On May 20, 1825, Chancellor Sanford made an order referring the case to a master to examine witnesses and report. The master reported on Oct. 10, 1825, that the sale had been consummated and that Frith had no lien on the brandy and no rights other than those of a general creditor. The complainant excepted to this report, and the Chancellor subsequently sustained the exceptions and decreed that Frith was entitled to the specific proceeds of the sale of the brandy. From this decree the defendants appealed.[84]

MARCY, J. The object of the bill filed in this case is to obtain from the administrators of Mactier the proceeds of the 50 pipes of brandy which came to their possession after his death, and the amount of such notes taken on the sale of the 150 pipes, March 22, 1823, as were uncollected and undisposed of at the death of Mactier, or, at least, so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the balance due the respondent for disbursements on account of the adventure. The question on which the decision in this case, as I apprehend, mainly depends, relates to the alleged sale of the brandy to Mactier. There are many definitions of what constitutes a contract, but all of them are, of course, substantially alike. Powell states a contract to be a transaction in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to what is promised by the other. Pow. Cont. 4. In testing the validity of contracts, many things are to be considered. The contract that the appellant sets up in this case is alleged by the respondent to be deficient in several essential requisites. When that was done which, on the assumption of there being parties capable of contracting, was necessary, as the respondent contends, to complete it, Mactier was dead. If the contract was only in progress of execution, and there remained but a single act to be done to complete it, his death rendered the performance of that act impossible; it suspended the proceedings at the very point where they were when it occurred.

[The learned judge here discussed the question whether an act performed after Mactier's death might not be operative by the doctrine of "relation back" as if performed prior to his death.]

[84] The statement of facts has been rewritten in part, the opinion of Marcy, J., has been abbreviated, and several opinions of other judges have been omitted.

My conclusion, in regard to this objection to the alleged contract, is, that if any act was required to be done, even by Frith, to complete the sale when Mactier died, that act could not be subsequently performed.

I am now to consider whether there was a contract, before Mactier's death, which had the consent of the contracting parties so given and made known as to be binding on them. That a consent is necessary all agree, but what shall constitute it in a given case may admit of much diversity of opinion. The consent of the parties in a contract of sale, as explained by Pothier, consists in the concurrence of the will of the vendor to sell a particular thing to the purchaser for a specified price, with the will of the purchaser to buy the same thing for that price. Poth. Cont. de Vente, pl. 1, § 2, art. 3, No. 31. Delvincourt, another eminent French writer on the Civil Code of France, says, that although it is impossible that there should be a contract without the consent of all parties, it is not indispensable that the wills of the parties should concur at the same instant, provided the will of the one that did not concur at first, is declared before the will of the other is revoked. 5 Cours de Code Civil, 93. Although the will of the party making the offer may precede that of the party accepting, yet it must continue down to the time of the acceptance. Where parties are together chaffering about an article of merchandise, and one expresses a present willingness to accept of certain terms, that willingness is supposed to continue, unless it is revoked, to the close of their interview and negotiation on the same subject, and if during this time the other party says he will take the article on the terms proposed, the bargain is thereby closed. Poth. Cont. de Vente p. 1, § 2, art. 3, No. 31. What I mean by its being closed is, that nothing mutual between the parties remains to be done to give to either a right to have it carried into effect; either can enforce it against the other, or recover damages for the nonfulfillment of it: but if there be conditions expressed or implied to be performed by the purchaser, he cannot compel the delivery until they are performed. If the price is to be immediately paid or security given, he cannot have the property until payment made, or security given, or a tender thereof. Touch. 204, 205; Noy, Max. c. 42; 2 Bl. Comm. 447.

Where the negotiation between the contracting parties residing at a distance from each other is conducted, as it usually is by letters, it is necessary, in order that their minds may meet, that the will of the party making the proposition to sell should continue until his letter shall have reached the other, and he shall have signified, or at least had an opportunity to signify his acceptance of the proposition. This Pothier holds to be the legal presumption unless the contrary appears. His language is: "Cette volonté est présumée tant qu'il ne paraît rien de contraire." This doctrine, which presumes the continuance of a willingness to contract after it has been manifested by an offer is not confined to the civil law and the codes of those nations which have constructed their systems with the materials drawn from that exhaustless storehouse of jurisprudence: it is found in the common law; indeed, it exists, of necessity, wherever the power to contract exists in parties separated from each other. The rule of the common law is, that wherever the existence of a particular subject-matter or relation has been once proved, its continuance is presumed till proof be given to the contrary, or till a different presumption be afforded by the nature of the subject-matter. 16 East, 55; 3 Starkie, Ev. 1252. The case of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681, proceeds upon and affirms the principle that the willingness to contract thus manifested is presumed to continue for the time limited, and, if that be not indicated by the offer, until it is expressly revoked or countervailed by a contrary presumption. In that case it was said, "The defendants must be considered in law as making during every instant of time their letter was traveling the same identical offer to the plaintiffs; and then the contract is complete by the acceptance of it by the latter."

Against the authority of the case of Adams v. Lindsell, we have urged on us a decision of a court of the highest respectability in one of our sister states. The case of McCulloch v. Insurance Co., 1 Pick. (Mass.) 278, conflicts in principle, according to my views of it, with the case decided by the King's Bench. I should have been pleased to see these tribunals harmonize upon a question of no small importance to the commercial world; and I have, therefore, deliberately weighed the ingenious attempts made to reconcile these decisions upon this point; but these attempts appear to me to have been unsuccessful. A refinement which would distinguish between a contract for insurance, and one for the sale of goods in relation to the assent of the parties, might relieve us from the embarrassment which the different principles of these decisions is calculated to produce; but to apply such a distinction hereafter would doubtless involve courts in a still more distressing embarrassment. Distinctions, which are not founded on a difference in the nature of things, are not entitled to indulgence; they tend to make the science of law a collection of arbitrary rules appealing to factitious reasons for their support, consequently difficult to be acquired, and often of uncertain application. The two cases referred to should have had applied to them the same rule of law, and we are required to say what that rule is in deciding the case now under consideration.

The principle of the decision of the King's Bench is simply that the acceptance of an offer made, through the medium of a letter, binds the bargain if the party making the offer has not revoked it, as he has a right to do before it is accepted. The rule laid down by the supreme court of Massachusetts regards the contract as incomplete until the party making the offer is notified of the acceptance, or until the time when he should have received it, the party accepting having done what was incumbent on him to give notice. The chancellor in deciding this case gave his sanction to the latter rule: "To make a valid contract," he says, "it is not only necessary that the minds of the contracting parties should meet on the subject of the contract, but they must know that fact." The decision of the court of Massachusetts makes knowledge by the party tendering the offer of the other's acceptance essential to the completion of the contract. If one party is not bound till he knows or might know, and therefore is presumed to know that the other has accepted, the accepting party, on the same principle, ought not to be bound till he knows the offering party has not recalled the offer before knowledge of the acceptance. The principle of that case would bring the matter to the point stated by the chancellor, viz.: the parties must know that their minds meet on the subject of the contract. If a bargain can be completed between absent parties, it must be when one of them cannot know the fact whether it be or be not completed. It cannot begin to be obligatory on the one before it is on the other; there must be a precise time when the obligation attaches to both, and this time must happen when one of the parties cannot know that the obligation has attached to him; the obligation does not, therefore, arise from a knowledge of the present concurrence of the wills of the contracting parties.

All the authorities state a contract or an agreement (which is the same thing) to be aggregatio mentium. Why should not this meeting of the minds, which makes the contract, also indicate the moment when it becomes obligatory? I might rather ask, is it not and must it not be the moment when it does become obligatory? If the party making the offer is not bound until he knows of this meeting of minds, for the same reason the party accepting the offer ought not to be bound when his acceptance is received, because he does not know of the meeting of the minds, for the offer may have been withdrawn before his acceptance was received. If more than a concurrence of minds upon a distinct proposition is required to make an obligatory contract, the definition of what constitutes a contract is not correct. Instead of being the meeting of the minds of the contracting parties, it should be a knowledge of this meeting. It was said on the argument that if concurrence of minds alone would make a valid contract, one might be constructed out of mere volitions and uncommunicated wishes; I think such a result would not follow. The law does not regard bare volitions and pure mental abstractions. When it speaks of the operations of the mind it means such as have been made manifest by overt acts; when it speaks of the meeting of minds it refers to such a meeting as has been made known by proper acts, and when thus made known it is effective although the parties who may claim the benefit of or be bound by a contract thus made, may for a season remain ignorant of its being made.

Testing the rules of the law laid down in the two cases to which I have referred by the authority of reason, and the practical results that are likely to flow from them, it does appear to me, that we are not left at liberty to hesitate about the choice. If we are inclined from the force of abstract reason, to prefer the rule laid down by the Court of King's Bench, that inclination will be greatly strengthened by a recurrence to the opinions of courts and jurists. The Common Pleas in England seem to me to have given their approval to the decision of Adams v. Lindsell. Routledge v. Grant, 4 Bing. 653. Judge Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court, in Eliason v. Henshaw, 4 Wheat. 228, 4 L. Ed. 556, said, "Until the terms of the agreement have received the assent of both parties the negotiation is open and imposes no obligation on either." The inference from this proposition is that the assent of the parties to the terms of the agreement and not their knowledge of it, completes the contract. It was decided in the circuit court of the United States, for Pennsylvania, that contracts are formed by the offer on the one hand, and an acceptance on the other. After acceptance, the contract is obligatory on both. Coxe, Dig. 192. In this case, knowledge of the acceptance is not brought into view as necessary to constitute the obligation. Both the Roman law and the French Civil Code, as we have seen by the references already made, contain a doctrine in accordance with the principle of these cases. I think I am. therefore, warranted in saying that the proposition may be considered as established, that the acceptance of a written offer of a contract of sale consummates the bargain, providing the offer is standing at the time of the acceptance.

What shall constitute an acceptance will depend, in a great measure. upon circumstances. The mere determination of the mind, unacted on can never be an acceptance. Where the offer is by letter, the usual mode of acceptance is the sending of a letter announcing a consent to accept; where it is made by a messenger, a determination to accept, returned through him, or sent by another, would seem to be all the law requires, if the contract may be consummated without writing. There are other modes which are equally conclusive upon the parties; keeping silence, under certain circumstances, is an assent to a proposition; anything that shall amount to a manifestation of a formed determination to accept, communicated or put in the proper way to be communicated to the party making the offer, would doubtless complete the contract; but a letter written would not be an acceptance, so long as it remained in the possession or under the control of the writer. An acceptance is the distinct act of one party to the contract as much as the offer is of the other; the knowledge by the party making the offer, of the determination of the party receiving it, is not an ingredient of an acceptance. It is not compounded of an assent by one party to the terms offered, and a knowledge of that assent by the other.

I will now apply this law to the facts of this case. Frith's offer to sell his interest in the brandy certainly continued till his letter of Dec. 24 was received at New York and Mactier had a fair opportunity to answer it. If the answer of Jan. 17 had contained an unqualified acceptance, the bargain would have been closed when it was sent away for Jacmel; but the offer was not then accepted; there was a promise to accept upon a contingency, for Mactier says, after alluding to the prospect of a war between France and Spain, "in which case," that is in case of such a war, "I will at once decide to take the adventure to my own account." This concluded nothing. If the event had actually happened, and Frith had insisted on enforcing this conditional acceptance, it would not have been in his power to do so. The most that Mactier said was, that if an expected event happened, he would do an act which would complete the bargain. The happening of the event could not, without the act, complete it. The Roman law regarded the tense of the verb used by the contracting parties to determine whether the bargain was concluded: "Verbum imperfecti temporis rem adhuc imperfectam significat." There is a wide difference between a promise to give an assent to a proposition for a contract on the happening of a contingency, and the annunciation of a present assent to it. If the expected event happens, and the act promised is performed, the bargain is closed; but it is the promised acceptance, and not the happening of the event, that gives validity to the contract. If in this case the offer of Frith had been to Mactier to take the brandy on the happening of a French and Spanish war, and Mactier had promised to decide to take it in such an event, the simple fact of his taking it after the war would have enabled Frith to treat him as the purchaser of it. Such an act would have been a valid acceptance; but a conditional acceptance of an unconditional offer, followed up by acts of the acceptor after the condition was fulfilled on which the acceptance depended, might not be considered as completing the bargain without the acquiescence of the party making the offer in those acts, because the minds of the parties would not have met on the precise terms of the contract.

To conclude the bargain, Mactier must have accepted the offer as tendered to him by Frith, and that acceptance must have been while the offer, in contemplation of law, was still held out to him. That there was an acceptance, or rather that Mactier did all that was incumbent on him to do, to effect an acceptance, was not denied; but it was insisted, on the part of the respondent, that it was made after the offer was withdrawn. It will be necessary to consider when this acceptance took place, as preparatory to settling the fact of the continuance of the offer down to that time. There is not the slightest evidence of the determination on the part of Mactier to take the brandy before March 17. The insurance that he effected on his commissions March 1 disproves the existence of such a determination on that day; but if the situation of the parties was changed, and Frith was now endeavoring to set up the contract, I am at a loss to conceive how Mactier's representatives could withstand the force of the facts which took place March 17. In answer to the offer, Mactier delayed coming to a determination thereon, but promised to accept it if there should be a war; March 17, when that event was considered as settled, he entered the brandy as his own property, and told his clerk that he had determined to take it. But if there should be any doubt as to the effect of this conduct, there can be none as to his subsequent acts. By a letter dated the 25th with a postscript of March 31, he accepted the offer. This letter was immediately transmitted to Frith, and as soon as March 28, entries were made in his books showing that he had become the purchaser. Enough was done by the 31st to constitute an acceptance of Frith's offer and to complete the bargain, if the offer can be considered as standing till that day.

An offer, when once made, continues, as I have heretofore shown, to the satisfaction of my own mind at least, until it is expressly revoked, or until circumstances authorize a presumption that it is revoked. The offer itself may show very clearly when the presumption of revocation attaches. Where it is made to be replied to by return mail, the party to whom it is addressed must at once perceive that it is not to stand for an acceptance, to be transmitted after that mail. If an offer stands until it is expressly withdrawn, or is presumed to be withdrawn, whether it is held out to a party at a particular period or not, is a matter of fact. Then we are to determine, as a matter of fact, whether Frith's offer was held out for Mactier's acceptance until March 31; if Frith intended it should stand on, and he viewed himself as tendering it to Mactier down to that time, we are bound to regard it as standing, unless his intention was the result of the fraudulent conduct of Mactier. The acts of Frith, after the death of Mactier, could do nothing towards completing an unfinished contract; but I think they may be fairly adverted to for the purpose of ascertaining his intentions in relation to the continuance of his offer. March 7, he acknowledges Mactier's letter of Jan. 17, which did not decline, as it has been construed to do, the offer, but apprised him that it was kept under advisement; and by using the expression, "noting the contents," Frith is, I think, to be understood as yielding to the proposed delay. If a doubt as to this construction of that letter could spring up in the mind, it would be at once removed by the perusal of the letter of the 28th of the same month. In that he expresses a wish to confirm what he had said in the letter making the offer to sell, and declares that he had in a previous letter, which must mean that of the 7th, omitted to communicate the same thing. In answering Mactier's letter which contained the acceptance of his offer, he recognizes the bargain as closed, and gives directions as to investing the proceeds of the brandy. All the subsequent correspondence acquiesces in the sale. It appears to me to be impossible to say, after reading the letters of Frith written subsequent to his knowledge of Mactier's acceptance, that he did not consider the offer as held out to Mactier down to the time when it was accepted, and the bargain closed by that acceptance; and I think we must adjudge it to have been closed, unless the agreement was nugatory by reason that the thing to which it related had not an actual or potential existence when the contract was consummated. * * *

TINN v. HOFFMANN & CO.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1873. 29 Law T. R. [N. S.] 271.)

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover damages in respect of a breach of contract to deliver 800 tons of iron; and by the consent of the parties, and by order of Martin, B., dated May 30th, 1872, the facts were stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in the following special case:

1. The plaintiff, Mr. Joseph Tinn, is an iron manufacturer, carrying on business at the Ashton Row Rolling Mills, near Bristol; and the defendant, who trades under the name and style of Hoffmann & Co., is an iron merchant, carrying on business at Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

2. In the months of November and December, 1871, the following correspondence passed between the plaintiff and the defendant relating to the proposed purchase and sale of certain iron, the particulars of which fully appear in the letters hereinafter set forth:

The plaintiff to the defendant:

"November 22, 1871.

"Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: Please quote your lowest price for 800 tons No. 4 Cleveland, or other equally good brand, delivered at Portishead at the rate of 200 tons per month, March, April, May, and June, 1872. Payment by four months' acceptance.

"Yours truly, J. Tinn."

3. The defendants' reply:

"Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,
"November 24, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"Dear Sir: We are obliged by your inquiry of the 22d inst., and by the present beg to offer you 800 tons No. 4 forge Middlesbro' pig iron (brand at our option, Cleveland if possible), at 69s. per ton delivered at Portishead, delivery 200 tons per month, March, April, May, and June, 1872, payment by your four months' acceptance from date of arrival.

"We shall be very glad if this low offer would induce you to favor us with your order, and waiting your reply by return, we remain, dear sir, yours truly, A. Hoffmann & Co."

4. The plaintiff to the defendant:

"Bristol, November 27, 1871.

"Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: The price you ask is high. If I made the quantity 1200 tons, delivery 200 tons per month for the first six months of next year I suppose you would make the price lower? Your reply per return will oblige J. Tinn."

5. The defendant to the plaintiff in reply:

"Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,
"November 28, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"Dear Sir: In reply to your favor of yesterday, we beg to state that we are willing to make you an offer of further 400 tons No. 4 forge Middlesbro' pig iron, 200 tons in January, 200 tons in February, at the same price we quoted you by ours of the 24th inst., though the rate of freight at the above-named time will doubtless be considerably higher than that of the following months.

"Our to-day's market was very firm again, and we feel assured we shall see a further rise ere long.

"Kindly let us have your reply by return of post as to whether you accept our offers of together 1200 tons and oblige yours truly,

"A. Hoffmann & Co."

6. The plaintiff to the defendant:

"Bristol, November 28, 1871.

"Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"No. 4 Pig iron.

"Dear Sirs: You can enter me 800 tons on the terms and conditions named in your favor of the 24th inst., but I trust you will enter the other 400, making in all 1200 tons, referred to in my last, at 68s. per ton. Yours faithfully, Joseph Tinn."

7. The defendants' reply:

"Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,
"November 29, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq.:

"Dear Sir: We are obliged by your favor of yesterday, in reply to which we are sorry to state that we are not able to book your esteemed order for 1200 tons No. 4 forge at a lower price than that offered to you by us of yesterday—viz., 69s., and even that offer we can only leave you on hand for reply by to-morrow before twelve o'clock. Waiting your reply, we remain, dear sir, yours truly,

"A. Hoffmann & Co."

8. On December 1st, 1871, the plaintiff sent a telegram to the defendant, of which the following is a copy:

"From Tinn, Ashton.

"To Hoffmann & Co., Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

"Book other 400 tons pig iron for me, same terms and conditions as before."

And on the same day the plaintiff sent a letter to the defendant, of which the following is a copy:

"December 1, 1871.

"Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: I have your favor of the 29th ult. Please enter the remaining 400 tons No. 4 Forge Pig at 69s. ex-ship Portishead, delivery to commence January, 1872, payment by four months' acceptance against delivery. Kindly send me sold note for the 800 and 400 tons, and oblige, yours truly, J. Tinn."

9. The following correspondence then took place between the plaintiff and the defendants' clerk, duly authorized in that behalf.

The defendants' clerk to the plaintiff:

"Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,

"December 1, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"Dear Sir: We have your telegram of this day, 'Book other 400 tons Pig iron, same terms and conditions as before,' which we note and shall lay before our Mr. Hoffmann on his return next week. Yours truly, for A. Hoffmann & Co. C. Jerveland."

10. Memorandum.

"December 2, 1871.

"From A. Hoffmann & Co., Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

"To Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"The contents of your yesterday's favor is noted, and we shall lay same before our principal on his return next week."

11. The defendants to the plaintiff:

"The Queen's Hotel, Manchester, December 4, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"Dear Sir: I am in receipt of telegram 'Book other 400 tons, same terms and conditions as before,' and favor of 1st inst. addressed to my firm, in reply to which I very much regret to state that I am not able to book the 1200 tons in question, as your reply to ours of November 28th and 29th did not reach us within the stipulated time; and as I had other offers for the same lot, I disposed of the latter previous to my leaving Middlesbro' and receiving your decision.

"Trusting to be more fortunate in future, I remain, dear sir, yours truly, A. Hoffmann & Co."

12. The plaintiff to the defendant:

"December 5, 1871.

"Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: I regret you cannot enter me the 400 tons No. 4 Forge Pig on the same terms as the 800 tons. Please send me sold note for 800 tons per return. Yours truly, J. Tinn."

13. The reply of the defendants:

"Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,
"December 6, 1871.

"Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"Dear Sir: Your favor of yesterday to hand, in reply to which we have to state that we cannot send you contract for pig iron, having sold you none.

"The quotation for 1200 tons in our respect of 29th ult. was for your acceptance by 12 o'clock the 30th; and failing to receive such we disposed of the iron, being under other offers, as already intimated to you by our Mr. Hoffmann, and it is now utterly impossible for us to book you the quantity you require, or you may rest assured that we willingly would do so. We are, dear sir, yours truly,

"Pro A. Hoffmann & Co. C. Jerveland."

14. It is agreed that all the facts and circumstances mentioned in the above correspondence are true, and that the court are to have power to draw all inferences of facts in the same way as a jury might do.

15. The course of post between Bristol and Middlesbrough is one day.

16. The plaintiff contends that he has a binding contract with the defendant whereby the defendants are bound to deliver to him 800 tons of iron. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that there is no such contract, and refuse to deliver any of the said iron.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are, first, whether, upon the facts stated and documents set out in the case, there is any binding contract on the part of the defendants to deliver 800 tons of iron to the plaintiff; secondly, whether, upon the facts and documents set out in the case, there is any binding contract on the part of the defendants to deliver any quantity of iron to the plaintiff, and if yea, what quantity and on what terms and conditions.

[The Court of Exchequer (BRAMWELL, CHANNELL, and PIGOTT, BB.) gave judgment for the defendant; the Lord Chief Baron (KELLY) dissenting in the belief that there was a contract for 800 tons. The plaintiff brought error to this Court.]

HONYMAN, J. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below was wrong, and that judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiff in respect of 800 tons. The question depends entirely on the construction and effect of the defendants' letter of the 24th and the two letters of November 28th, 1871, one written by the plaintiff and the other by the defendants. The plaintiff had been inquiring at what price the defendants would let him have 800 tons of iron, and by their letter of November 24th they named 69s. per ton as the price for the 800 tons, to be delivered at the rate of 200 tons per month, in the four months of March, April, May, and June, 1872; and that letter concluded thus, "waiting your reply by return." Mr. King-don, on the part of the plaintiff, admitted, and I think very properly, that the meaning of that was, we offer you that price, provided you accept it by return. Inasmuch as it was not accepted by return, as it stood, I presume had it stopped there, there would have been no contract. The plaintiff not only did not accept by return, but, on the contrary, he objected to the price, for on November 27th he wrote saying that the price was too high, and asking whether if he increased the quantity to 1200 tons, to be deliverable 200 tons per month—that is to say, in addition to the quantity he had already proposed for, to be delivered in March, April, May, and June, 1872, 400 tons more, to be delivered 200 tons in January and 200 in February, 1872, that would make the price lower. Upon that, on November 28th, the defendants wrote the following letter, on the construction of which I believe the difference of opinion among the members of the Court mainly arises [Reads letter of that date.] What is the meaning of that letter? It amounts to this: On November 24 we offered you 800 tons for delivery at 69s.; we now repeat to you that offer, and in addition to that, we make a further offer of 400 tons more—that is, we renew the offer of November 24th, and we make you a further offer of 400 tons, provided you accept those offers "by return of post." That does not mean exclusively a reply by letter by return of post, but you may reply by telegram or by verbal message, or by any means not later than a letter written and sent by return of post would reach us. If that is so, then comes the plaintiff's letter, written on the same day, November 28th, which crosses the defendants' letter of the same date, in which the plaintiff said, "You can enter me 800 tons on the terms and conditions named in your favor of the 24th inst., but I trust you will enter the other 400, making in all 1200 tons, referred to in my last, at 68s. per ton, ex ship Portishead."

I cannot agree in the opinion said to have been expressed by my Brothers Pigott and Channell in the Court below. As I understand, my Brother Pigott certainly says this is not a clean offer, or a clean acceptance of 800 tons, but that it is 800 tons on the condition or hope or trust that they would lower the price of the other 400 tons. I cannot accede to that view of the case. I assume that it plainly amounts to this, "I will take your 800 tons on the terms and conditions mentioned in the letter of the 24th inst., but I hope you will let me have the other lot at 68s. per ton; if you choose to do that, well and good." I cannot understand how it can be said that that is not an absolute acceptance of the 800 tons, supposing it was competent to the plaintiff to accept that quantity. In the Court below it seems to have been treated as if the offer of November 28th was one offer of 1200 tons. I do not think so. I think it is a repetition of the offer of 800 tons coupled with a further offer of 400 tons, and that it was competent to the plaintiff to accept one and not accept the other. My Brother Bramwell appears to have thought that it was not material to consider whether it was two separate offers of 400 tons and 800 tons, or an offer of 1200 tons, because in either view of the case, the plaintiff could not accept the one and reject the other. If it is to be construed as strictly one offer of 1200 tons, I can understand it, and then of course he could not accept the one and reject the other. But I do not think it is one offer of 1200 tons, nor two offers one of 400, and the other of 800 tons, but that it is a repetition of the offer of 800 tons, with a further offer of further 400 tons. To say that he could not accept the 400 tons without the 800 tons seems, in my view of the matter, to throw no light on the question whether he might accept the 800 tons without the 400 tons. That being so, it being in my judgment a separate offer of 800 tons, and 400 tons in addition, I should have thought, had the plaintiff's letter of the 28th been written on November 29th, that nobody, but for the opinions which have been expressed here to-day, could have entertained a doubt that it would have been an acceptance. What, then, is the effect when the two letters are written on the same day and crossed each other in the post? Does that make any difference?

On this part of the case, as far as I can gather from the notes that have been given us of the judgments below, my Brother Bramwell is of the same opinion as I am, because I understand him to say that, if he had thought that these were two offers, and that the two offers were capable of being accepted the one without the other, then the fact of the acceptance crossing the offer would have been no bar to the contract. After the plaintiff had written the letter of November 28th mentioning the 800 tons, it could not be said that he would not have been bound by the defendants' letter of the same date, if it had been written on November 29th. I do not see how it can be contended that there would not then have been a valid contract for 800 tons, except with regard to the question of whether it were one offer, or two offers. Of course, if it is one offer, that is one thing; but if it be two offers, then, if the defendants' letter of November 28th had been written on the 29th, after he had received the plaintiff's letter of the 28th, it could not be said that that did not make a good contract for 800 tons. I cannot see why the fact of the letters crossing each other should prevent their making a good contract. If I say I am willing to buy a man's house on certain terms, and he at the same moment says that he is willing to sell it, and these two letters are posted so that they are irrevocable with respect to the writers, why should not that constitute a good contract? The parties are ad idem at one and the same moment. On these grounds it appears to me that the judgment of the Court below was wrong, and ought to be reversed. I speak with some hesitation in this case when I find that the opinion of the majority of my Brothers is against me, and also when the question turns entirely on the construction of a somewhat ambiguously written letter.

BRETT, J. The question is, whether upon a true construction of this correspondence, there is a binding contract between the plaintiff and the defendants for the 800 tons of iron at 69s. It is argued on the one side that such a contract is disclosed because it is said that the defendants' letter of November 24th is an offer for the sale of 800 tons of iron, and this letter of November 28th leaves open the time for accepting that offer of November 24th, and makes a new offer with regard to another 400 tons; and that the defendants' offer of November 24th being thus opened by their letter of the 28th, the plaintiff's letter of the 28th is an acceptance of the defendants' offer of the 24th. On the other side it is argued that the defendants' letter of November 28th is not an opening of their offer of the 24th, but that it is an offer with regard to 1200 tons; and that even if it were a separate offer with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons, still that the true view of the matter is not that it reopens the letter of the 24th, but that it makes a new offer with regard to the 800 tons, and another separate offer, with regard to 400 tons; and that, upon such a view, the renewed offer with regard to 800 tons is not accepted, because the letter of the plaintiff of November 28th was not in answer to that offer, but was a letter crossing it. Now with regard to the construction of the defendants' letter of November 28th, it seems to me that we must consider that the defendant's letter of November 24th is in answer to a request of the plaintiffs of November 22d for an offer with regard to 800 tons, and is therefore an offer by them with regard to 800 tons. That offer left it open to the plaintiff to accept it within a period which is to be computed by the return of post. I agree that the words, "Your reply by return of post" fixes the time for acceptance, and not the manner of accepting. But that time elapsed; there was no acceptance within the limited time. So far from there being an acceptance, it seems to me that the plaintiff's letter of November 27th rejects that offer; it rejects it on the ground the the price is higher than the plaintiff is willing to give. That offer is, therefore, not accepted within the limited time, but is rejected, and it seems to me is at once dead. The letter of the 27th then asks for an offer with respect to 1200 tons, and the letter of November 28th is a letter written "In reply to your favor of yesterday," that is, In reply to your request for an offer with regard to 1200 tons. "I now make you this offer." That seems to me to show that the letter of November 28th of the defendants is an offer with regard to 1200 tons, and not with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons separately. The way in which the offer with regard to the 1200 tons is made is this: "With regard to the first 800 of them, I make you a new offer upon the same terms as I made in the former offer on the 24th. With regard to the remaining 400 tons, I offer you to deliver them at the same price, but at different periods of delivery."

I think that the defendants' letter of November 28th, being a letter in answer to a request with regard to 1200 tons, is an offer with regard to 1200 tons, and that no such offer was ever accepted; but even if it could be taken that it was a separate offer with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons, I cannot accede to the view that it reopened the offer of November 24th. That offer was dead, and was no longer binding upon the defendants at all, and therefore it seems to me to be a wrong phrase to say that it reopened the offer of November 24th. The only legal way of construing it is to say that it is a new offer with regard to 800 tons. If it were a separate offer, which I should think it was not, it then would be a new offer with regard to 800 tons, and a separate offer with regard to 400 tons, but, even if it were so, I should think that the new offer with regard to the 800 tons had never been accepted, so as to make a binding contract. The new offer would not, in my opinion, be accepted, by the fact of the plaintiff's letter of November 28th crossing it. If the defendants' letter of November 28th is a new offer of the 800 tons, that could not be accepted by the plaintiff until it came to his knowledge, and his letter of November 28th could only be considered as a cross offer. Put it thus: If I write to a person and say, "If you can give me £6000 for my house, I will sell it to you," and on the same day, and before that letter reaches him, he writes to me, saying, "If you will sell me your house for £6000 I will buy it," that would be two offers crossing each other, and cross offers are not an acceptance of each other, therefore there will be no offer of either party accepted by the other. That is the case where the contract is to be made by the letters, and by the letters only. I think it would be different if there were already a contract in fact made in words, and then the parties were to write letters to each other, which crossed in the post, those might make a very good memorandum of the contract already made, unless the Statute of Frauds intervened. But where the contract is to be made by the letters themselves, you cannot make it by cross offers, and say that the contract was made by one party accepting the offer which was made to him. It seems to me, therefore, in both views, that the judgment of the Court below was right.

Judgment of the Court below affirmed.[85]

[85] The dissenting opinion of Quain, J., and the opinions of Archibald, Blackburn, Grove, and Keating, JJ., concurring with Brett, J., have been omitted. In the course of his opinion, Blackburn, J., said: "When a contract is made between two parties, there is a promise by one, in consideration of the promise made by the other; there are two assenting minds, the parties agreeing in opinion, and one having promised in consideration of the promise of the other—there is an exchange of promises; but I do not think exchanging offers would, upon principle, be at all the same thing. There is, I believe, a total absence of authority on the point. I do not think, though I am not sure, that the question has ever been raised before. The promise or offer being made on each side in ignorance of the promise or the offer made on the other side, neither of them can be construed as an acceptance of the other. Either of the parties may write and say, "I accept your offer, and, as you perceive, I have already made a similar offer to you," and then people would know what they were about; I think either side might revoke."

HURFORD v. PILE.

(In the King's Bench, 1615. Cro. Jac. 483.)

Assumpsit. Whereas J. S. being in execution for forty pounds, the defendant said, "Deliver J. S. out of execution, and what it cost you I will repay;" wherefore J. S. was discharged by the plaintiff. The defendant for plea saith, that after the assumpsit, and before the plaintiff had done any thing in that business, he forbade him to meddle therein, and that he would not stand to his promise. The plaintiff demurred; and it was adjudged for the plaintiff.

HOUGHTON, Justice, said, that a man may discharge an assumpsit made to himself, but he cannot discharge an assumpsit made by himself: but, at another day, the defendant's counsel moved, that it was a good plea, and that as long as nothing was done, it was but an executory promise.

DODERIDGE. If I promise to J. S. that if he build an house upon my land before Michaelmas, I will pay him a hundred pounds, and I countermand it before he hath done any thing concerning the house, it is a good countermand.

HOUGHTON è contra; but he said, that may be considered in damages. Et adjournatur.

Afterwards, in Trinity term, judgment was given for the plaintiff.

PAYNE v. CAVE.

(In the King's Bench, 1789. 3 Term R. 148.)

This was an action, tried at the sittings after last term at Guildhall before Lord Kenyon, wherein the declaration stated that the plaintiff on 22d September, 1788, was possessed of a certain worm-tub, and a pewter worm in the same, which were then and there about to be sold by public auction by one S. M., the agent of the plaintiff in that behalf, the conditions of which sale were to be the usual conditions of sale of goods sold by auction, &c. of all which premises the defendant afterwards, to wit, &c. had notice; and thereupon the defendant in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, did then and there undertake, and promise to perform the conditions of the said sale, to be performed by the plaintiff, as seller, &c. undertook, and then and there promised the plaintiff to perform the conditions of the sale, to be performed on the part of the buyer, &c. And the plaintiff avers, that the conditions of sale, herein after mentioned, are usual conditions of sale of goods sold by auction, to wit, that the highest bidder should be the purchaser, and should deposit five shillings in the pound, and that if the lot purchased were not paid for and taken away in two days time, it should be put up again and resold, &c. [stating all the conditions]. It then stated that the defendant became the purchaser of the lot in question for £40, and was requested to pay the usual deposit which he refused, &c. At the trial, the plaintiff's counsel opened the case thus;—The goods were put up in one lot at an auction; there were several bidders, of whom the defendant was the last, who bid £40; the auctioneer dwelt on the bidding, on which the defendant said "why do you dwell, you will not get more;" the auctioneer said that he was informed the worm weighed at least 1,300 cwt., and was worth more than £40; the defendant then asked him whether he would warrant it to weigh so much, and receiving an answer in the negative, he then declared that he would not take it, and refused to pay for it. It was re-sold on a subsequent day's sale for £30 to the defendant, against whom the action was brought for the difference. Lord Kenyon, being of opinion on this statement of the case, that the defendant was at liberty to withdraw his bidding any time before the hammer was knocked down, nonsuited the plaintiff.

Walton now moved to set aside the nonsuit, on the ground that the bidder was bound by the conditions of the sale to abide by his bidding, and could not retract. By the act of bidding he acceded to those conditions, one of which was, that the highest bidder should be the buyer. The hammer is suspended, not for the benefit of the bidder, or to give him an opportunity of repenting, but for the benefit of the seller: in the mean time the person who bid last is a conditional purchaser, if nobody bids more. Otherwise it is in the power of any person to injure the vendor, because all the former biddings are discharged by the last: and, as it happened in this very instance, the goods may thereby ultimately be sold for less than the person who was last out-bid would have given for them. The case of Simon v. Motivos, 3 Burrows, 1921, which was mentioned at the trial, does not apply. That turned on the statute of frauds.

THE COURT thought the nonsuit very proper. The auctioneer is the agent of the vendor, and the assent of both parties is necessary to make the contract binding; that is signified on the part of the seller, by knocking down the hammer, which was not done here till the defendant had retracted. An auction is not unaptly called locus pœnitentiæ. Every bidding is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on either side till it is assented to. But according to what is now contended for, one party would be bound by the offer, and the other not, which can never be allowed.

Rule refused.[86]

[86] In accord: Anderson v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 107 Minn. 296, 120 N. W. 39, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1133, 131 Am. St. Rep. 462, 16 Ann. Cas. 379 (1909). In Eskridge v. Glover, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 264, 26 Am. Dec. 344 (1834), the defendant agreed to trade horses with plaintiff and pay $50 cash, if after plaintiff rode defendant's horse 10 miles he should be pleased with him. Then defendant ran after plaintiff and withdrew.

Bids on public contracts are sometimes made irrevocable by statute. See City of Baltimore v. J. L. Robinson Const. Co., 123 Md. 660, 91 Atl. 682, L.

COOKE v. OXLEY.

(In the King's Bench, 1790. 3 Term R. 653.)

This was an action upon the case; and the third count in the declaration, upon which the verdict was taken, stated that on, etc., a certain discourse was had, etc., concerning the buying of 266 hogsheads of tobacco; and on that discourse the defendant proposed to the plaintiff that the former should sell and deliver to the latter the said 266 hogsheads [at a certain price]; whereupon the plaintiff desired the defendant to give him (the plaintiff) time to agree to or dissent from the proposal till the hour of four in the afternoon of that day, to which the defendant agreed; and thereupon the defendant proposed to the plaintiff to sell and deliver the same upon the terms aforesaid, if the plaintiff would agree to purchase them upon the terms aforesaid, and would give notice thereof to the defendant before the hour of four in the afternoon of that day; the plaintiff averred that he did agree to purchase the same upon the terms aforesaid, and did give notice thereof to the defendant before the hour of four in the afternoon of that day; he also averred that he requested the defendant to deliver to him the said hogsheads, and offered to pay to the defendant the said price for the same, yet that the defendant did not, etc.

A rule having been obtained to show cause why the judgment should not be arrested, on the ground that there was no consideration for the defendant's promise.

Erskine and Wood now showed cause. This was a bargain and sale on condition; and though the plaintiff might have rescinded the contract before 4 o'clock, yet not having done so, the condition was complied with, and both parties were bound by the agreement. The declaration considered this as a complete bargain and sale; for the breach of the agreement is for not delivering the tobacco, and not for not selling it.

Lord Kenyon, C. J. (stopping Bearcroft, who was to have argued in support of the rule). Nothing can be clearer than that at the time of entering into this contract the engagement was all on one side; the other party was not bound; it was therefore nudum pactum.

Buller, J. It is impossible to support this declaration in any point of view. In order to sustain a promise, there must be either a damage to the plaintiff, or an advantage to the defendant; but here was neither when the contract was first made. Then as to the subsequent time, the promise can only be supported on the ground of a new contract made at 4 o'clock; but there is no pretence for that. It has been argued that this must be taken to be a complete sale from the time when the condition was complied with; but it was not complied with, for it is not stated that the defendant did agree at 4 o'clock to the terms of the sale; or even that the goods were kept till that time.

GROSE, J. The agreement was not binding on the plaintiff before 4 o'clock; and it is not stated that the parties came to any subsequent agreement; there is therefore no consideration for the promise.

BOSTON & MAINE R. R. v. BARTLETT et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1849. 3 Cush. 224.)

This was a bill in equity for the specific performance of a contract in writing.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants on April 1, 1844, being the owners of certain land situated in Boston, and particularly described in the bill, "in consideration that said corporation would take into consideration the expediency of buying said land for their use as a corporation, signed a certain writing dated April 1, 1844," whereby they agreed to convey to the plaintiffs "the said lot of land, for the sum of $20,000, if the said corporation would take the same within thirty days from that date;" that afterward and within the thirty days, the defendants, at the request of the plaintiffs, "and in consideration that the said corporation agreed to keep in consideration the expediency of taking said land," etc., extended the said term of thirty days, by a writing underneath the written contract above mentioned, for thirty days from the expiration thereof; that, on May 29, 1844, while the extended contract was in full force, and unrescinded, the plaintiffs elected to take the land on the terms specified in the contract, and notified the defendants of their election, and offered to pay them the agreed price (producing the same in money) for a conveyance of the land, and requested the defendants to execute a conveyance thereof, which the plaintiffs tendered to them for that purpose; and that the defendants refused to execute such conveyance, or to perform the contract, and had ever since neglected and refused to perform the same.

The defendants demurred generally.

FLETCHER, J. In support of the demurrer, in this case, the only ground assumed and insisted on by the defendants is, that the agreement on their part was without consideration, and therefore not obligatory. In the view taken of the case by the Court, no importance is attached to the consideration set out in the bill—namely, "that the plaintiffs would take into consideration the expediency of buying the land." The argument for the defendants, that their agreement was not binding, because without consideration, erroneously assumes that the writing executed by the defendants is to be considered as constituting a contract at the time it was made. The decision of the Court in Maine in the case of Bean v. Burbank, 16 Me. 458, 33 Am. Dec. 681, which was referred to for the defendants, seems to rest on the ground assumed by them in this case.

In the present case, though the writing signed by the defendants was but an offer, and an offer which might be revoked, yet while it remained in force and unrevoked, it was a continuing offer during the time limited for acceptance; and, during the whole of that time, it was an offer every instant, but as soon as it was accepted, it ceased to be an offer merely, and then ripened into a contract. The counsel for the defendants is most surely in the right, in saying that the writing when made was without consideration, and did not therefore form a contract. It was then but an offer to contract, and the parties making the offer most undoubtedly might have withdrawn it at any time before acceptance.

But when the offer was accepted, the minds of the parties met, and the contract was complete. There was then the meeting of the minds of the parties, which constitutes and is the definition of a contract. The acceptance by the plaintiffs constituted a sufficient legal consideration for the engagement on the part of the defendants. There was then nothing wanting, in order to perfect a valid contract on the part of the defendants. It was precisely as if the parties had met at the time of the acceptance, and the offer had then been made and accepted and the bargain completed at once.

A different doctrine, however, prevails in France and Scotland and Holland. It is there held that whenever an offer is made, granting to a party a certain time within which he is to be entitled to decide, whether he will accept it or not, the party making such offer is not at liberty to withdraw it before the lapse of the appointed time. There are certainly very strong reasons in support of this doctrine. Highly respectable authors regard it as inconsistent with the plain principles of equity, that a person, who has been induced to rely on such an engagement, should have no remedy in case of disappointment. But whether wisely and equitably or not, the common law unyieldingly insists upon a consideration, or a paper with a seal attached.

The authorities, both English and American, in support of this view of the subject, are very numerous and decisive; but it is not deemed to be needful or expedient to refer particularly to them, as they are collected and commented on in several reports as well as in the textbooks. The case of Cooke v. Oxley, 3 T. R. 653, in which a different doctrine was held, has occasioned considerable discussion, and in one or two instances has probably influenced the decision. That case has been supposed to be inaccurately reported, and that in fact there was in that case no acceptance. But however that may be, if the case has not been directly overruled, it has certainly in later cases been entirely disregarded, and cannot now be considered as of any authority.

As therefore in the present case the bill sets out a proposal in writing, and an acceptance and an offer to perform, on the part of the plaintiffs, within the time limited, and while the offer was in full force, all of which is admitted by the demurrer, so that a valid contract in writing is shown to exist, the demurrer must be overruled.[87]

BYRNE & CO. v. VAN TIENHOVEN & CO.

(In the High Court of Justice, Common Pleas Division, 1880. L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 344.)

LINDLEY, J.[88] This was an action for the recovery of damages for the non-delivery by the defendants to the plaintiffs of 1000 boxes of tinplates, pursuant to an alleged contract, which I will refer to presently. The action was tried at Cardiff before myself without a jury; and it was agreed at the trial that in the event of the plaintiffs being entitled to damages they should be £375.

The defendants carried on business at Cardiff and the plaintiffs at New York, and it takes ten or eleven days for a letter posted at either place to reach the other. The alleged contract consists of a letter written by the defendants to the plaintiffs on October 1st, 1879, and received by them on the 11th, and accepted by telegram and letter sent to the defendants on October 11th and 15th respectively. [The letter of October 1st, 1879, from the defendants to the plaintiffs contained a reference to the price of tinplates, and made an "offer of 1000 boxes of this brand 14x20 at 15s. 6d. per box f..o. b. here with 1 per cent. for our commission; terms, four months' banker's acceptance on London or Liverpool against shipping documents, but subject to your cable on or before the 15th inst. here." The plaintiffs accepted by cable sent on October 11th, 1879, and confirmed it by letter sent October 15th, 1879. On October 8th the defendants mailed to the plaintiffs a letter with-

87 In Ellis' Adm'r v. Durkee, 79 Vt. 341, 65 Atl. 94 (1906), the court said: "The only importance of inquiring whether or not an offer is supported by a consideration is to determine whether it can be withdrawn by the party making it before it is accepted by the party to whom it is made. If it is based upon a consideration, the power of revocation is not attached to it. But, though it be without consideration, it may be accepted so as to make a binding contract if not sooner revoked, but it may be revoked at any time before it is accepted—and this is so though it states a certain time during which it is to remain open."

drawing their offer of the 1st. This letter was received by the plaintiffs on October 20th. The plaintiffs refused to recognize the revocation, demanded performance by both cable and mail, and later brought this action.] * * *

There is no doubt that an offer can be withdrawn before it is accepted, and it is immaterial whether the offer is expressed to be open for acceptance for a given time or not—Routledge v. Grant [4 Bing. 653]. For the decision of the present case, however, it is necessary to consider two other questions—viz.: 1. Whether a withdrawal of an offer has any effect until it is communicated to the person to whom the offer has been sent? 2. Whether posting a letter of withdrawal is a communication to the person to whom the letter is sent?

It is curious that neither of these questions appears to have been actually decided in this country. As regards the first question, I am aware that Pothier and some other writers of celebrity are of opinion that there can be no contract if an offer is withdrawn before it is accepted, although the withdrawal is not communicated to the person to whom the offer has been made. The reason for this opinion is that there is not, in fact, any such consent by both parties as is essential to constitute a contract between them. Against this view, however, it has been urged that a state of mind not notified cannot be regarded in dealings between man and man; and that an uncommunicated revocation is for all practical purposes and in point of law no revocation at all. This is the view taken in the United States. See Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Insurance Co. [9 How. 390, 13 L. Ed. 187] cited in Benjamin on Sales, pp. 56–58, and it is adopted by Mr. Benjamin. The same view is taken by Mr. Pollock in his excellent work on Principles of Contract, 2d. ed., p. 10, and by Mr. Leake in his Digest of the Law of Contracts, p. 43. This view, moreover, appears to me much more in accordance with the general principles of English law than the view maintained by Pothier. I pass, therefore, to the next question—viz., whether posting the letter of revocation was a sufficient communication of it to the plaintiff. The offer was posted on October 1st, the withdrawal was posted on the 8th, and did not reach the plaintiff until after he had posted his letter of the 11th, accepting the offer. It may be taken as now settled that where an offer is made and accepted by letters sent through the post, the contract is completed the moment the letter accepting the offer is posted (Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587; Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381) even although it never reaches its destination. When, however, these authorities are looked at, it will be seen that they are based upon the principle that the writer of the offer has expressly or impliedly assented to treat an answer to him by a letter duly posted as a sufficient acceptance and notification to himself, or, in other words, he has made the post-office his agent to receive the acceptance and notification of it.

But this principle appears to me to be inapplicable to the case of the withdrawal of an offer. In this particular case I can find no evidence of any authority in fact given by the plaintiffs to the defendants to notify a withdrawal of their offer by merely posting a letter; and there is no legal principle or decision which compels me to hold, contrary to the fact, that the letter of October 8th is to be treated as communicated to the plaintiff on that day or on any day before the 20th, when the letter reached them. But before that letter had reached the plaintiffs they had accepted the offer, both by telegram and by post; and they had themselves resold the tinplates at a profit. In my opinion the withdrawal by the defendants on October 8th of their offer of the 1st was inoperative; and a complete contract binding on both parties was entered into on October 11th, when the plaintiffs accepted the offer of the 1st, which they had no reason to suppose had been withdrawn. Before leaving this part of the case it may be as well to point out the extreme injustice and inconvenience which any other conclusion would produce. If the defendants' contention were to prevail, no person who had received an offer by post and had accepted it would know his position until he had waited such a time as to be quite sure that a letter withdrawing the offer had not been posted before his acceptance of it. It appears to me that both legal principles and practical convenience require that a person who has accepted an offer not known to him to have been revoked shall be in a position safely to act upon the footing that the offer and acceptance constitute a contract binding on both parties. * * *

Judgment for plaintiffs.[89]

(In the Court of Session of Scotland, 1855. 18 Sc. Sess. Cas. [Dunlop] 1.)

The LORD PRESIDENT[90] [in the course of his opinion, said:] I hold that a simple unconditional offer may be recalled at any time before acceptance, and that it may be so recalled by a letter transmitted by post; but I hold that the mere posting of a letter of recall does not make that letter effectual as a recall, so as from the moment of posting to prevent the completion of the contract by acceptance. An offer is nothing until it is communicated to the party to whom it is made, and who is to decide whether he will or will not accept the offer. In like manner I think the recall or withdrawal of an offer that has been communicated can have no effect until the recall or withdrawal has been communicated, or may be assumed to have been commu-

In some of the attempts at codifying the law of contracts there is a provision that a revocation of an offer is operative just as soon as it is put in the course of transmission through the post. See Watters v. Lincoln, 29 S. D. 98, 135 N. W. 712 (1912); also a criticism of the California Code provision, by Lewinsohn, "Mutual Assent in California" (1914) 2 Cal. L. Rev. 341.

nicated, to the party holding the offer. An offer, pure and unconditional, puts it in the power of the party to whom it is addressed to accept the offer, until by the lapse of a reasonable time he has lost the right [power], or until the party who has made the offer gives notice,—that is, makes known that he withdraws it. The purpose of the recall is to prevent the party to whom the offer was made from acting upon the offer by accepting it. This necessarily implies precommunication to the party who is to be so prevented.

The argument for the defender upon this branch of the case was rested upon what I cannot help regarding as a strained application of a rule or maxim, sufficiently sound in general application, but which cannot be applied in the most strictly literal sense that the words admit of. It was contended, that as the offerer had changed his mind, and had posted a letter announcing that change before the offeree had declared his mind by posting his acceptance, the intention or consent to purchase cannot be held to have continued until the consent to sell was declared, and consequently that at no one moment of time was there in idem placitum consensus atque conventio, which is said to be essential to a paction. It was argued, upon a rigid application of that definition, that the completion of the contract was interrupted by change of mind, though not yet communicated, just as it would have been by the death or insanity of the offerer, and that all these three events are classed together by some writers as being alike revocations of the offer. Death or insanity may prevent the completion of the contract as effectually as the most complete revocation, but they are not properly revocations of the offer. They are not acts of the will of the offerer, and their effect does not rest upon a supposed change of purpose. They interrupt the completion of the contract,—that is, the making of the contract,—because a contract cannot be made directly with a dead man or a lunatic. The contract is not made until the offer is accepted; and if the person with whom you merely intend to contract dies or becomes insane before you have contracted with him, you can no longer contract directly with him.[91] You cannot, by adhibiting your acceptance to an offer, and addressing it to a dead man or a lunatic, make it binding on him, whether his death or insanity be or be not known to you. In such a case there is no revocation, in the correct use of the word, but there is an interruption—an effectual obstacle to the completion of the contract, equivalent in result [91] The death of the offeror extinguishes the power of acceptance, even though (it appears) the offeree has no notice thereof. Jordan v. Dobbins, 122 Mass. 168, 23 Am. Rep. 305 (1877); National Eagle Bank v. Hunt, 16 R. I. 148, 13 Atl. 115 (1888); Vantassel v. Hathaway, 53 Me. 18 (1864); Union Sawmill Co. v. Mitchell, 122 La. 900, 48 South. 317 (1909); Pratt v. Trustees of Baptist Soc. of Elgin, 93 Ill. 475, 34 Am. Rep. 187 (1879); Twenty-Third Street Baptist Church v. Cornell, 117 N. Y. 601, 23 N. E. 177, 6 L. R. A. 807 (1890); Wallace v. Townsend, 43 Ohio St. 537, 3 N. E. 601, 54 Am. Rep. 829 (1885); In re Helfenstein's Estate, 77 Pa. 328, 18 Am. Rep. 449 (1875). So also insanity. Beach v. First Methodist Episcopal Church, 96 Ill. 177 (1880).

to a revocation, though operating by very different facts and very different principles. Revocation or recall is an act of the offerer, by which he communicates his change of purpose, and withdraws from the offeree the right [power] he had given him to complete the contract by acceptance. Having communicated his purpose to purchase, the offeree is entitled to regard that purpose as unchanged until a change is communicated. He has acquired a right [power], which he retains until it is withdrawn from him by a communication from the party who conferred it. If he exercises the right [power] by a completed act of acceptance of the offer before notice has reached him, or ought in ordinary course to have reached him, the contract will be binding, although a change of mind on the part of the offerer had taken place, and although he had taken a step towards communicating that change of mind by writing a letter, or even putting it into the post-office. In a great many cases the maxim that there must be a concurrence of will at the moment of completion of the contract cannot be rigidly or literally applied. The very opposite may be the fact. Although one cannot, by accepting an offer, bind a dead or insane person, he may bind an unwilling person, one who has altogether changed his mind. Such cases are not unfrequent. If an offer bears that it is to be binding for a certain number of days or hours, the offerer may repent before the lapse of the given time, and yet at the end of it may find himself unwillingly bound; or if an offerer changes his mind, but does not take the proper steps to have his change of mind conveyed to the offeree,—either writes no letter, or writes a letter which he omits to send, or sends it by mistake to a wrong place,—he may find himself unwillingly bound. Other cases may be figured. Mere change of mind on the part of the offeree will not prevent an effectual acceptance,—not even although that change of mind should be evinced by having been communicated to a third party, or recorded in a formal writing, as for instance in a notarial instrument. In all these cases a binding contract may be made between the parties without that consensus or concursus which a rigidly literal reading of the maxim or rule would require.

Upon the grounds now indicated, I hold that the mere putting of the letter of recall into a distant post-office before the acceptance was sent off did not put an end to the offer and exclude the power of the offeree, to bind the offerer by accepting the offer. I hold that a letter of recall has no effect till the recall has become known to the offeree, or should in due course have become known to him. In the present case the letter of recall reached its destination on 2d December, and on that day became known to the pursuers. The letter of acceptance had been posted on the preceding day, the 1st of December; but it is averred that it had not reached its destination when the recall was received on the morning of the 2d. I hold that, in the circumstances averred, the delivery and receipt of the letter of recall did not interrupt or prevent the completion of the contract. I do not think that the principle to which I have referred, as that applicable to the recall of an offer, applies equally to the acceptance of an offer; or that everything which must be done, in order to effectuate the recall of an offer, must, in like manner, be done in order to give effect to the acceptance of an offer. The two things are in their nature different. The one consists in effectually undoing something that the party himself has already done, and which binds him unless it is effectually undone; the other consists in merely acceding to a proposal made. What it is that the acceptor must do in order to make his acceptance effectual, and to put it out of the power of the offerer to recall his offer, depends on circumstances. Some things he must do. He must make his acceptance in writing, and he must send forth or give up that writing to or for behoof of the offerer. It is not enough that he commits his acceptance to writing and locks it in his own repositories; and, on the other hand, it is not necessary that he shall deliver it personally to the offerer. When an offer is made by letter from a distance through the medium of the post, the offerer selecting that medium of transmission authorizes and invites the offeree to communicate his acceptance through the same medium. If the offeree avails himself of that medium of communication, and transmits his acceptance, properly addressed through the post-office, and if the acceptance reaches its destination in the due and regular course of that medium of transmission, I am of opinion that the act of acceptance was completed by the putting of the letter into the post-office; and that a letter of recall, which did not arrive till after that act, cannot be held to have interrupted the completion of the contract. By putting the letter of acceptance into the post-office, the offeree did just what he was invited to do, and all that it was incumbent on him or possible for him to do in the way of acceptance, by the mode of communication which he was authorized, if not invited, by the offerer to adopt. * * *

Lord CURRIEHILL, [in a dissenting opinion, said:] But the defender's offer to the pursuers, although it did not create a binding obligation on him so long as nothing followed upon it, had then the twofold effect of conferring one power upon the pursuers, and of reserving another power to the defender himself. On the one hand, the power which was thereby conferred upon the pursuers was to accept the offer at any moment, within a reasonable period, so as to bind themselves to perform the counterpart of the proposed contract of sale. That was an implied condition of the offer, and there was placed in the pursuers the option of purifying that condition by accepting the offer within due time. As the period of time which was allowed for acceptance, is not stated in the offer, it might have been a question of some nicety how long it was to endure; but that question is not raised in the present case.

On the other hand, the power which the defender reserved to himself was to retract that offer, and thereby put an end to it at any moment, so long as the pursuers did not exercise their power by accepting of the offer to the effect above mentioned.[92] * * *

DICKINSON v. DODDS.

(In the Court of Appeal, Chancery Division, 1876. 2 Ch. Div. 463.)

On Wednesday, the 10th of June, 1874, the defendant John Dodds signed and delivered to the plaintiff, George Dickinson, a memorandum, of which the material part was as follows:

"I hereby agree to sell to Mr. George Dickinson the whole of the dwelling-houses, garden ground, stabling, and outbuildings thereto belonging, situate at Croft, belonging to me, for the sum of £800. As witness my hand this tenth day of June, 1874.

"£800. [Signed] John Dodds."

"P. S.—This offer to be left over until Friday, 9 o'clock a. m. J. D. (the twelfth), 12th June, 1874. [Signed] J. Dodds."

The bill alleged that Dodds understood and intended that the plaintiff should have until Friday, 9 a. m., within which to determine whether he would or would not purchase, and that he should absolutely have until that time the refusal of the property at the price of £800. and that the plaintiff in fact determined to accept the offer on the morning of Thursday, the 11th of June, but did not at once signify his acceptance to Dodds, believing that he had the power to accept it until 9. a. m. on the Friday.

In the afternoon of the Thursday the plaintiff was informed by a Mr. Berry that Dodds had been offering or agreeing to sell the property to Thomas Allan, the other defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff, at about half past seven in the evening, went to the house of Mrs. Burgess, the mother-in-law of Dodds, where he was then staying, and left with her a formal acceptance in writing of the offer to sell the property. According to the evidence of Mrs. Burgess this document never in fact reached Dodds, she having forgotten to give it to him.

On the following (Friday) morning, at about seven o'clock, Berry, who was acting as agent for Dickinson, found Dodds at the Darlington railway station, and handed to him a duplicate of the acceptance by Dickinson, and explained to Dodds its purport. He replied that it was too late, as he had sold the property. A few minutes later Dickinson himself found Dodds entering a railway carriage, and handed him another duplicate of the notice of acceptance, but Dodds declined to receive it, saying: "You are too late. I have sold the property."

It appeared that on the day before, Thursday, the 11th of June, Dodds had signed a formal contract for the sale of the property to the defendant Allan for £800, and had received from him a deposit of £40.

The bill in this suit prayed that the defendant Dodds might be decreed specifically to perform the contract of the 10th of June, 1874; that he might be restrained from conveying the property to Allan; that Allan might be restrained from taking any such conveyance; that, if any such conveyance had been or should be made, Allan might be declared a trustee of the property for, and might be directed to convey the property to, the plaintiff; and for damages.

The cause came on for hearing before Vice Chancellor Bacon on the 25th of January 1876. [It was his opinion that Dodds could withdraw only by giving notice to Dickinson, in spite of Cooke v. Oxley, 3 T. R. 653, and that the contract took effect by the doctrine of relation back as of the time of the offer and hence was prior to the sale to Allan. He therefore decreed specific performance in favor of the plaintiff. From the decision both of the defendants appealed.]

The document, though beginning "I hereby agree to sell," was nothing but an offer, and was only intended to be an offer, for the plaintiff himself tells us that he required time to consider whether he would enter into an agreement or not. Unless both parties had then agreed, there was no concluded agreement then made; it was in effect and substance only an offer to sell. The plaintiff, being minded not to complete the bargain at that time, added this memorandum: "This offer to be left over until Friday, 9 o'clock a. m. 12th June, 1874." That shows it was only an offer. There was no consideration given for the undertaking or promise, to whatever extent it may be considered binding, to keep the property unsold until 9 o'clock on Friday morning; but apparently Dickinson was of opinion, and probably Dodds was of the same opinion, that he (Dodds) was bound by that promise, and could not in any way withdraw from it, or retract it, until 9 o'clock on Friday morning, and this probably explains a good deal of what afterwards took place. But it is clear settled law, on one of the clearest principles of law, that this promise, being a mere nudum pactum, was not binding, and that at any moment before a complete acceptance by Dickinson of the offer, Dodds was as free as Dickinson himself. Well, that being the state of things, it is said that the only mode in which Dodds could assert that freedom was by actually and distinctly saying to Dickinson, "Now I withdraw my offer." It appears to me that there is neither principle nor authority for the proposition that there must be an express and actual withdrawal of the offer, or what is called a retractation. It must, to constitute a contract, appear that the two minds were at one, at the same moment of time, that is, that there was an offer continuing up to the time of the acceptance. If there was not such a continuing offer, then the acceptance comes to nothing. Of course it may well be that the one man is bound in some way or other to let the other man know that his mind with regard to the offer has been changed; but in this case, beyond all question, the plaintiff knew that Dodds was no longer minded to sell the property to him as plainly and clearly as if Dodds had told him in so many words, "I withdraw the offer." This is evident from the plaintiff's own statements in the bill.

The plaintiff says in effect that, having heard and knowing that Dodds was no longer minded to sell to him, and that he was selling or had sold to some one else, thinking that he could not in point of law withdraw his offer, meaning to fix him to it, and endeavoring to bind him: "I went to the house where he was lodging, and saw his mother-in-law, and left with her an acceptance of the offer, knowing all the while that he had entirely changed his mind. I got an agent to watch for him at 7 o'clock the next morning, and I went to the train just before 9 o'clock, in order that I might catch him and give him my notice of acceptance just before 9 o'clock, and when that occurred he told my agent, and he told me, 'You are too late,' and he then threw back the paper." It is to my mind quite clear that before there was any attempt at acceptance by the plaintiff, he was perfectly well aware that Dodds had changed his mind, and that he had in fact agreed to sell the property to Allan. It is impossible, therefore, to say there was ever that existence of the same mind between the two parties which is essential in point of law to the making of an agreement. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff has failed to prove that there was any binding contract between Dodds and himself.

MELLISH, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The first question is, whether this document of the 10th of June, 1874, which was signed by Dodds, was an agreement to sell, or only an offer to sell, the property therein mentioned to Dickinson; and I am clearly of opinion that it was only an offer, although it is in the first part of it, independently of the postscript, worded as an agreement. I apprehend that, until acceptance, so that both parties are bound, even though an instrument is so worded as to express that both parties agree, it is in point of law only an offer, and, until both parties are bound, neither party is bound. It is not necessary that both parties should be bound within the statute of frauds, for, if one party makes an offer in writing, and the other accepts it verbally, that will be sufficient to bind the person who has signed the written document. But, if there be no agreement, either verbally or in writing, then, until acceptance, it is in point of law an offer only, although worded as if it were an agreement. But it is hardly necessary to resort to that doctrine in the present case, because the postscript calls it an offer, and says, "This offer to be left over until Friday, 9 o'clock a. m." Well, then, this being only an offer, and the law says—and it is a perfectly clear rule of law—that, although it is said that the offer is to be left open until Friday morning at 9 o'clock, that did not bind Dodds. He was not in point of law bound to hold the offer over until 9 o'clock on Friday morning. He was not so bound either in law or in equity. Well, that being so, when on the next day he made an agreement with Allan to sell the property to him, I am not aware of any ground on which it can be said that that contract with Allan was not as good and binding a contract as ever was made. Assuming Allan to have known (there is some dispute about it, and Allan does not admit that he knew of it, but I will assume that he did) that Dodds had made the offer to Dickinson, and had given him till Friday morning at 9 o'clock to accept it, still in point of law that could not prevent Allan from making a more favorable offer than Dickinson, and entering at once into a binding agreement with Dodds.

Then Dickinson is informed by Berry that the property has been sold by Dodds to Allan. Berry does not tell us from whom he heard it, but he says that he did hear it, that he knew it, and that he informed Dickinson of it. Now, stopping there, the question which arises is this: If an offer has been made for the sale of property, and before that offer is accepted the person who has made the offer enters into a binding agreement to sell the property to somebody else, and the person to whom the offer was first made receives notice in some way that the property has been sold to another person, can he after that make a binding contract by the acceptance of the offer? I am of opinion that he cannot. The law may be right or wrong in saying that a person who has given to another a certain time within which to accept an offer is not bound by his promise to give that time; but, if he is not bound by that promise, and may still sell the property to some one else, and if it be the law that, in order to make a contract, the two minds must be in agreement at some one time, that is, at the time of the acceptance, how is it possible that when the person to whom the offer has been made knows that the person who has made the offer has sold the property to some one else, and that, in fact, he has not remained in the same mind to sell it to him, he can be at liberty to accept the offer and thereby make a binding contract? It seems to me that would be simply absurd. If a man makes an offer to sell a particular horse in his stable, and says, "I will give you until the day after to-morrow to accept the offer," and the next day goes and sells the horse to somebody else, and receives the purchase money from him, can the person to whom the offer was originally made then come and say, "I accept," so as to make a binding contract, and so as to be entitled to recover damages for the non-delivery of the horse? If the rule of law is that a mere offer to sell property, which can be withdrawn at any time, and which is made dependent on the acceptance of the person to whom it is made, is a mere nudum pactum, how is it possible that the person to whom the offer has been made can by acceptance make a binding contract after he knows that the person who has made the offer has sold the property to some one else? It is admitted law that, if a man who makes an offer dies, the offer cannot be accepted after he is dead; and parting with the property has very much the same effect as the death of the owner, for it makes the performance of the offer impossible. I am clearly of opinion that, just as when a man who has made an offer dies before it is accepted it is impossible that it can then be accepted, so when once the person to whom the offer was made knows that the property has been sold to some one else, it is too late for him to accept the offer, and on that ground I am clearly of opinion that there was no binding contract for the sale of this property by Dodds to Dickinson; and, even if there had been, it seems to me that the sale of the property to Allan was first in point of time. However, it is not necessary to consider, if there had been two binding contracts, which of them would be entitled to priority in equity, because there is no binding contract between Dodds and Dickinson.

BAGGALLAY, J. A. I entirely concur in the judgments which have been pronounced.

JAMES, L. J. The bill will be dismissed, with costs.[98]

SHUEY v. UNITED STATES.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1875. 92 U. S. 73, 23 L. Ed. 697.)

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

Henry B. Ste. Marie filed his petition in the Court of Claims to recover the sum of $15,000, being the balance alleged to be due him of the reward of $25,000 offered by the Secretary of War, on April 20th, 1865, for the apprehension of John H. Surratt, one of Booth's alleged accomplices in the murder of President Lincoln.

The Court below found the facts as follows:

1. On April 20th, 1865, the Secretary of War issued, and caused to be published in the public newspapers and otherwise, a proclamation, whereby he announced that there would be paid by the War Department "for the apprehension of John H. Surratt, one of Booth's accomplices," $25,000 reward, and also that "liberal rewards will be paid for any information that shall conduce to the arrest of either of the above-named criminals or their accomplices;" and such proclamation was not limited in terms to any specific period, and it was signed "Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War." On November 24th, 1865, the President caused to be published his order revoking the reward offered for the arrest of John H. Surratt. 13 Stat. 778.

2. In April, 1866, John H. Surratt was a zouave in the military service of the Papal Government, and the claimant was also a zouave in the same service. During that month he communicated to Mr. King, the American Minister at Rome, the fact that he had discovered and identified Surratt, who had confessed to him his participation in the plot against the life of President Lincoln. The claimant also subsequently communicated further information to the same effect, and kept watch, at the request of the American Minister, over Surratt. Thereupon certain diplomatic correspondence passed between the Government of the United States and the Papal Government relative to the arrest and extradition of Surratt; and on November 6th, 1866, the Papal Government, at the request of the United States, ordered the arrest of Surratt, and that he be brought to Rome, he then being at Veroli. Under this order of the Papal Government, Surratt was arrested; but, at the moment of leaving prison at Veroli, he escaped from the guard having him in custody, and, crossing the frontier of the Papal territory, embarked at Naples, and escaped to Alexandria in Egypt. Immediately after his escape, and both before and after his embarkation at Naples, the American Minister at Rome, being informed of the escape by the Papal Government, took measures to trace and rearrest him, which was done in Alexandria. From that place he was subsequently conveyed by the American Government to the United States; but the American Minister, having previously procured the discharge of the claimant from the Papal military service, sent him forward to Alexandria to identify Surratt. At the time of the first interview between the claimant and the American Minister, and at all subsequent times until the final capture of Surratt, they were ignorant of the fact that the reward offered by the Secretary of War for his arrest had been revoked by the President. The discovery and arrest of Surratt were due entirely to the disclosures made by the claimant to the American Minister at Rome; but the arrest was not made by the claimant, either at Veroli, or subsequently at Alexandria.

3. There has been paid to the claimant by the defendants, under the Act of July 27th, 1868 (15 Stat. 234, § 3), the sum of $10,000. Such payment was made by a draft on the Treasury payable to the order of the claimant, which draft was by him duly indorsed.

The Court found as a matter of law that the claimant's service, as set forth in the foregoing findings, did not constitute an arrest of Surratt within the meaning of the proclamation, but was merely the giving of information which conduced to the arrest. For such information the remuneration allowed to him under the Act of Congress was a full satisfaction, and discharges the defendants from all liability.

The petition was dismissed accordingly, whereupon an appeal was taken to this Court.

Ste. Marie having died pendente lite, his executor was substituted in his stead.

STRONG, J. We agree with the Court of Claims, that the service rendered by the plaintiff's testator was, not the apprehension of John H. Surratt, for which the War Department had offered a reward of $25,000, but giving information that conduced to the arrest. These are quite distinct things, though one may have been a consequence of the other. The proclamation of the Secretary of War treated them as different; and, while a reward of $25,000 was offered for the apprehension, the offer for information was only a "liberal reward." The findings of the Court of Claims also exhibit a clear distinction between making the arrest and giving the information that led to it. It is found as a fact, that the arrest was not made by the claimant, though the discovery and arrest were due entirely to the disclosures made by him. The plain meaning of this is, that Surratt's apprehension was a consequence of the disclosures made. But the consequence of a man's act are not his acts. Between the consequence and the disclosure that leads to it there may be, and in this case there were, intermediate agencies. Other persons than the claimant made the arrest—persons who were not his agents, and who themselves were entitled to the proffered reward for his arrest, if any persons were. We think, therefore, that at most the claimant was entitled to the "liberal reward" promised for information conducing to the arrest; and that reward he has received.[94]

But, if this were not so, the judgment given by the Court of Claims is correct.

The offer of a reward for the apprehension of Surratt was revoked on November 24th, 1865; and notice of the revocation was published. It is not to be doubted that the offer was revocable at any time before it was accepted, and before anything had been done in reliance upon it. There was no contract until its terms were complied with. Like any other offer of a contract, it might, therefore, be withdrawn before rights had accrued under it; and it was withdrawn through the same channel in which it was made. The same notoriety was given to the revocation that was given to the offer; and the findings of fact do not show that any information was given by the claimant, or that he did anything to entitle him to the reward offered, until five months after the offer had been withdrawn. True, it is found that then, and at all times until the arrest was actually made, he was ignorant of the withdrawal; but that is an immaterial fact. The offer of the reward not having been made to him directly, but by means of a published proclamation, he should have known that it could be revoked in the manner in which it was made.

OFFORD v. DAVIES et al.

(In the Court of Common Pleas, 1862. 12 C. B. N. S. 748.)

This was an action upon a guarantee.

The first count of the declaration stated that, by a certain instrument in writing signed by the defendants, and addressed and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff, the defendants undertook, promised, and agreed with the plaintiff in the words and figures following—that is to say: "We, the undersigned, in consideration of your discounting, at our request, bills of exchange for Messrs. Davies & Co., of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, drapers, hereby jointly and severally guarantee for the space of twelve calendar months the due payment of all such bills of exchange, to the extent of £600. And we further jointly and severally undertake to make good any loss or expenses you may sustain or incur in consequence of advancing Messrs. Davies & Co. such moneys." Averment, that the plaintiff, relying on the said promise of the defendants, after the making of the said promise, and within the space of twelve calendar months thereafter, did discount divers bills of exchange for the said Messrs. Davies & Co, of Newtown aforesaid, certain of which bills of exchange became due and payable before the commencement of this suit, but were not then or at any other time duly paid, and the said bills respectively were dishonored; and that the plaintiff, after the making of the said promise, and within the said twelve calendar months, advanced to the said Messrs. Davies & Co. divers sums of money on and in respect of the discount of the said last-mentioned bills so dishonored as aforesaid, certain of which moneys were due and owing to the plaintiff before and at the time of the commencement of this suit; and that all things had happened and all times had elapsed necessary, etc.; yet that the defendants broke their said promise, and did not pay to the plaintiff or to the respective holders for the time being of the said bills of exchange so dishonored as aforesaid, or to any other person entitled to receive the same, the respective sums of money payable by the said bills of exchange; nor did the defendants pay to the plaintiff the said sums of money so advanced by the plaintiff as aforesaid, or any part thereof; whereby the sums payable by the said bills of exchange so dishonored as aforesaid became lost to the plaintiff, and he became liable to pay and take up certain of the said bills of exchange, and did pay and take up certain of the said bills of exchange, and was forced and obliged to and did expend certain moneys in endeavoring to obtain part of certain of the said bills of exchange, and the plaintiff lost the interest which he might have made of his moneys if the said bills had been duly paid at maturity.

Fourth plea to the first count—so far as the same relates to the sums payable by the defendants in respect of the sums of money payable by the said bills of exchange and the said sums so advanced—that, after the making of the said guarantee, and before the plaintiff had discounted such bills of exchange, and before he had advanced such sums of money, the defendants countermanded the said guarantee, and requested the plaintiff not to discount such bills of exchange, and not to advance such moneys.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred, the ground of demurrer stated in the margin being, "that the fourth plea offers no defence to that part of the declaration to which it is pleaded, for that a party giving a guarantee [for a definite period] has no power to countermand it without the assent of the person to whom it is given." Joinder.

Prentice (with whom was Brandt), in support of the demurrer. A guarantee like this, to secure advances for twelve months, is a contract which cannot be rescinded or countermanded within that time without the assent of the person to whom it is given. [BYLES, J. What consideration have these defendants received?] For anything disclosed by the plea the plaintiff might have altered his position in consequence of the guarantee, by having entered into a contract with Davies & Co., of Newtown, to discount their bills for twelve months. * * * Here, the defendants have stipulated that their liability shall discontinue at the end of twelve calendar months. What pretence is there for relieving them from that bargain? [BYLES, J. Suppose a man gives an open guarantee, with a stipulation that he will not withdraw it,—what is there to bind him to that?] If acted upon by the other party, it is submitted that that would be a binding contract. * * *

E. James, Q. C. (with whom was T. Jones), contra. The cases upon bonds for guaranteeing the honesty of clerks or servants are inapplicable: there the contract attaches as soon as the clerk or servant enters the service, and it is not separable. This however, is not a case of contract at all. It is a mere authority to discount, and a promise to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of each bill discounted; and it was perfectly competent to the defendants at any time to withdraw that authority as to future transactions of discount. * * * Suppose Davies & Co., of Newtown had become notoriously insolvent, would the defendants continue bound by their guarantee if the plaintiffs, with notice of that fact, chose to go on discounting for them? [WILLIAMS, J. Suppose I guarantee the price of a carriage to be built for a third party who, before the carriage is finished and consequently before I am bound to pay for it, becomes insolvent,—may I recall my guarantee?] Not after the coach-builder has commenced the carriage. [ERLE, C. J. Before it ripens into a contract, either party may withdraw, and so put an end to the matter. But the moment the coach-builder has prepared the materials, he would probably be found by the jury to have contracted.] * * * [ERLE, C. J. What meaning do you attribute to the words "at our request" in this guarantee?] As and when we request. The notice operated a retractation of the request, and any discount which took place after that notice was not a discount at the request of the defendants.

Brandt in reply. The Court of Exchequer have decided in this term, in a case of Bradbury v. Morgan, 31 Law J. Exch. 462 (1 H. & C. 249), that the death of the surety does not operate a revocation of a continuing guarantee. If that be so, it is plain that the guarantee is not a mere mandatum, but a contract. * * * The fourth plea does not allege that notice of revocation was given before any bills had been discounted by the plaintiffs. It must therefore be assumed that some discounts had taken place. (T. Jones. The fact undoubtedly is so.) Cur. adv. vult.[96]

Erle, C. J., now delivered the judgment of the Court.

The declaration alleged a contract by the defendants, in consideration that the plaintiff would at the request of the defendants discount bills for Davies & Co., not exceeding £600, the defendants promised to guarantee the repayment of such discounts for twelve months, and the discount, and no repayment. The plea was a revocation of the promise before the discount in question; and the demurrer raises the question whether the defendants had a right to revoke the promise. We are of opinion that they had, and that consequently the plea is good.

This promise by itself creates no obligation. It is in effect conditioned to be binding if the plaintiff acts upon it, either to the benefit of the defendants, or to the detriment of himself. But, until the condition has been at least in part fulfilled, the defendants have the power of revoking it. In the case of a simple guarantee for a proposed loan, the right of revocation before the proposal has been acted on did not appear to be disputed. Then, are the rights of the parties affected either by the promise being expressed to be for twelve months, or by the fact that some discounts had been made before that now in question, and repaid? We think not.

The promise to repay for twelve months creates no additional liability on the guarantor, but, on the contrary, fixes a limit in time beyond which his liability cannot extend. And, with respect to other discounts, which had been repaid, we consider each discount as a separate transaction, creating a liability on the defendant till it is repaid, and, after repayment, leaving the promise to have the same operation that it had before any discount was made, and no more.

[97] In Christie, Lowe & Heyworth v. Patton, 148 Ala. 324, 42 South. 614 (1906), defendant wrote: "We will put on our work any number of teams you care to furnish * * * and will pay * * * three dollars." After plaintiff had furnished a varying number of teams, he was notified to send no more. This was no breach of legal duty. Cf. also, Great Northern Ry. v. Witham, post, p. 298.

CONSOLIDATED PORTRAIT & FRAME CO. v. BARNETT et al.

Action by the Consolidated Portrait & Frame Company against M. P. Barnett and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The letter of credit referred to is in the following language: "Letter of Credit. Town of Goodwater, State of Alabama, May 28, 1907. Consolidated Portrait & Frame Co.—Gentlemen: Should T. W. Adair order goods of you at one or more times within the next twelve months from the date of this letter of credit, we jointly and severally request that you ship said goods to his order, allowing credit of thirty days from date of shipment; and if the said T. W. Adair shall fail to pay for such goods within thirty days after date of shipment, we agree to pay for said goods at the price you charged him for same, provided our responsibility shall not exceed $200.00. We waive all notice to us of shipment made to said T. W. Adair on the faith of this letter of credit, as well as notice that he failed to pay for such goods; and in case the collection of the amount due to you by virtue of the credit you extend the said T. W. Adair by virtue of this letter of credit is forced by suit, we agree to pay ali court costs, attorney's fees, and the attorney's fees may be included in the judgment [and the plaintiff claims $10 attorney's fee for bringing this suit]. For the purpose of enabling T. W. Adair to obtain credit from your house, we represent that we are worth not less than $1,000.00 over and above exemptions, liabilities, and obligations of all kinds which we now have. M. P. Barnett & Bros. J. U. Bridges."

Plea 3 is as follows: "The defendants M. P. Barnett and J. U. Bridges signed said letter of credit without any consideration money to them, same being purely an accommodation paper so far as they were concerned, and on or about the 21st of September, 1907, said defendants J. U. Bridges and M. P. Barnett demanded back said letter of credit, and at that time the said T. W. Adair was not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum which said letter of credit was given to secure; and, if defendant T. W. Adair is indebted to plaintiffs in any sum, it is an indebtedness created after said demand by said defendants for said letter of credit."

SIMPSON, J.[98] * * * A consideration is necessary to the binding efficacy of a contract, and a contract in which one party offers to do something or to pay money when the other party does something else, and does not contain any promise or obligation of the other party to do or pay anything, is unilateral, without mutuality, and subject to revocation at any time before the party to whom it is addressed does or performs any act on the faith of said proposition. 9 Cyc. 327 et seq.;

Chambliss v. Smith, 30 Ala. 367; Borst v. Simpson, 90 Ala. 373, 376, 7 South. 814.

There was no error in overruling the demurrers to the plea. The judgment of the court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

HOPKINS v. RACINE MALLEABLE & WROUGHT IRON CO.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1909. 137 Wis. 583, 119 N. W. 301.)

Action by Floyd Hopkins against the Racine Malleable & Wrought Iron Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss.

The plaintiff having secured a patent upon a certain farm gate and having had some undisclosed negotiations with the defendant, a manufacturer of malleable irons, the latter on March 10, 1905, mailed to him the following writing: "Hopkins' Gate Contract. The Racine Malleable & Wrought Iron Company of the city of Racine, state of Wisconsin, hereby agrees with Floyd Hopkins of the town of Belvidere, county of Boone, state of Illinois, to furnish, at any time hereafter during the life of the patent, castings for the patent improved farm gate of said Hopkins, known as the Hopkins' gate, patented January 3, 1905, as follows, to wit: * * * We agree to furnish the above-named castings for forty cents per set at our shops to be shipped to any point of the United States or Canada, the price aforesaid to be for cash at Racine, Wis. * * * There was no reply, but from time to time, up to July, 1906, the plaintiff ordered castings in quantities from 50 to 150 sets, and they were supplied by the defendant, who seems to have manufactured a quantity in order to be able to furnish them as ordered.

On April 30, 1906, defendant wrote plaintiff that by reason of reorganization of its business it was a question whether it could continue to make or furnish the gate castings, and that it wrote in order to give plaintiff an opportunity to find some other place to have them made; that, while it still had some irons on hand, it did not care to carry on the business in the old way by carrying stock and shipping all over the country when wanted; that it had no room for storage nor facilities for packing and shipping. Again, on October 29, 1906, the defendant wrote him that it had approximately 400 sets of castings on hand, but was unwilling to continue the business after that stock was exhausted by carrying other stock, saying that the plaintiff would have to make arrangements to carry the stock elsewhere, and also stating: "We do not object to making your castings for you, but after the goods are made, they must be shipped out of here. We cannot carry a stock. * * * Orders that are placed after the stock on hand now is exhausted will be billed at revised prices." December 14th it wrote again: "The time is drawing near when we can no longer accept such contracts. * * * What stock we have made up, which is about 350 sets, we will close out, but we can no longer make these castings and carry them in stock for you, and have you draw them from this stock. You will have to make arrangements to carry the stock elsewhere."

On December 27, 1906, plaintiff mailed to the defendant, what is called an order, the following letter: "I wish one thousand sets of Farmer Hopkins' gate castings patented January 3, 1905, manufactured and ready for delivery May 1, 1907. Will give you shipping directions later." To which the defendant replied January 30th: "It is not possible for us to make the thousand set of Farmer Hopkins' gate castings at the present time"—asserting as a reason the quantity of other work. * * * Plaintiff, on April 9, 1907, entered into a contract with another manufacturer to manufacture a thousand sets of castings for the same purpose, at a price of 55 cents per set. Plaintiff brought suit for damages for defendant's refusal to comply with the order of December 27, 1906, and judgment was rendered by the court, without a jury, for damages at the rate of 15 cents per set, or $150, from which the defendant appeals.[99]

Dodge, J. (after stating the facts as above). No principle is more elementary in the law of contracts than that consideration is essential to their validity, and that a wholly executory contract for mutual acts is of no binding force upon one party unless and until the other has become bound thereby. In such a contract mutuality is an essential of validity. Dodge v. Hopkins, 14 Wis. 636; Moulton v. Kershaw, 59 Wis. 316, 18 N. W. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 516; Teipel v. Meyer, 106 Wis. 41, 81 N. W. 982. That rule has received modification to the extent that an executory promise by one party may be construed to evince his intention to make a continuing offer of such performance which, when accepted, in whole or in part, by the other party, becomes a contract pro tanto to the extent of the acceptance. Such offers are very common in the mercantile world and are a basis on which mercantile business is largely transacted. Being in a sense a departure from the fundamental principle of the necessity for consideration, in the form of mutuality or otherwise, the exception is carried no further than to bind the offerer so long as he sees fit to keep the offer open.

In the present case, the promise of the defendant to furnish castings was wholly executory and upon condition that the plaintiff should do acts in the future. There is not the slightest suggestion that the plaintiff ever, even in the most informal manner, bound himself to the conditions expressed in that offer. With him it was entirely optional at all times to purchase his supplies of irons wherever he chose. True, as he from time to time ordered a shipment from the defendant, he became bound to pay for such shipment according to the terms of the offer, and then, for the first time, did defendant become bound to fill his order. This is the vital and fundamental distinction between the present case and the authorities from this and other courts cited by the respondent. In each of those cases there were express words on the part of the purchaser binding him to performance upon his part to the full extent responsive to the offer made, albeit the promise was in some of the cases ambiguous. Shadbolt v. Topliff, 85 Wis. 513, 55 N. W. 854; Walsh v. Myers, 92 Wis. 397, 66 N. W. 250; McCall v. Icks, 107 Wis. 232, 83 N. W. 300; Excelsior Wrapper Co. v. Messinger, 116 Wis. 554, 93 N. W. 459; Taylor Co. v. Bannerman, 120 Wis. 189, 97 N. W. 918; Eastern Ry. Co. v. Tuteur, 127 Wis. 382, 105 N. W. 1067; Minn. L. Co. v. Whitebreast Co., 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529; Lima, etc., Co. v. Natl. Steel, etc., Co., 155 Fed. 77, 83 C. C. A. 593, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713. In each of these cases were promises by the purchaser to be bound by the contract either by acceptance or otherwise.

This element of consideration in the form of mutuality being wholly lacking in the instant case, it is unnecessary to consider many other objections urged to the validity of a contract resulting from defendant's letter of March 10, 1905. We deem it clear that that letter at most constituted a continuing offer to furnish castings upon payment of the specified price, and might be revoked at any time by the defendant, except as to orders thereunder prior to the revocation. The letters referred to in the statement of facts of April, October, and December, 1906, are open to no construction but that of revocation of the offer, except to the extent of the irons then manufactured and on hand, so that the plaintiff could not by an order on December 27th impose upon the defendant any duty to manufacture for him other castings at the price named in the offer of March 10, 1905, and therefore is entitled to no damages for refusal so to do.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

CHALLENGE WIND & FEED MILL CO. v. KERR.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1892. 93 Mich. 328, 53 N. W. 555.)

Assumpsit by the Challenge Wind & Feed Mill Company against Thomas Kerr to recover the price of a windmill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

LONG, J. The defendant gave an order to the plaintiff for a windmill, at the price of $125. The order was in writing, signed by the defendant, and delivered to the plaintiff's agent at Millington, this state, and by the agent forwarded to the plaintiff at Batavia, Ill. The order was dated May 16, 1890, and contained the following clause: "This order is not subject to countermand. No verbal understanding of agents to affect this order, all conditions under which same is given being specified herein; all orders subject to the approval of Challenge Wind & Feed Mill Company." This order was forwarded to the plaintiff, and the word "Accepted" written upon it, together with the words, "Will ship to-day, May 28, 1890," and signed by the company. About a week after the order was given defendant notified the company that he would not accept the mill. The mill was subsequently shipped to Vassar, this state. Defendant refused to receive it, and so notified the plaintiff, and returned the mill to the company. The mill was reshipped to Vassar by the plaintiff, and subsequently an arrangement was made between the defendant and plaintiff's agent, by which the mill was to be erected upon defendant's premises under a verbal warranty made by the agent. The suit was brought to recover the value of the mill. On the trial plaintiff had judgment for the value.

The defense was that the mill did not comply with the warranty made by the agent at the time defendant agreed to take it. Defendant's proofs tended strongly to show that the mill did not comply with the warranty, and that, though the plaintiff's agent attempted upon several occasions to make it do the work intended, he was unsuccessful. The court below, however, was of the opinion that it was immaterial whether or not the agent made the warranties, for the reason that, under the written contract first made, the agent had no authority to make a contract which would bind the plaintiff, and of which the defendant had notice, and so charged the jury. This was error. The written order given by the defendant to the agent, and forwarded to the plaintiff, was countermanded before acceptance by the plaintiff, and before the plaintiff had taken any steps whatever towards filling the order. The defendant had a right during that time to countermand it. The order was one which the plaintiff could accept or not, as it pleased. This right was expressly reserved in the order, and until acceptance the contract was unilateral. Wilcox v. Cline, 70 Mich. 517, 38 N. W. 555. Up to the time of acceptance, or up to the time the plaintiff had signified its intention to accept, it was not bound by the order; and during this time the defendant had the right to countermand, as no period was fixed within which the plaintiff might accept defendant's terms. This contract, therefore, was not binding between the parties, and defendant was under no obligation to accept the mill upon its arrival at Vassar, and plaintiff shipped it at its own risk of having the mill received by the defendant. The defendant refused absolutely to receive it, and it was reshipped. No other written order was made, and the plaintiff sent the mill to its agent at Vassar. Whatever arrangement was thereafter made by its agent with the defendant would be binding upon the plaintiff. What these arrangements and representations made by the agent were, and whether they were fulfilled, were questions of fact for the jury. The defendant had a right to have his case submitted to the jury upon his theory, and, if the mill did not fulfill the warranties, defendant would be under no obligation to keep and pay for it.

The judgment below is set aside, with costs, and a new trial ordered. The other justices concurred.

LOS ANGELES TRACTION CO. v. WILSHIRE et al.

(Supreme Court of California, 1902. 135 Cal. 654, 67 Pac. 1086.)

Action by the Los Angeles Traction Company against W. B. Wilshire and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

GRAY, C.[1] The action is based on a written instrument signed by appellants and reading as follows: "$2,000. Los Angeles, Cal., July 19th, 1895. Thirty days after the completion of the double track street railway of the Los Angeles Traction Company to the intersection of Seventh and Hoover streets, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of the Los Angeles Traction Company, the sum of two thousand (2,000) dollars, negotiable and payable at Citizens' Bank, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable after maturity. I further promise and agree to pay a reasonable attorney's fee if suit should be instituted for the collection of this note." The above instrument was placed in the hands of the Citizens' Bank, together with a duly signed written escrow agreement as follows:

"To the Citizens' Bank, Los Angeles, Cal.: Herewith is handed you by the undersigned the following named notes, to be held in escrow upon the terms and conditions herein stated: You are requested to hold said notes in escrow until the completion of the line of railroad of the Los Angeles Traction Company, now being constructed in the city of Los Angeles. * * * Upon completion and operation of the same with electric power, you are instructed to deliver said notes to said Los Angeles Traction Company. In case a franchise for such street car line to said Hoover street is not obtained by said Traction Company within —— months from the date hereof, then, in that event, said notes shall be returned to their respective makers upon demand, to be canceled. Said notes are made by the following named persons, and in the sums set opposite their names." Then follow the names of the parties giving the notes, including the names of these appellants, who also signed the said agreement.

The findings show that, on the faith of the foregoing instruments and other instruments of like character executed by other parties, who, like defendants, were the owners of property that would be made valuable by the construction of the proposed road, the plaintiff in November, 1895, less than four months from the execution of said instrument, bid and paid to the city of Los Angeles $1,505 for a franchise to construct the road over that part of the course agreed upon and within the city limits Before the 28th of April, 1896, the plaintiff commenced work upon said railway, but said work was not performed with the intention of prosecuting the construction of said railway continuously and with diligence to completion, and the plaintiff did not so commence work upon said railway with said purpose until after the 1st day of July, 1897. On July 1, 1897, defendants served upon plaintiff a written notice to the effect that they did not recognize any liability on account of the foregoing written contracts, for the reason that the road had not been completed within the time agreed upon. Soon after the service of this notice the plaintiff actively engaged in the construction of the road, and completed it, and commenced operating the same to the intersection of Seventh and Hoover streets, as provided for in said instruments, before the expiration of the year 1897. Thereafter, and on May 17, 1898, plaintiff completed its railway to First and Virgil streets. Upon these facts plaintiff had judgment for $2,000 besides interest and attorney's fees. Defendants appeal from this judgment and from an order denying them a new trial. * * *

3. The contract at the date of its making was unilateral, a mere offer that if subsequently accepted and acted upon by the other party to it would ripen into a binding enforceable obligation. When the respondent purchased and paid upwards of $1,500 for a franchise it had acted upon the contract, and it would be manifestly unjust thereafter to permit the offer that had been made to be withdrawn. The promised consideration had then been partly performed, and the contract had taken on a bilateral character, and if appellant thereafter thought he discovered a ground for rescinding the contract, it was, as it always is, a necessary condition to the rescission that the other party should be made whole as to what he had parted with on the strength of the contract. The notice of withdrawal from the contract was ineffectual, therefore, for several reasons. In the first place, it was based on a wrong theory; the reason given for it was that the road was not constructed within the agreed time, when, as was determined subsequently by the court, there was no time agreed upon. Again, it came too late, after the obligations of the parties had become fixed. * * *

BRACKENBURY et al. v. HODGKIN et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1917. 116 Me. 399, 102 Atl. 106.)

Suit by Joseph A. Brackenbury and another against Sarah D. P. Hodgkin and Walter C. Hodgkin. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed, and decree affirmed as to Walter C. Hodgkin.

CORNISH, C. J. The defendant Mrs. Sarah D. P. Hodgkin on the 8th day of February, 1915, was the owner of certain real estate—her home farm, situated in the outskirts of Lewiston. She was a widow and was living alone. She was the mother of six adult children, five sons, one of whom, Walter, is the codefendant, and one daughter, who is the coplaintiff. The plaintiffs were then residing in Independence, Mo. Many letters had passed between mother and daughter concerning the daughter and her husband returning to the old home and taking care of the mother, and finally on February 8, 1915, the mother sent a letter to the daughter and her husband which is the foundation of this bill in equity. In this letter she made a definite proposal, the substance of which was that if the Brackenburys would move to Lewiston, and maintain and care for Mrs. Hodgkin on the home place during her life, and pay the moving expenses, they were to have the use and income of the premises, together with the use of the household

v. Daily News Co. of Minneapolis, 116 Minn. 212, 133 N. W. 573, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183 (1911).

It has been sometimes asserted that an irrevocable offer is "a legal impossibility." See Langdell, Summary of the Law of Contracts, § 178; also section 4; Wormser, The True Conception of Unilateral Contracts, 26 Yale L. Jour. 137, note; Lee, title Contracts, in Jenks' Dig. of Eng. Civ. Law, § 195; Ashley, Contracts, § 13. To the contrary, see Corbin, Offer and Acceptance and Some of the Resulting Legal Relations (1917) 26 Yale L. Jour. 169, 185–197; McGovney, Irrevocable Offers (1914) 27 Harv. L. Rev. 644.

Sir Frederick Pollock, in 28 Law Quarterly Review, 100, reviewing Ashley on Contracts, said: "Some of Prof. Ashley's positions verge on paradox, as when he suggests that the doctrine of consideration may ultimately be devoured by relaxations and exceptions. One or two seem to us really paradoxical, as where he maintains that in a unilateral contract, where a promise is offered for an act requiring an appreciable time for performance, there is no consideration for the promise and no acceptance until the act is completed. If this be so, the promisor may withdraw his offer when the work is all but done, or the promisee may capriciously leave the work half done, and in either case without remedy, unless there be something in the circumstances which can be made to support an action of tort. A carter, for example, who is carrying goods to a wharf to be put on an outgoing ship, may abandon them in the middle of the journey. Both the plain man and the average lawyer will say that, whatever Prof. Ashley's logic may be, the law really cannot be so absurd as that; and they will be right, and, what is more, any rational court before whom such a question is moved will surely find a way to make them so. It might easily be held that acting on a request for an act to be done for reward implies a promise to go through with the performance. At all events it seems to us that the offer is irrevocably accepted by the first unequivocal commencement of the act requested. In fact it does not often happen that a man sets about a job without writing or uttering some kind of word of acceptance. 'All right' is enough. Thus the practical outcome of Prof. Ashley's ingenious exercise may be to convince us that there are fewer unilateral contracts in the world than we supposed."

goods, with certain exceptions, Mrs. Hodgkin to have what rooms she might need. The letter closed, by way of postscript, with the words, "you to have the place when I have passed away."

Relying upon this offer, which was neither withdrawn nor modified, and in acceptance thereof, the plaintiffs moved from Missouri to Maine late in April, 1915, went upon the premises described and entered upon the performance of the contract. Trouble developed after a few weeks, and the relations between the parties grew most disagreeable. The mother brought two suits against her son-in-law on trifling matters, and finally ordered the plaintiffs from the place, but they refused to leave. Then on November 7, 1916, she executed and delivered to her son, Walter C. Hodgkin, a deed of the premises, reserving a life estate in herself. Walter, however, was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, but took the deed with full knowledge of the agreement between the parties and for the sole purpose of evicting the plaintiffs. On the very day the deed was executed he served a notice to quit upon Mr. Brackenbury, as preliminary to an action of forcible entry and detainer which was brought on November 13, 1916. This bill in equity was brought by the plaintiffs to secure a reconveyance of the farm from Walter to his mother, to restrain and enjoin Walter from further prosecuting his action of forcible entry and detainer, and to obtain an adjudication that the mother holds the legal title impressed with a trust in favor of the plaintiffs in accordance with their contract.

The sitting justice made an elaborate and carefully considered finding of facts and signed a decree, sustaining the bill with costs against Walter C. Hodgkin, and granting the relief prayed for. The case is before the law court on the defendants' appeal from this decree.

Four main issues are raised.

1. As to the completion and existence of a valid contract.[8]

A legal and binding contract is clearly proven. The offer on the part of the mother was in writing, and its terms cannot successfully be disputed. There was no need that it be accepted in words, nor that a counter promise on the part of the plaintiffs be made. The offer was the basis, not of a bilateral contract, requiring a reciprocal promise, a promise for a promise, but of a unilateral contract requiring an act for a promise. "In the latter case the only acceptance of the offer that is necessary is the performance of the act. In other words, the promise becomes binding when the act is performed." 6 R. C. L. 607. This is elementary law.

The plaintiffs here accepted the offer by moving from Missouri to the mother's farm in Lewiston and entering upon the performance of the specified acts, and they have continued performance since that time so far as they have been permitted by the mother to do so. The existence of a completed and valid contract is clear. * * *

Appeal dismissed.

MacFARLANE v. BLOCH.

(Supreme Court of Oregon, 1911. 59 Or. 1, 115 Pac. 1056, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1275.)

Action by Katherine MacFarlane against M. M. Bloch. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On July 21, 1908, plaintiff found a pocketbook containing promissory notes of the value of more than $1,000, payable to M. M. Bloch, this defendant. For several days thereafter plaintiff was sick and did little or nothing toward finding the owner, except to consult the "Lost and Found" columns of the daily press; and also her son phoned to Bloch, the jeweler. On July 31st, defendant advertised in the Oregonian for a "Lost—Pocketbook with papers; please return to county judge's office; reward. M. M. Bloch." Immediately thereafter plaintiff phoned to the county judge's office and asked for Bloch, and was informed that there was no such person there. On August 5th, defendant again advertised in the Oregonian, making the following offer: "Lost—Pocketbook. Return to county judge's office; $100.00 reward. M. M. Bloch." And in response thereto plaintiff went to the county judge's office and saw Robert Shaw, who was Bloch's agent in this matter, and told him that she had come to get the reward, in response to the advertisement for a lost pocketbook. When asked if she had the pocketbook, she replied that she knew where it was, and offered to produce it for the $100 reward. She thereafter held it for the reward, which defendant at no time offered to pay, but he had her arrested for larceny of the book, and, in order to avoid the criminal proceedings, she surrendered it to Bloch and brought this action to recover the amount of the reward. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and he found the facts in favor of plaintiff and from a judgment thereon defendant appeals.

EAKIN, C. J.[4] (after stating the facts as above). There is no liability upon an offer of a reward to any one who performs some specific act until the act stipulated has been performed, but the offer is to be construed by the same rules as other contractual offers.

Counsel for defendant contends that to entitle plaintiff to the reward it must be made to appear that she found the book after the offer was made, and that the finding was with a view to obtaining the reward. The courts are divided as to whether knowledge of the offer, at the time of the performance of the act, is essential to the right to the reward, or to the enforcement of it. So far as relates to the facts in this case it is immaterial which line of authorities we would be inclined to follow, as the finding of the book was not the purpose of the offer. Defendant was aware that the book had been found before the offer was made, and the offer was for its return to the county judge's office. This condition of the offer plaintiff complied with. She took the book and its contents to the county judge's office and offered to surrender it for the payment of the reward. This was held sufficient in Pierson v. Morch, 82 N. Y. 503, a case in many respects identical with the one before us. It was contended that there was no consideration for the promise, but the court held that the return of the property completed the contract and the defendant was liable. It was also contended in that case that plaintiff was not the finder in good faith, as she made no inquiries before leaving the car where she found the goods, either of the conductor or the passengers. The court held that the question was properly submitted to the jury and their decision was in her favor, the court saying: "If the plaintiff really found and took possession of the goods, believing them to be lost, and with a purpose to preserve and return them if possible to the owner, she was in condition to claim the reward, upon complying with its terms." In that case the goods were found before the reward was offered. To the same effect is Everman v. Hyman, 3 Ind. App. 459, 29 N. E. 1140, in which case a reward was offered for the return of a stolen horse, and it was held that the finder had a right to retain the horse until the reward was paid. See, also, Cummings v. Gann, 52 Pa. 484; Grady v. Crook, 2 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 53; Wood v. Pierson, 45 Mich. 313, 7 N. W. 888.

Upon plaintiff's offer to return the book defendant's agent would not pay, and, in fact, had no authority to pay, the reward. It appears from the evidence and conduct of defendant that he had no intention of so doing. There is nothing in the evidence tending to show an intention on her part to keep or convert the property to her own use. Although she knew who was the owner of the property, she had not ascertained his address until after the offer of the reward of July 31st; and thereafter she retained the goods for the reward.

When the $100 reward was offered she had a lien thereon for the payment of it. 19 A. & E. E. 583; 24 A. & E. E. 961; Wentworth v. Day, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 352, 37 Am. Dec. 145; Everman v. Hyman, 3 Ind. App. 459, 29 N. E. 1140. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

STENSGAARD v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1890. 43 Minn. 11, 44 N. W. 669, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205.)

DICKINSON, J. This action is for the recovery of damages for breach of contract. The rulings of the court below, upon the trial, were based upon its conclusion that no contract was shown to have been entered into between these parties. We are called upon to review the case upon this point. The plaintiff was engaged in business as a real-estate broker. On the 11th of December, 1886, he procured the defendant to execute the following instrument, which was mostly in printed form: "St. Paul, Dec. 11, 1886. In consideration of L. T. Stensgaard agreeing to act as agent for the sale of the property hereinafter mentioned, I have hereby given to said L. T. Stensgaard the exclusive sale, for three months from date, the following property, to-wit: [Here follows a description of the property, the terms of sale, and some other provisions not necessary to be stated.] I further agree to pay said L. T. Stensgaard a commission of two and one-half per cent. on the first $2,000, and two and one-half per cent. on the balance of the purchase price, for his services rendered in selling of the above-mentioned property, whether the title is accepted or not, and also whatever he may get or obtain for the sale of said property above $17,000 for such property, if the property is sold. John Smith." The evidence showed that the plaintiff immediately took steps to effect a sale of the land, posted notices upon it, published advertisements in newspapers, and individually solicited purchasers. About a month subsequent to the execution by the defendant of the above instrument, he himself sold the property. This constitutes the alleged breach of contract for which a recovery of damages is sought.

The court was justified in its conclusion that no contract was shown to have been entered into, and hence that no cause of action was established. The writing signed by the defendant did not of itself constitute a contract between these parties. In terms indicating that the instrument was intended to be at once operative, it conferred present authority on the plaintiff to sell the land, and included the promise of the defendant that, if the plaintiff should sell the land, he should receive the stated compensation. This alone was no contract, for there was no mutuality of obligation, nor any other consideration for the agreement of the defendant. The plaintiff did not by this instrument obligate himself to do anything, and therefore the other party was not bound. Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535, (Gil. 465;) Tarbox v. Gotzian, 20 Minn. 139, (Gil. 122.) If, acting under the authority thus conferred, the plaintiff had, before its revocation, sold the land, such performance would have completed a contract, and the plaintiff would have earned the compensation promised by the defendant for such performance. Andreas v. Holcombe, 22 Minn. 339; Ellsworth v. Extension Co., 31 Minn. 543, 18 N. W. 822. But so long as this remained a mere present authorization to sell, without contract obligations having been fixed, it was revocable by the defendant. The instrument does, it is true, commence with the words: "In consideration of L. T. Stensgaard agreeing to act as agent for the sale of the property," etc.; but no such agreement on the part of the plaintiff was shown on the trial to have been actually made, although it was incumbent upon him to establish the existence of a contract as the basis of his action. This instrument does not contain an agreement on the part of the plaintiff, for he is no party to its execution. It expresses no promise or agreement except that of the defendant. It may be added that the language fact of an agreement having been already made on the part of the plaintiff. Of course, no consideration was necessary to support the present, but revocable, authorization to sell. It is difficult to give any practical effect to this clause, in the construction of the instrument. It seems probable, in the absence of proof of such an agreement, that this clause had no reference to any actual agreement between those parties, but was a part of the printed matter which the plaintiff had prepared for use in his business, with the intention of making it effectual by his own signature. If he had appended to this instrument his agreement to accept the agency, or even if he had signed this instrument, this clause would have had an obvious meaning.

This instrument, executed only by the defendant, was effectual, as we have said, as a present, but revocable, grant of authority to sell. It involved, moreover, an offer on the part of the defendant to contract with the plaintiff that the latter should have, for the period of three months, the exclusive right to sell the land. This action is based upon the theory that such a contract was entered into; but, to constitute such a contract, it was necessary that the plaintiff should in some way signify his acceptance of the offer, so as to place himself under the reciprocal obligation to exert himself during the whole period named to effect a sale. No express agreement was shown. The mere receiving and retaining this instrument did not import an agreement thus to act for the period named, for the reason that, whether the plaintiff should be willing to take upon him that obligation or not, he might accept and act upon the revocable authority to sell expressed in the writing: and, if he should succeed in effecting a sale before the power should be revoked, he would earn the commission specified. In other words, the instrument was presently effectual, and of advantage to him, whether he chose to place himself under contract obligations or not. For the same reason the fact that for a day or a month he availed himself of the right to sell conferred by the defendant, by attempting to make a sale, does not justify the inference, in an action where the burden is on the plaintiff to prove a contract, that he had accepted the offer of the defendant to conclude a contract covering the period of three months, so that he could not have discontinued his efforts without rendering himself liable in damages. In brief, it was in the power of the plaintiff either to convert the defendant's offer and authorization into a complete contract, or to act upon it as a naked revocable power, or to do nothing at all. He appears to have simply availed himself for about a month of the naked present right to sell, if he could do so. He cannot now complain that the land-owner then revoked the authority, which was still unexecuted. It may be added that there was no attempt at the trial to show that the plaintiff notified the defendant that he was endeavoring to sell the land; and there is but little, if any, ground for an inference from the evidence that the defendant in fact knew it. The case is distinguishable from those where, under a unilateral promise, there has been a performance by the other party of services, or other thing to be done, for which, by the terms of the promise compensation was to be made. Such was the case of Goward v. Waters, 98 Mass. 596, relied upon by the appellant as being strictly analogous to this case. In the case before us, compensation was to be paid only in case of a sale of the land by the plaintiff. He can recover nothing for what he did, unless there was a complete contract; in which case, of course, he might have recovered damages for its breach.

BRANIFF et al. v. BAIER et al.

Action by T. J. Braniff and others against Henry F. Baier and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

JOHNSTON, C. J.[6] This was an action by T. J. Braniff, G. E. Holmberg, and A. Lynn against Henry F. Baier and Charles A. Baier to recover an agent's commission for procuring a purchaser for defendant's real estate. Holmberg and Lynn are the assignees of C. W. Talmadge's interest in the commission claimed, who was associated with Braniff in the transaction. Plaintiffs were awarded judgment in the sum of $702, and the defendants appeal.

Defendants engaged the services of Braniff and Talmadge on July 1, 1913 and signed the following memorandum:

"We, the undersigned, H. F. Baier and C. A. Baier, do hereby appoint and constitute C. W. Talmadge and T. J. Braniff, or either of them, as our only agents to sell our forty acres of farm land in Fellsmere, Florida, known as tracts No. 1232, 1233, 1260 and 1261 in township 31, range 37, in St. Lucie county, Florida; and we also agree to accept from the above-named agents or either of them, the actual cash we have already paid on the above-mentioned contracts, plus $50.00 plus $8.00 for transferring contracts, as full payment to us for our interest in the above-named lands; the purchaser to assume all future payments. The above-named contract to remain good until October 1, 1913. Dated July 1, 1913."

[5] In this case (as well as in others) the student should distinguish clearly between the agent's legal power and his factual ability to use it by finding a buyer. The legal power can be conferred upon any sluggard, but only a hustler will earn the commission. Between the agent and his principal the following jural relations may exist: The agent may have a power to create a right to a commission, a power to create contract relations between the principal and a third person, a right that the principal shall not revoke his powers, an immunity from such revocation by the principal, a duty to use diligence in finding a buyer. The necessary correlatives of these, existing in the principal, are: A liability to a duty to pay commission, a liability to contract with a third person, a duty not to revoke, a disability to revoke, a right that the agent shall be diligent. On the other hand, the principal may have the privilege of revoking, or he may have the power of revoking without the privilege. As the operative facts vary, so also will the resulting legal relations.

After this appointment was made, the agents acted upon the authority by advertising the land, interviewing parties, and writing letters, and they spent considerable time and effort to find a purchaser. As a result of correspondence begun about August 1, 1913, George W. Auber of Fellsmere, Fla., on August 25th agreed to buy the land, and he sent the following letter inclosing payment:

"Farmers' National Bank, Salina, Kansas: Inclosed you will find a check for $950.00 in favor of Henry and Charles Baier for their interest in tracts south range 37, east of the Fellsmere Farms, Fla., of land No. 1232, 1233, 1260 and 1261, township 31, said check to be given to said Henry and Chas. Baier when contracts or certificates of purchase have been properly transferred and signed by them in favor of me, George W. Auber. You will also find inclosed a check for $750 in favor of C. W. Talmadge and T. J. Braniff when said contracts are properly transferred to me and mailed and registered to my address, being Fellsmere, Florida."

About 10 days before the Auber letter was written, the defendants told Braniff that they did not desire to sell the land, and on August 26th they wrote a letter stating that the land was withdrawn from sale and the authority of the agents revoked as of the date of the oral notice. When defendants were informed by the agents that a purchaser had been found in accordance with the terms of their contract, defendants replied that the lands were no longer for sale and that the money sent would not be accepted. The jury found, in effect, that the agents had found a purchaser and had complied with the terms of the written contract, and that the only reasons given by defendants for not complying with the contract was that the land had been withdrawn from sale and that they did not care to sell it at that time.

Defendants contend that the contract of agency was unilateral and subject to revocation at any time before a purchaser was produced. The employment or agency, it will be observed, was exclusive and for a fixed time. It is true, as defendants contend, that, when the promise of one party is the consideration for the promise of another, they must be obligatory upon both parties at the same time or they will not bind. The appointment or promise of defendants was unilateral when made; but, when it was accepted by the agents and they had spent time, effort, and money in carrying out its provisions, there was thereafter no lack of consideration. When the agents accepted the proposal and proceeded to perform the services which the appointment contemplated were to be performed by them, it became a mutual and binding obligation. As soon as the promises of the parties ripened into a contract, Braniff and Talmadge became the sole agents for the sale of the defendants' land with the exclusive right to sell it, until October 1, 1913. The defendants could not thereafter, by withdrawing the land from sale or by an attempted revocation, set aside the contract nor escape responsibility for the violation of its conditions. [Several cases were here discussed.]

Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 44 N. W. 669, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205, is out of line with the cited cases, in this, that it appears to hold that the posting, advertising of property, and the individual soliciting of purchasers did not constitute an acceptance or convert a proposal into a binding contract. That court, in the later case of Lapham v. Flint, 86 Minn. 376, 90 N. W. 780, stated that the only question before the court in the Stensgaard Case was whether the contract upon its face, unaided by evidence or allegations in the complaint, expressed a mutuality of obligation, and it was held that it did not, because there was nothing in the contract itself to indicate an acceptance of the obligation either in writing or by performance.

The general trend of authorities is that, if the agent proceeds in good faith to comply with the terms of the proposal or agreement like the one in question by advertising the property and spending time and effort to find a purchaser, these acts amount to an acceptance, and thereafter both parties are bound. No material error being found in the record, the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.[7]

[7] Where the broker has performed substantial acts toward earning his commissions, he can generally maintain suit in case of revocation by the owner. He recovers either the agreed commission, on the theory that the owner was wholly disabled to revoke; or he recovers the profits that he would have made, on the theory that the owner has the power of revocation, but not the privilege. It is often assumed that the contract is bilateral, the broker having made some sort of a promise by implication. See Blumenthal v. Bridges, 91 Ark. 212, 120 S. W. 974, 24 L. R. A. (N. McMILLAN v. AMES.[8]

VANDERBURGH, J. On the day it bears date the defendant executed and delivered to James McMillan & Co. the following covenant or agreement under seal which was subsequently assigned to the plaintiff:

"Exhibit A.

"I, E. B. Ames, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, do hereby promise and agree to grant, bargain, sell and convey by good and lawful warranty deed, unto James McMillan & Co., their heirs and assigns, in fee-simple, free from all incumbrances, at any time between the date of this instrument and the third day of August, 1884, that the said James McMillan & Co. may elect, that certain real estate situate in the county of Hennepin and state of Minnesota, and described as follows, to-wit, a part of lots nine (9) and ten, (10,) in block twenty, (20,) in the town of Minneapolis, being a tract of land twenty-seven (27) feet wide, fronting on First avenue south, and extending back ninety-nine (99) feet, together with the two-story brick and stone building standing thereon, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

"The consideration above mentioned and referred to is the payment to me, by the said James McMillan & Co., of the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars, and the further payment of the taxes duly assessed upon said real estate between the second day of August, 1879, and the date of the execution and delivery of said deed. Said payments to be made at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed, unless otherwise agreed to by said James McMillan & Co. and myself.

"It is hereby expressly understood and agreed that in case of a violation of the lease under which the said James McMillan & Co. now hold said real estate, I am to be released from any and all promises contained and by me made in this instrument.

"Witness my hand this sixth day of October, 1879, the same being the date of this instrument. E. B. Ames. [Seal.]"

By the terms of this instrument, which is admitted to have been sealed by defendant, he covenanted to convey the premises upon the consideration and condition of the payment by the covenantees of the sum named, on or before the date fixed in the writing. Before performance on their part, the defendant notified them of his withdrawal and rescission of the promise and obligation embraced in such written instrument, and thereafter refused the tender of payment and offer of performance by the plaintiff in conformity therewith, as alleged in the complaint, and within the time limited. On the trial, it appearing that such notice of rescission had been given, the court rejected plaintiff's offer to introduce the writing in evidence, and dismissed the action.

The only question presented on this appeal is whether plaintiff's promise or obligation was nudum pactum and presumptively invalid for want of a consideration, or whether, being in the nature of a covenant, the defendant was bound thereby, subject to the performance of the conditions by the covenantees. Apart from the effect of the seal as evidencing a consideration binding the defendant to hold open his proposition, or rather validating his promise subject to the conditions expressed in the writing, it is clear that such promise, made for a consideration thereafter to be performed by the plaintiff at his election, would take effect as an offer or proposition merely, but would become binding as a promise as soon as accepted by the performance of the consideration, unless previously revoked or it had otherwise ceased to exist. Langdell, Summary Cont. § 70; Boston & M. R. R. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 227, 228. In the case cited there was a proposition to sell land by writing not under seal. The court held the party at liberty to withdraw his offer at any time before acceptance, but not after, within the appointed time, because until acceptance it was a mere offer, without a consideration or a corresponding promise to support it, and the court say: "Whether wisely or not, the common law unyieldingly insists upon a consideration, or a paper with a seal attached." If, however, his promise is binding upon the defendant, because contained in an instrument under seal, then it is not a mere offer, but a valid promise to convey the land upon the condition of payment. All that remained was performance by plaintiff within the time specified to entitle him to a fulfillment of the covenant to convey. Langdell, Summary, §§ 178, 179, (vol. 2, Cases on Contract.) As respects the validity or obligation of such unilateral contracts, the distinction between covenants and simple contracts is well defined and established. Anson, Cont. *12; Chit. Cont. *5; Leake, Cont. 146; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (7th Ed.) 698; Wing v. Chase, 35 Me. 260; Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 564, 19 L. Ed. 501.

In Pitman v. Woodbury, 3 Exch. 11, Parke, B., says: "The cases establish that a covenantee in an ordinary indenture, who is a party to it, may sue the covenantor, who executed it, though he himself never did; for he is a party, though he did not execute, and it makes no difference that the covenants of the defendant therein are stated to be in consideration of those of the covenantee. Of this there is no doubt, nor that a covenant binds without consideration." Morgan v. Pike, 14 C. B. 484; Leake, Cont. 141. The covenantee in such cases may have the benefit of the contract, but subject to the conditions and provisos in the deed. These obligations frequently take the form of bonds, which is only another method of forming a contract, in which a party binds himself as if he had made a contract to perform; a consideration being necessarily implied from the solemnity of the instrument. The consideration of a sealed instrument may be inquired into;

it may be shown not to have been paid, (Bowen v. Bell, 20 Johns [N. Y.] 338, 11 Am. Dec. 286) or to be different from that expressed,—Jordan v. White, 20 Minn. 99, (Gil. 77); McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 460, 30 Am. Dec. 103,—or as to a mortgage that there is no debt to secure, (Wearse v. Peirce, 24 Pick. [Mass.] 144,) etc.; but, except for fraud or illegality, the consideration implied from the seal cannot be impeached for the purpose of invalidating the instrument or destroying its character as a specialty. It is true that equity will not lend its auxiliary remedies to aid in the enforcement of a contract which is inequitable, or is not supported by a substantial consideration, but at the same time it will not on such grounds interfere to set it aside. But no reason appears why equity might not have decreed specific performance in this case, (had the land not been sold,) because the substantial and meritorious consideration required by the court in such cases would consist in that stipulated in the instrument as the condition of a conveyance, performance of which by the plaintiff would have been exacted as a prerequisite to relief, so as to secure to defendant mutuality in the remedy, and all his rights under the contract. The inquiry would not, in such case, be directed to the constructive consideration evidenced by the seal, for a mere nominal consideration would have supported defendant's offer or promise upon the prescribed conditions. Leake, Cont. 17, 18; Railroad v. Babcock, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 353; Yard v. Patton, 13 Pa. 285; Candor's Appeal, 27 Pa. 119.

If, then, defendant's promise was irrevocable within the time limited, plaintiff might certainly seek his remedy for damages, upon the facts alleged in the pleadings, upon showing performance or tender thereof on his part. There is a growing tendency to abrogate the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments; in some states by legislation, in others to a limited extent by usage or judicial recognition. State v. Young, 23 Minn. 557; 1 Pars. Cont. *429. But the significance of the seal as importing a consideration is everywhere still recognized, except as affected by legislation on the subject. It has certainly never been questioned by this court.

In Pennsylvania the courts allow a party, as an equitable defense in actions upon sealed instruments, to show a failure to receive the consideration contracted for, where an actual valuable consideration was intended to pass, and furnished the motive for entering into the contract. Candor's Appeal, 27 Pa. 119; Yard v. Patton, supra. But whatever the rule as to equitable defenses and counter-claims under our system of practice may be held to be in the case of sealed instruments, it has no application, we think, to a case like this, where full effect must be given to the seal. Under the civil law the rule is that a party making an offer, and granting time to another in which to accept it, is not at liberty to withdraw it within the appointed time, it being deemed inequitable to disappoint expectations raised by such offer, and leave the party without remedy. The common law, as we have seen, though requiring a consideration, is satisfied with the evidence thereof signified by a seal. Boston & M. R. R. v. Bartlett, supra. The same principle applies to a release under seal, which is conclusive though disclosing on its face a consideration otherwise insufficient. Staples v. Wellington, 62 Me. 9; Wing v. Chase, 35 Me. 260.

These considerations are decisive of the case, and the order denying a new trial must be reversed.[9]

HOBAN v. HUDSON.

HOLT, J.[10] June 7, 1910, plaintiff bought from Minnesota-Arizona Copper Company 4,166 shares of its capital stock for $2,500. In the deal he obtained from the company a contract by which he could exchange these shares for certain other shares in another corporation, but if he did not choose to exercise this privilege on or before April 1, 1912, he could avail himself of this provision:

"It is hereby further agreed that the undersigned will refund to the said Hoban the said sum of twenty-five hundred (2500.00) dollars on June 8, 1912, on the return of said stock of the Minnesota-Arizona Copper Co., properly assigned: Provided, however that the said Hoban

[9] The term "option" is used to include a variety of cases, many of which may also be properly described as "contracts." In each case the operative facts must be determined and the particular jural relations consequent thereon must be identified and isolated. Every option, like every offer, includes a power in the holder of the option. Accompanying this power, there may be a right that it shall not be revoked or an utter immunity from such revocation.

If an option is granted for a consideration or under seal, a notice of revocation is quite inoperative, and any purchaser with notice takes subject to the power of the option holder. See Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 522 (1909); Thomason v. Bescher, 176 N. C. 622, 97 S. E. 654, 2 A. L. R. 626 (1918); O'Brien v. Boland, 166 Mass. 481, 44 N. E. 602 (1896); Parker v. Beach, 176 Cal. 172, 167 Pac. 871 (1917); option to return property if dissatisfied; Olympia Bottling Works v. Hilton & Dodge Lumber Co., 141 Ga. 117, 80 S. E. 559 (1913). For options in leases, see Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 564, 19 L. Ed. 501 (1869); Tebeau v. Ridge, 261 Mo. 547, 170 S. W. 871, L. R. A. 1915C, 367 (1914); McCormick v. Stephany, 61 N. J. Eq. 208, 48 Atl. 25 (1900); Spitzli v. Guth, 112 Misc. Rep. 630, 183 N. Y. Supp. 743 (1920), option irrevocable after improvements made in reliance. If there is neither a seal nor a consideration the option is revocable. Texas Co. v. Dunn (Tex. Civ. App.) 219 S. W. 300 (1920); Threlkeld v. Inglett, 289 Ill. 90, 124 N. E. 368 (1919). Sometimes a sealed option, without consideration, is held revocable in equity. Corbett v. Cronkhite, 239 Ill. 9, 87 N. E. 874 (1909). The irrevocable power in an option is assignable. Himrod Furnace Co. v. Cleveland & M. R. Co., 22 Ohio St. 451 (1872). A contract may create an option in each of the two parties. shall first give written notice to the undersigned of his election to accept said refund on or before April 8, 1912; and time is the essence of this agreement."

The company executed the agreement by its first vice president, Martin E. Tew, and its secretary. Thereto was subjoined this guaranty, signed by the defendant: "For value received I hereby guarantee the performance of the above contract." The action is upon this guaranty. Plaintiff alleged that notice of election to demand a refund of the $2,500 was duly given to the company, and to defendant, on or about April 6, 1912, and prior to April 8, 1912. The defendant expressly denied that the notice was given to the company within the time provided in the contract. The court made findings, upon stipulated facts, to the effect that the notice was not served in time upon the company, and hence there was no liability on the part of the guarantor. From the order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals.

Defendant's liability was secondary only; hence plaintiff was required to establish a breach by the copper company of its contract with him before recovery could be asked against defendant upon his guaranty. A prerequisite to showing a breach, in failing to refund the $2,500, was proof that plaintiff served upon the company, on or before April 8, 1912, a written notice of an election to demand and receive said refund. Notice to the guarantor of such election was not required, nor could such notice served on him dispense with service upon the company. The appellant rightly states that the sole issue is:

"Was the notice given through the mail by the plaintiff to the Minnesota-Arizona Copper Company on the 6th day of April, 1912, a sufficient and substantial compliance with the terms" of the contract?

It is conceded that the notice served did not actually reach the company, or any of its officers, earlier than April 10, 1912.

These are the facts upon which plaintiff predicates the claim of timely service: When plaintiff purchased the shares the certificate, together with this contract and guaranty, bearing date June 7, 1910, was mailed from Willmar, Minn., inclosed in a letter dated June 8, 1910, signed by Martin E. Tew, the first vice president of the company. The letter head indicated that the operating office of the company was in Arizona and its financial office at Willmar, Minn. The names of the directors and officers of the corporation were also given, and in such manner that the inference was that Mr. Tew and the secretary resided at Willmar. No attempt was made by plaintiff until April 6, 1912, to ascertain the whereabouts of any officer of the company. On that day he was informed by defendant where such officers were to be found in California. Thereupon plaintiff mailed at Benson, Minn., the place of his residence, three notices of his election to ask a refund of the $2,500. One of these notices was addressed to Martin E. Tew at Los Angeles, Cal., and reached Mr. Tew on April 10, 1912. One was addressed to him at Tucson, Ariz.; it was not delivered but returned through the dead letter office to the sender. The third was addressed to Mr. Tew at Willmar, which place it reached on the 7th; it was forwarded to Los Angeles, Cal., reaching the addressee on April 11, 1912.

One of appellant's contentions is that by their course of dealings the parties selected the mail as the proper medium by which to serve notice. This is based on the fact that the company made use of the mail in sending the contract and certificate of stock to plaintiff some two years before. We cannot assent to the proposition that either this circumstance, or the fact that the office and officers of the company had in the meantime vanished from the state, authorizes an inference that the company consented to be served by depositing the notice in the United States mail. No doubt, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the contract, the mail could be used as the medium of service, but, if it be used, the service is not made until the notice is in the hands of the one intended to be served.

Neither do we think that there is anything in the situation, or the contract, which would warrant the court in saying that the company, or its officers, could not withdraw from the state without notifying plaintiff. There is no pretense that leaving this state was to evade service, or was with any intent to deceive plaintiff. * * *

Under this contract plaintiff had the option to demand a return to him of $2,500, provided he seasonably gave written notice of his election to exercise the option. The contract expressly makes time the essence of the agreement. The giving of the notice was a condition precedent to the right to a refund. No facts were pleaded giving the court any right to abrogate the clear language of the contract. Steele v. Bond, 32 Minn. 14, 18 N. W. 830; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Lewis, 45 Minn. 164, 47 N. W. 652; Alworth v. Gordon, 81 Minn. 445, 84 N. W. 454; Robinson v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 92 Minn. 379, 100 N. W. 226—make clear that in a case of this kind, where either a right to money or property or a forfeiture thereof depends upon the giving of a written notice, such notice, in the absence of custom, statute, estoppel, or express contract stipulation, means a personal notice to the proper party within the stipulated time, and that if it is sought to make use of the United States mail as a means of service the service is not effected until the notice comes into the hands of the one to be served. * * *

Order affirmed.[11]

CHAPTER II

CONSIDERATION

SECTION 1.—EARLY DEVELOPMENT

(Debt and Assumpsit—Benefit to Promisor and Detriment to Promisee)

"Consideration is the material cause of a contract, without which no contract can bind the party. This consideration is either expressed, as when a man bargains to give 20s. for a horse; or is implied, as when the law itself enforces a consideration." Termes de la ley.

"Contract is a bargain or covenant between two parties, where one thing is given for another, which is called quid pro quo; as if I sell my horse for money, or if I covenant to make you a lease of my manor of Dale in consideration of £20 that you shall give me; these are good contracts because there is one thing for another. But if a man make a promise to me that I shall have 20s. and that he will be debtor to me thereof, and after I ask the 20s. and he will not deliver it, yet I shall never have any action to recover the 20s. because this promise was no contract but a bare promise: and Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio. But if anything were given for the 20s., though it were but to the value of a penny, then it had been a good contract." Termes de la ley.

In Calthorpe's Case, 2 Dyer, 336 b, 34 (1574), it was said: "A consideration is a cause or meritorious occasion, requiring a mutual recompense, in fact or in law. Contracts and bargains have a quid pro quo."

No single definition that has been given serves to explain all the currently approved decisions. Consideration is a fact other than a seal, which, when it accompanies a promise, operates to create a legal duty in the promisor. Courts may give such operation (1) to facts long antecedent to the promise; (2) to contemporaneous facts regarded as the equivalent of and in exchange for the promise; and (3) to subsequent facts consisting of acts in reliance on the promise.

"In all contract law our problem is to determine what facts will operate to create legal duties and other legal relations. We find at the outset that bare words of promise do not so operate. Our problem then becomes one of determining what facts must accompany promissory words in order to create a legal duty (and other legal relations). We must know what these facts are in order that we can properly predict the enforcement of reparation, either specific or compensatory, in case of non-performance. We are looking for a sufficient cause or reason for the legal enforcement of a promise. This problem was also before the Roman lawyers, and it must exist in all systems of law. With us it is called the problem of consideration." 27 Yale L. Jour. 362, 376.

ANONYMOUS.

(In the King's Bench. Y. B. 12 Hen. VIII, 11, 3.)

In the King's Bench, the plaintiff brought an action on the case against two executors of one J. S. The count was that J. N. came to the house of the plaintiff to buy goods, and the said J. S., the testator, came with him, and when the said J. N. wished to have the goods, the plaintiff said to him that he was doubtful about giving him credit, and the said J. S., the testator, said to him, "If he does not pay you, I will pay you;" upon which promise the plaintiff delivered the goods to the said J. N. Later, J. N. died without paying the plaintiff, and J. S. also died. The plaintiff alleges that the latter left assets to his executors to pay all debts and legacies, and to satisfy them also. The question was whether or not this action lay against the executors. And it was adjudged by all the justices that he recover in this action, for two reasons: One, that he had no other remedy at common law than this action; the other, because the plaintiff had delivered the goods upon the promise of the testator and there is no reason that his soul should be in jeopardy and that he should suffer prejudice by his promise when there was sufficient with which to pay the plaintiff. And so judgment was given. And Fineux, C. J., said that this is not one of the cases where Actio moritur cum persona, for that is where the hurt or damage is corporeal; as where one beats me and then dies, my action is gone; or in case I die, my executors have no action, for the party cannot be punished when he is dead. But in this case the plaintiff can have that which he would have if the other party were alive, viz. the price of his goods, and so this action does not die, for each party can have his remedy; but it is not so in case of a battery, because the writ cannot say that the executors beat him and they are not held responsible in this action. Quære whether or not the testator could wage his law in this case, if he were alive and this action were brought against him.[1]

[1] Fourteen years later the court again held in an exactly similar case that an action on the case would lie, although debt would not. Y. B. 27 Hen. VIII, 24, 3. See Barbour, 4 Oxford Studies in Social and Legal History, 41.

On the point that the action survived against the executors, this case was strongly disapproved by Fitzherbert fifteen years later. He declares that Fineux and Conesby so held without any authority to support them and "solely upon their own opinions." He adds, "Put this case out of your books, for without any doubt it is not law." Y. B. 27 Hen. VIII, 23, 21.

WEBB'S CASE.

(In the King's Bench, 1577. 4 Leon. 110.)

In action upon the case, the plaintiff declared, that whereas Cobham was indebted to J. S. and J. S. to the defendant, the said defendant in consideration that the plaintiff would procure the said J. S. to make a letter of attorney to the defendant to sue the said Cobham, promised to pay and give to the plaintiff £10. It was objected, here was not any consideration for to induce the assumpsit; for the defendant by this letter of attorney gets nothing but his labour and travel. But the exception was not allowed of. For in this case not so much the profit which redounds to the defendant, as the labour of the plaintiff in procuring of the letter of attorney, is to be respected.[2]

SMITH v. SMITH.

Lambert Smith, executor of Tho. Smith, brought an action upon the case against John Smith, that whereas the testator having divers children enfants, and lying sick of a mortal sickness, being careful to provide for his said children enfants; the defendant in consideration the testator would commit the education of his children, and the disposition of his goods after his death during the minority of his said children, for the education of the said children to him, promised to the testator, to procure the assurance of certain customary lands to one of the children of the said testator; and declared further, that the testator thereupon constituted the defendant overseer of his will, and ordained and appointed by his will, that his goods should be in the disposition of the defendant, and that the testator died, and that by reason of that will, the goods of the testator to such a value came to the defendant's hands to his great profit and advantage. And upon non assumpsit pleaded, it was found for the plaintiff: and upon exception to the declaration in arrest of judgment for want of sufficient consideration it was said by WRAY, Chief Justice, that here is not any benefit to the defendant, that should be a consideration in law, to induce him to make this promise; for the consideration is no other, but to have the disposition of the goods of the testator pro educatione liberorum: for all the disposition is for the profit of the children; and notwithstanding, that such overseers commonly make gain of such disposition, yet the same is against the intendment of the law, which presumes every man to be true and faithful if the contrary be not shewed; and therefore the law shall intend, that the defendant hath not made any private gain to himself, but that he hath disposed of the goods of the testator to the use and benefit of his children according to the trust reposed in him. Which AYLIFFE, Justice, granted. GAWDY, Justice, was of the contrary opinion. And afterwards by award of the Court, it was, that the plaintiff nihil capiat per billam.[3]

THE LADY SHANDOIS v. SIMSON.[4]

(In the Queen's Bench, 1601. Cro. Eliz. 880.)

Error of a judgment in the Common Pleas, where the plaintiff declared in debt for £256 upon several retainers to embroider divers gowns.

The first error was, that the plaintiff's declaration was not good, because he declares (inter alia) that the defendant retained him such a year, day, and place to embroider a satin gown for a maid-servant of her daughter's, and to take for the same 40s.; and the embroidering of another's gown is not a good consideration.—Sed non allocatur; for inasmuch as he did it upon her request, it is a sufficient consideration.

Secondly, it was alleged that debt lies not in this case, but an assumpsit only; for here is not any contract betwixt them, nor quid pro quo; and therefore Nelson's Case, 28 Eliz. was cited, that where one retained Nelson to be attorney for another in such a suit, and agreed that he should have so much for his labour; he brought debt against him who retained him, and not against him for whom he was retained; and it was adjudged that it lay not, for it is not any contract between them; but an assumpsit lies only because he became at his request the other man's attorney.—Sed non allocatur; for here the embroidering of the gown at her request is sufficient, and it is at his election to have debt or assumpsit; as 37 Hen. VI, pl. 8. 3 Edw. IV, pl. 21; 7 Edw. IV, pl. 26; Dyer, 347, and 337, Wooton's case. * * *

FREEMAN v. FREEMAN.

(In the King's Bench, 1615. 2 Bulst. 269.)

In an action upon the case for a promise, the case appeared to be this. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment, upon a non assumpsit, and a verdict for the plaintiffe. It was urged that the action here brought

[3] In Manwood and Burston's Case, 2 Leon. 203 (1587), it was said in argument: "There are three manner of considerations upon which an assumpsit may be grounded: 1. A debt precedent; 2. Where he to whom such a promise is made is damnified by doing any thing, or spends his labour at the instance of the promiser, although no benefit cometh to the promiser; as I agree with a surgeon to cure a poor man (who is a stranger unto me) of a sore, who doth it accordingly, he shall have an action; 3. Or there is a present consideration," etc.

[4] Part of the report, dealing with collateral matters, is omitted.

did not lie, for that there was no good consideration set forth in the declaration, to ground the promise upon; and for this the case was, that the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff's wife, when she was sole, would take the plaintiffe to her husband, he did promise to assure unto her such an estate in land, for her life, for a joynture, accordingly, she did take the plaintiffe to her husband, and for not performance of the promise, they did bring this action upon the case.

Coke, and the whole Court, this is a good consideration, to raise the promise; and so if one say to a chyrurgeon, cure such a one, and I will pay you for the cure, or deliver to such a merchant so many cloathes, for which, if he doth not pay you, I will; though the party promising, hath no benefit by this, yet this is a good consideration, and the party liable to an action upon the case for the same.

Coke. If an act be to be done to another, at my request, of which I am to have no benefit, yet for this I shall be chargeable in an action upon the case; so if I do say to another, deliver so much to such a one and I will pay you for it, by this I am chargeable, and this is a good consideration to charge me with my promise, though no benefit at all by this redounds unto me, the Court cleer of opinion, that in this principal case the consideration was good, and so by the rule of the Court, judgment was given for the plaintiffe.

SANDS v. TREVILIAN.

(In the King's Bench, 1628. Cro. Car. 193.)

See, also, Cro. Car. 107.

Error of a judgment in the Common Pleas; where Trevilian, being an attorney, brought an attachment of privilege against Sands, and demanded against him debt of ten pounds; and declares, that he being an attorney there, the said Sands retained him to prosecute a suit in the Common Pleas betwixt one Symms and Worlich, and desired the plaintiff to be attorney for Worlich, and promised to pay him all his fees, and all that he should lay out to counsel and officers of the Court in that suit: and shews, that he laid out such sums, which amount to the money demanded; whereupon he brought this action.

The defendant there pleaded nil debet; and found against him, and judgment for the plaintiff.

Error was now assigned, that in this case debt lies not against him who so entreated him to be attorney; for there is no contract between them, nor hath he any quid pro quo; but he ought to have had an assumpsit (because he did it at his request), if he for whom he is retained doth not pay him his fees.—And thereto agreed all the Court; but if he should have debt they doubted.

But all the Court conceived, that no action of debt lies here, but an action upon the case only; for the retainer being for another man, and he being attorney for another man who agreed to that retainer, there is no cause of debt betwixt him who retained and the attorney, and no contract nor consideration to ground this action; and he who is so retained may well have debt for his fees against him for whom he was retained, he having agreed thereto; wherein there cannot be any wager of law; but against the defendant, who is a stranger to the suit, and at whose request he took upon him to be attorney, debt lies not, as 27 Hen. VIII, pl. 24; and in the case of Rolls v. Germyn, Cro. Eliz. 425, it was so resolved. Whereupon it was adjudged, that the first judgment should be reversed.

RICHARDSON, Chief Justice, and HUTTON and HARVEY, Justices of the Common Pleas, being moved herein, said, that this point was never moved before them; and they were of the same opinion, that debt lies not, but only an action on the case.[5]

FOOLY AND PRESTON'S CASE.

(In the Common Pleas, 1586. 1 Leon. 297.)

In an action upon the case the plaintiff declared, that whereas John Gibbon was bound unto the plaintiff in quodam scripto obligatorio, sigillo suo sigillat. and coram, &c. recognito in forma statuti Stapul. The defendant in consideration that the plaintiff would deliver to him the said writing to read over, promised to deliver the same again to the plaintiff within six days after, or to pay to him £1000 in lieu thereof, upon which promise the plaintiff did deliver to the defendant the said writing; but the defendant had not, nor would not deliver it back to the plaintiff, to the great delay of the execution thereof, and the defendant did demur in law upon the declaration. It was objected, that here is no sufficient consideration appearing in the declaration upon which a promise might be grounded; but it was the opinion of the whole Court, that the consideration set forth in the declaration was good and sufficient; and by Anderson. It is usual and frequent in the King's Bench: if I deliver to you an obligation to rebail unto me, I shall have an action upon the case without an express assumpsit; and afterwards judgment was given for the plaintiff.[6] [5] Argument of counsel omitted.

WHEATLEY v. LOW.

(In the King's Bench, 1623. Cro. Jac. 668.)

Action on the case. Whereas he was obliged to J. S. in forty pounds for the payment of twenty pounds; and the bond being forfeited, he delivered ten pounds to the defendant, to the intent he should pay it to J. S. in part of payment sine ullâ morâ; that in consideratione inde the defendant assumed, &c. and assigns for breach, that he had not paid; whereupon the other had sued him for this debt, &c.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and verdict for the plaintiff. It was moved in arrest of judgment that this is not any consideration, because it is not alleged, that he delivered it to the defendant upon his request; and the acceptance of it to deliver to another sine morâ, cannot be any benefit to the defendant to charge him with this promise.

Sed non allocatur; for, being that he accepted this money to deliver, and promised to deliver it, it is a good consideration to charge him, Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.—A writ of error being brought, and this matter only assigned for error, the judgment was affirmed.[7]

SIR ANTHONY STURLYN v. ALBANY.

(In the King's Bench, 1587. Cro. Eliz. 67.)

Assumpsit. The case was, the plaintiff had made a lease to J. S. of land for life rendering rent. J. S. grants all his estate to the defendant; the rent was behind for divers years; the plaintiff demands the rent of the defendant, who assumed that if the plaintiff could shew to him a deed that the rent was due, that he would pay to him the rent and the arrearages; the plaintiff alledgeth that upon such a day of, &c. at Warwick, he shewed unto him the indenture of lease, by which the rent was due, and notwithstanding he had not paid him the rent and the arrearages due for four years. Upon non assumpsit pleaded it was found for the plaintiff; and damages assessed to so much as the rent and arrearages did amount unto.—And it was moved in arrest of judgment, that there was no consideration to ground an action, for it is but the shewing of the deed, which is no consideration.—2. The damages ought only to be assessed for the time the rent was behind, and not for the rent and the arrearages; for he hath other remedy for the rent; and a recovery in this action shall be no bar in another action. But it was adjudged for the plaintiff: for when a thing is to be done by the plaintiff, be it never so small, this is a sufficient consideration to ground an action; and here the shewing of the deed is a cause to avoid suit; and the rent and arrearages may be assessed all in damages: but they took order that the plaintiff should release to the defendant all the arrearages of rent before execution should be awarded.[8] * * *

KNIGHT v. RUSHWORTH.

(In the Common Pleas, 1596. Cro. Eliz. 469.)[9]

Assumpsit. The case was, that one Mary Rushworth had entered into a bond of £200 to the plaintiff; and after gave all her goods to the defendant to pay her debts. The defendant pretending that this bond was read to the said Mary Rushworth as an obligation of £100 only and so void, assumed to the plaintiff, that if he and two witnesses would deponere before the Mayor of Lincoln, that the obligation was read to Mary Rushworth as an obligation of £200 that he would pay it. Whereupon the plaintiff, with two others, came before the Mayor of Lincoln, and there deposed upon a book accordingly; and hereupon brought this action. Whereto it was demurred.—Yelverton, for the defendant, moved, that this action lies not; for there is not any consideration besides this oath, which is unlawful, and therefore void.

HEARN. It is not material whether the consideration be for the plaintiff's benefit; for if it be any charge or trouble to the defendant, it sufficeth; as in Albanie's case; and he conceived the oath to be lawful enough. * * *

ANDERSON. The travail of coming before the mayor is a very good consideration; and truly the oath is not illegal, being taken before him; and the smallness of a consideration is not material, if there be any. * * *

BEAUMOND and OWEN doubted herein at first; but afterwards they agreed with their companions, that the consideration was sufficient and lawful—Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.[10]

HAIGH et al. v. BROOKS.

(In the Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber, 1839 and 1840. 10 Adol. & El. 309.)

The following written guarantee was in the possession of the plaintiffs:

"Manchester, February 4, 1837.

"Messrs. Haigh & Franceys:

"Gentlemen: In consideration of your being in advance to Messrs. John Lees & Sons in the sum of £10,000 for the purchase of cotton, I do hereby give you my guarantee for that amount (say, £10,000) on their behalf. John Brooks."

In assumpsit, the plaintiffs now allege that at the defendant's request they surrendered this document to the defendant in return for his promise that he would see paid at maturity three bills of exchange for some £9,666, payable three months after date, accepted and to be paid by John Lees and Sons; that the bills became due and have not been paid.

The defendant pleaded that the written guarantee surrendered to him was void and of no value for the reason that it was a promise to pay the debt of another, to-wit: John Lees and Sons, and so was within the provisions of the statute of frauds, and that the writing did not express the consideration for which the promise was made, as the said statute requires.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred, assigning for cause, "that it is admitted by the plea that the memorandum, the giving up of which was the consideration of the guarantee in the said declaration mentioned, was actually given up to the said defendant by the said plaintiffs, and the consideration was therefore executed by the said defendant, and that, even if the original memorandum was not binding in point of law, the giving up was a sufficient consideration for the promise in the declaration mentioned." Joinder.[11]

The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was rendered by LORD DENMAN, C. J. This action was brought upon an assumpsit to see certain acceptances paid, in consideration of the plaintiffs giving up a guarantee of £10,000, due from the acceptor to the plaintiffs. Plea, that the guarantee was for the debt of another, and that there was no writing wherein the consideration appeared, signed by the defendant, and so the giving it up was no good consideration for the promise. Demurrer, stating for cause that the plea is bad, because the consideration was executed, whether the guarantee were binding in law or not. The form of the guarantee was set out in the plea. "In consideration of your being in advance to Messrs. John Lees and Sons, in the sum of £10,000, for the purchase of cotton, I do hereby give you my guarantee for that amount, (say £10,000,) on their behalf. John Brooks."

It was argued for the defendant, that this guarantee is of no force, because the fact of the plaintiffs being already in advance to Lees could form no consideration for the defendant's promise to guarantee to the plaintiffs the payment of Lees' acceptances. In the first place, this is by no means clear. That "being in advance" must necessarily mean to assert that he was in advance of the time of giving the guarantee, is an assertion open to argument. It may, possibly, have been intended as prospective. If the phrase had been "in consideration of your becoming in advance," or, "on condition of your being in advance," such would have been the clear import. As it is, nobody can doubt that the defendant took a great interest in the affairs of Messrs. Lees, or believe that the plaintiffs had not come under the advance mentioned at the defendant's request. Here is then sufficient doubt to make it worth the defendant's while to possess himself of the guarantee; and, if that be so, we have no concern with the adequacy or inadequacy of the price paid or promised for it.

But we are by no means prepared to say that any circumstances short of the imputation of fraud in fact, could entitle us to hold that a party was not bound by a promise made upon any consideration which could be valuable; while of its being so the promise by which it was obtained from the holder of it must always afford some proof.

Here, whether or not the guarantee could have been available within the doctrine of Wain v. Warlters, 5 East, 10, the plaintiffs were induced by the defendant's promise to part with something which they might have kept, and the defendant obtained what he desired by means of that promise. Both being free and able to judge for themselves, how can the defendant be justified in breaking this promise, by discovering afterwards that the thing in consideration of which he gave it did not possess that value which he supposed to belong to it? It cannot be ascertained that that value was what he most regarded. He may have had other objects and motives; and of their weight he was the only judge. We, therefore, think the plea bad: and the demurrer must prevail.

Judgment for the plaintiffs. * * *

From this judgment a writ of error was argued in the Exchequer Chamber before Lord ABINGER, C. B., BOSANQUET, COLTMAN, and MAULE, JJ., and ALDERSON and ROLFE, BB. Speaking for this court, Lord ABINGER said:

It is the opinion of all the Court that there was in the guarantee an ambiguity that might be explained by evidence, so as to make it a valid contract, and, therefore this was a sufficient consideration for the promise declared upon.

It is also the opinion of all the Court, with the exception of my Brother MAULE, who entertained some doubt on the question, that the words both of the declaration and the plea import that the paper on which the guarantee was written was given up, and that the actual surrender of the possession of the paper to the defendant was a sufficient consideration without reference to its contents.

Judgment affirmed.[12]

SCHNELL v. NELL.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1861. 17 Ind. 29, 79 Am. Dec. 453.)

PERKINS, J. Action by J. B. Nell against Zacharias Schnell, upon the following instrument:

"This agreement, entered into this 13th day of February, 1856, between Zach. Schnell, of Indianapolis, Marion county, state of Indiana, as party of the first part, and J. B. Nell, of the same place, Wendelin Lorenz, of Stilesville, Hendricks county, state of Indiana, and Donata Lorenz, of Frickinger, Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany, as parties of the second part, witnesseth: The said Zacharias Schnell agrees as follows: Whereas his wife, Theresa Schnell, now deceased, has made a last will and testament in which, among other provisions, it was ordained that every one of the above-named second parties, should receive the sum of $200; and whereas the said provisions of the will must remain a nullity, for the reason that no property, real or personal, was in the possession of the said Theresa Schnell, deceased, in her own name, at the time of her death, and all property held by Zacharias and Theresa Schnell jointly, therefore reverts to her husband; and whereas the said Theresa Schnell has also been a dutiful and loving wife to the said Zach. Schnell, and has materially aided him in the acquisition of all property, real and personal, now possessed by him; for, and in consideration of all this and the love and respect he bears to his wife; and, furthermore, in consideration of one cent, received by him of the second parties, he, the said Zach. Schnell, agrees to pay the above named sums of money to the parties of the second part, to wit: $200 to the said J. B. Nell; $200 to the said Wendelin Lorenz; and $200 to the said Donata Lorenz, in the following installments, viz., $200 in one year from the date of these presents; $200 in two years; and $200 in three years; to be divided between the parties in equal portions of $66⅔ each year, or as they may agree, till each one has received his full sum of $200. And the said parties of the second part, for, and in consideration of this, agree to pay the above-named sum of money (one cent), and to deliver up to said Schnell, and abstain from collecting any real or supposed claims upon him or his estate, arising from the said last will and testament of the said Theresa Schnell, deceased. In witness whereof, the said parties have, on this 13th day of February, [12] In accord: Judy v. Louderman, 48 Ohio St. 562, 29 N. E. 181 (1891), surrender of a worthless note of a person who had died insolvent long before; Wilkinson v. Oliveira, 1 Bing. N. C. 490 (1835).

1856, set hereunto their hands and seals. Zacharias Schnell. [Seal.] J. B. Nell. [Seal.] Wen. Lorenz. [Seal.]"

The complaint contained no averment of a consideration for the instrument, outside of those expressed in it; and did not aver that the one cent agreed to be paid, had been paid or tendered.

A demurrer to the complaint was overruled.

The defendant answered, that the instrument sued on was given for no consideration whatever.

He further answered, that it was given for no consideration, because his said wife, Theresa, at the time she made the will mentioned, and at the time of her death, owned, neither separately, nor jointly with her husband, or any one else (except so far as the law gave her an interest in her husband's property), any property, real or personal, etc.

The will is copied into the record, but need not be into this opinion.

The court sustained a demurrer to these answers, evidently on the ground that they were regarded as contradicting the instrument sued on, which particularly set out the considerations upon which it was executed. But the instrument is latently ambiguous on this point. See Ind. Dig. p. 110.

The case turned below, and must turn here, upon the question whether the instrument sued on does express a consideration sufficient to give it legal obligation, as against Zacharias Schnell. It specifies three distinct considerations for his promise to pay $600:

(1) A promise, on the part of the plaintiffs, to pay him one cent.

(2) The love and affection he bore his deceased wife, and the fact that she had done her part, as his wife, in the acquisition of the property.

(3) The fact that she had expressed her desire, in the form of an inoperative will, that the persons named therein should have the sums of money specified.

The consideration of one cent will not support the promise of Schnell. It is true, that as a general proposition, inadequacy of consideration will not vitiate an agreement. Baker v. Roberts, 14 Ind. 552. But this doctrine does not apply to a mere exchange of sums of money, of coin, whose value is exactly fixed, but to the exchange of something of, in itself, indeterminate value, for money, or, perhaps for other thing of indeterminate value. In this case had the one cent mentioned been some particular one cent, a family piece, or ancient, remarkable coin, possessing an indeterminate value, extrinsic from its simple money value, a different view might be taken. As it is, the mere promise to pay six hundred dollars for one cent, even had the portion of that cent due from the plaintiff been tendered, is an unconscionable contract, void, at first blush upon its face, if it be regarded as an earnest one. Hardesty v. Smith, 3 Ind. 39. The consideration of one cent is, plainly, in this case, merely nominal, and intended to be so. As the will and testament of Schnell's wife imposed no legal obligation upon him to discharge her bequests out of his property, and as she had none of her own, his promise to discharge them was not legally binding upon him, on that ground. A moral consideration, only, will not support a promise. Ind. Dig., p. 13. And for the same reason, a valid consideration for his promise cannot be found in the fact of a compromise of a disputed claim; for where such claim is legally groundless, a promise upon a compromise of it, or of a suit upon it, is not legally binding. Spahr v. Hollingshead, 8 Blackf. 415. There was no mistake of law or fact in this case, as the agreement admits the will inoperative and void. The promise was simply one to make a gift. The past services of his wife, and the love and affection he had borne her, are objectionable as legal considerations for Schnell's promise, on two grounds: (1) They are past considerations. Ind. Dig., p. 13. (2) The fact that Schnell loved his wife and that she had been industrious, constituted no consideration for his promise to pay J. B. Nell, and the Lorenzes, a sum of money. Whether, if his wife, in her lifetime, had made a bargain with Schnell, that, in consideration of his promising to pay, after her death, to the persons named, a sum of money, she would be industrious, and worthy of his affection, such a promise would have been valid and consistent with public policy, we need not decide. Nor is the fact that Schnell now venerates the memory of his deceased wife a legal consideration for a promise to pay any third person money.

The instrument sued on, interpreted in the light of the facts alleged in the second paragraph of the answer, will not support an action. The demurrer to the answer should have been overruled. See Stevenson v. Druley, 4 Ind. 519.

NEIKIRK v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1918. 81 W. Va. 558, 94 S. E. 947.)

Action by F. C. Neikirk against W. T. Williams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAMS, J.[14] In the circuit court, on appeal from the judgment of a justice, plaintiff recovered a judgment for $300, and defendant has brought the case here on writ of error. No written pleadings were filed before the justice or in court, and plaintiff's testimony is the only evidence in the case. His claim is based on defendant's promise to pay him $500 in consideration for his release from an agreement made with plaintiff, as agent of the Equitable Life Assurance Company, to purchase an annuity policy the annual premium on which was $1,984; the $500 being in lieu of commissions which plaintiff would have been entitled to retain out of the premium, if it had been paid. The case was tried by a jury in the absence of defendant, and a verdict returned for plaintiff in accordance with a peremptory instruction by the court. * * * At the time of the alleged promise plaintiff says the policy had not been forwarded to the insurance company, and he had the right to cancel, and did cancel it.

Counsel for defendant insist that the verdict is contrary to law because the promise sued on is without any consideration. The $500 represented approximately the commissions which plaintiff was entitled to retain out of the premium, if it had been paid, as compensation for his services as agent of the insurance company, and if defendant was under no legal obligation to pay the premium, it follows that he was not bound to pay plaintiff any part of his commissions, and the promise to pay would be nudum pactum. No contractual relation existed between plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff was performing no services for defendant in his efforts to sell him the insurance, and therefore no promise to compensate him could be implied. Defendant was not legally bound to pay the premium, and, notwithstanding he had drawn his check for the amount of it and delivered it to plaintiff, he could have countermanded it without violating any legal right of the insurance company or of its agent the plaintiff. The insurance company was fully protected, in case of nonpayment of premium, by its right to forfeit the policy, even if the policy had been approved by it, and this seems to be its only remedy.

Contracts of insurance being unilateral, the insurer has no right generally to maintain a suit for premiums due, and the insured, if he has not expressly promised to pay, is at liberty to refuse to make payment, as it is generally only a condition precedent to his protection under the policy. By his failure to pay the insured simply loses his benefit. He has the option to pay or not, and thus continue the insurance company's obligation or terminate it at his pleasure. 2 Bacon on Ins. (4th Ed.) § 456; 1 Cooley's Briefs, 82; 2 Cooley's Briefs, 990; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. Ed. 789, and Clark v. Schromeyer, 23 Ind. App. 565, 55 N. E. 785. Plaintiff had not assumed payment of the premium for defendant, and was not liable to the insurance company for any part of it. The contract of insurance had not been consummated, and in declining to pay the premium defendant simply exercised his legal right. Hence when plaintiff canceled the policy, which is the only consideration for defendant's promise, he neither surrendered any legal right nor benefited the situation of defendant, and therefore defendant's promise was without consideration, and, for that reason, is not enforceable. That every promise must be supported by a valuable consideration, before recovery can be had on it, is a principle too well recognized to need any citation of authorities.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CRISP v. GAMEL.

(In the King's Bench, 1605. Cro. Jac. 128.)

It was resolved that where, in an assumpsit, two considerations be alleged, the one good and sufficient and the other idle and vain, if that which is good be proved, it sufficeth; and although he fails in the proof of the other, it is not material, because it was in vain to allege it; and it is as if it had not been alleged.[15]

RANN et al. v. HUGHES.

(In the House of Lords, 1778. 7 Term R. 350, note.)

The declaration stated that on the 11th of June, 1764, divers disputes had arisen between the plaintiffs' testator and the defendant's intestate, which they referred to arbitration; that the arbitrator awarded that the defendant's intestate should pay to the plaintiffs' testator £983. That the defendant's intestate afterwards died possessed of effects sufficient to pay that sum; that administration was granted to the defendant; that Mary Hughes died, having appointed the plaintiffs her executors; that at the time of her death the said sum of £983 was unpaid, "by reason of which premises the defendant as administratrix became liable to pay to the plaintiffs as executors the said sum, and being so liable she in consideration thereof undertook and promised to pay &c." The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; plené administravit; and plené administravit, except as to certain goods &c. which were not sufficient to pay an outstanding bond debt of the intestate's therein set forth &c. The replication took issue on all these pleas. Verdict for the plaintiff on the first issue, and for the defendant on the two last; and on the first a general judgment was entered in B. R. against the defendant de bonis propriis. This judgment was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber; and a writ of error was afterwards brought in the House of Lords, where after argument the following question was proposed to the judges by the lord chancellor, "Whether sufficient matter appeared upon the declaration to warrant after verdict the judgment against the defendant in error in her personal capacity;" upon which the Lord Chief Baron Skynner delivered the opinion of the judges to this effect

It is undoubtedly true that every man is by the law of nature bound to fulfil his engagements. It is equally true that the law of this country supplies no means, nor affords any remedy, to compel the performance of an agreement made without sufficient consideration; such agreement is nudum pactum ex quo non oritur actio, and whatsoever may be the sense of this maxim in the civil law, it is in the last-mentioned sense only that it is to be understood in our law. The declaration states that the defendant being indebted as administratrix promised to pay when requested, and the judgment is against the defendant generally. The being indebted is of itself a sufficient consideration to ground a promise, but the promise must be coextensive with the consideration unless some particular consideration of fact can be found here to warrant the extension of it against the defendant in her own capacity. If a person indebted in one right in consideration of forbearance for a particular time promise to pay in another right, this convenience will be a sufficient consideration to warrant an action against him or her in the latter right: but here no sufficient consideration occurs to support this demand against her in her personal capacity; for she derives no advantage or convenience from the promise here made. For if I promise generally to pay upon request what I was liable to pay upon request in another right, I derive no advantage or convenience from this promise, and therefore there is not sufficient consideration for it. But it is said that if this promise is in writing that takes away the necessity of a consideration and obviates the objection of nudum pactum, for that cannot be where the promise is put in writing; and that after verdict, if it were necessary to support the promise that it should be in writing, it will after verdict be presumed that it was in writing: and this last is certainly true; but that there cannot be nudum pactum in writing, whatever may be the rule of the civil law, there is certainly none such in the law of England. His lordship observed upon the doctrine of nudum pactum delivered by Mr. J. Wilmot in the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop and Hopkins, 3 Burrows, 1663, that he contradicted himself, and was also contradicted by Vinnius in his Comment on Justinian.

All contracts are by the laws of England distinguished into agreements by specialty, and agreements by parol; nor is there any such third class as some of the counsel have endeavoured to maintain, as contracts in writing. If they be merely written and not specialties, they are parol, and a consideration must be proved. But it is said that the statute of frauds has taken away the necessity of any consideration in this case; the statute of frauds was made for the relief of personal representatives and others, and did not intend to charge them further than by common law they were chargeable. His lordship here read those sections of that statute which relate to the present subject. He observed that the words were merely negative, and that executors and administrators should not be liable out of their own estates, unless the agreement upon which the action was brought or some memorandum thereof was in writing and signed by the party. But this does not prove that the agreement was still not liable to be tried and judged of as all other agreements merely in writing are by the common law, and does not prove the converse of the proposition that when in writing the party must be at all events liable. He here observed upon the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop in Burrows, and the case of Losh v. Williamson, Mich. 16 Geo. III. in B. R.; and so far as these cases went on the doctrine of nudum pactum, he seemed to intimate that they were erroneous. He said that all his brothers concurred with him that in this case there was not a sufficient consideration to support this demand as a personal demand against the defendant, and that its being now supposed to have been in writing makes no difference. The consequence of which is that the question put to us must be answered in the negative.

And the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed.[16]

SECTION 2.—RELIANCE ON A PROMISE AS CONSIDERATION

(Must Consideration be the Motive of the Promisor or the Inducing Cause of His Promise?)

THOMAS v. THOMAS.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1842. 2 Q. B. 851.)

Assumpsit. The declaration stated an agreement between plaintiff and defendant that the defendant should, when thereto required by the plaintiff, by all necessary deeds, conveyances, assignments, or other assurances, grants, etc., or otherwise, assure a certain dwelling house and premises, in the county of Glamorgan, unto plaintiff for her life, or so long as she should continue a widow and unmarried, and that plaintiff should, at all times during which she should have possession of the said dwelling house and premises, pay to defendant and one Samuel Thomas (since deceased), their executors, administrators or [16] In Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr. 1663 (1765), Lord Mansfield held that a promise was binding merely because it was in writing. The defendant had written to the plaintiff promising to accept a bill to be drawn on the credit of one White.

It is frequently provided by statute that in the case of written contracts a consideration is presumed to exist and the burden of proof is upon him who denies its existence E. g., see Ala. Code 1896, § 1800; Cal. Civ. Code, § 1614; Iowa Code, §§ 3069, 3070; Mo. Rev. St. 1909, § 2774; Mont. Code Civ. Proc. 1895, § 3266, subd. 39 (Rev. Codes, § 7962); N. M. Laws 1901, c. 62, § 12; Okl. Rev. Laws 1910, §§ 934, 935; S. D. Rev. Civ. Code, § 1232.

assigns, the sum of £1 yearly toward the ground rent payable in respect of the said dwelling house and other premises thereto adjoining, and keep the said dwelling house and premises in good and tenantable repair. That the said agreement being made, in consideration thereof, and of plaintiff's promise to perform the agreement, Samuel Thomas and the defendant promised to perform the same; and that, although plaintiff afterward and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, etc., required of defendant to grant, etc., by a necessary and sufficient deed, etc., the said dwelling house, etc., to plaintiff for her life, or while she continued a widow, and though she had then continued, etc., and still was a widow and unmarried, and although she did, to wit, on, etc., tender to the defendant for his execution a certain necessary and sufficient deed, etc., proper and sufficient for the conveyance, etc., and although, etc. (general readiness of plaintiff to perform), yet defendant did not nor would then or at any other time convey, etc.

Pleas. 1. Non assumpsit. 2. That there was not the consideration alleged in the declaration of the defendant's promise. 3. Fraud and covin.

Issues thereon.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Glamorganshire Lent Assizes, 1841, it appeared that John Thomas, the deceased husband of the plaintiff, at the time of his death, in 1837, was possessed of a row of seven dwelling houses in Merthyr Tidvil, in one of which, being the dwelling house in question, he was himself residing; and that by his will he appointed his brother Samuel Thomas (since deceased) and the defendant executors thereof, to take possession of all his houses, etc., subject to certain payments in the will mentioned, among which were certain charges in money for the benefit of the plaintiff. In the evening before the day of his death he expressed orally a wish to make some further provision for his wife; and on the following morning he declared orally, in the presence of two witnesses, that it was his will that his wife should have either the house in which he lived and all that it contained, or an additional sum of £100 instead thereof.

This declaration being shortly afterward brought to the knowledge of Samuel Thomas and the defendant, the executors and residuary legatees, they consented to carry the intentions of the testator so expressed into effect; and, after the lapse of a few days, they and the plaintiff executed the agreement declared upon; which, after stating the parties, and briefly reciting the will, proceeded as follows:

"And, whereas the said testator, shortly before his death, declared in the presence of several witnesses, that he was desirous his said wife should have and enjoy during her life, or so long as she should continue his widow, all and singular the dwelling house," etc., "or £100 out of his personal estate," in addition to the respective legacies and bequests given her in and by his said will; "but such declaration and desire was not reduced to writing in the lifetime of the said John Thomas and read over to him; but the said Samuel Thomas and Benjamin Thomas are fully convinced and satisfied that such was the desire of the said testator, and are willing and desirous that such intention should be carried into full effect. Now these presents witness, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the parties, that, in consideration of such desire and of the premises," the executors would convey the dwelling house, etc., to the plaintiff and her assigns during her life, or for so long a time as she should continue a widow and unmarried: "provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby further agreed and declared, that the said Eleanor Thomas, or her assigns, shall and will, at all times during which she shall have possession of the said dwelling house, etc., pay to the said Samuel Thomas and Benjamin Thomas, their executors, etc., the sum of £1 yearly toward the ground rent payable in respect of the said dwelling house and other premises thereto adjoining, and shall and will keep the said dwelling house and premises in good and tenantable repair;" with other provisions not affecting the questions in this case.

The plaintiff was left in possession of the dwelling house and premises for some time; but the defendant, after the death of his coexecutor, refused to execute a conveyance tendered to him for execution pursuant to the agreement, and, shortly before the trial, brought an ejectment, under which he turned the plaintiff out of possession. It was objected for the defendant that, a part of the consideration proved being omitted in the declaration, there was a fatal variance. The learned judge overruled the objection, reserving leave to move to enter a nonsuit. Ultimately a verdict was found for the plaintiff on all the issues; and, in Easter Term last, a rule nisi was obtained pursuant to the leave reserved.

E. V. Williams, for the defendant, argued that this was "a mere gift cum onere," and that the only consideration was "the testator's expressed wish." "What is meant by the consideration for a promise, but the cause or inducement for making it? Plowden, commenting on Sharington v. Strotton, says (page 309), 'Note: That by the civil law nudum pactum is defined thus, Nudum pactum est ubi nulla subest causa praeter conventionem; sed ubi subest causa, fit obligatio, et parit actionem.' In Chitty on Contracts the following passage is cited from the Code Civil: 'L'obligation sans cause, ou sur une fausse cause, ou sur une cause illicite, ne peut avoir aucun effet.' The rent and repairs cannot be said to have been the cause or motive which induced the executors to make this agreement. * * * The proviso merely causes the donee to take the gift charged with the burthen of paying the rent and keeping the premises in repair; and she cannot turn these conditions into a consideration."

Lord DENMAN, C. J. There is nothing in this case but a great deal of ingenuity, and a little wilful blindness to the actual terms of the instrument itself. There is nothing whatever to show that the ground rent was payable to a superior landlord; and the stipulation for the payment of it is not a mere proviso, but an express agreement. (His Lordship here read the proviso.) This is in terms an express agreement, and shows a sufficient legal consideration quite independent of the moral feeling which disposed the executors to enter into such a contract. Mr. Williams's definition of consideration is too large; the word causa in the passage referred to means one which confers what the law considers a benefit on the party. Then the obligation to repair is one which might impose charges heavier than the value of the life estate.

PATTESON, J. It would be giving to causa too large a construction if we were to adopt the view urged for the defendant; it would be confounding consideration with motive. Motive is not the same thing with consideration. Consideration means something which is of some value in the eye of the law, moving from the plaintiff; it may be some benefit to the defendant, or some detriment to the plaintiff; but at all events it must be moving from the plaintiff. Now that which is suggested as the consideration here, a pious respect for the wishes of the testator, does not in any way move from the plaintiff; it moves from the testator; therefore, legally speaking, it forms no part of the consideration. Then it is said that, if that be so, there is no consideration at all, it is a mere voluntary gift; but when we look at the agreement we find that this is not a mere proviso that the donee shall take the gift with the burthens; but it is an express agreement to pay what seems to be a fresh apportionment of a ground rent, and which is made payable not to a superior landlord, but to the executors. So that this rent is clearly not something incident to the assignment of the house, for in that case, instead of being payable to the executors, it would have been payable to the landlord. Then as to the repairs, these houses may very possibly be held under a lease containing covenants to repair; but we know nothing about it, for anything that appears the liability to repair is first created by this instrument. The proviso certainly struck me at first as Mr. Williams put it, that the rent and repairs were merely attached to the gift by the donors; and, had the instrument been executed by the donors only, there might have been some ground for that construction; but the fact is not so. Then it is suggested that this would be held to be a mere voluntary conveyance as against a subsequent purchaser for value; possibly that might be so, but suppose it would, the plaintiff contracts to take it, and does take it, whatever it is, for better for worse; perhaps a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration might override it, but that cannot be helped.

COLERIDGE, J. The concessions made in the course of the argument have, in fact, disposed of the case. It is conceded that mere motive need not be stated, and we are not obliged to look for the legal consideration in any particular part of the instrument, merely because the consideration is usually stated in some particular part; ut res magis valeat, we may look to any part. In this instrument, in the part where it is usual to state the consideration, nothing certainly is expressed but a wish to fulfil the intentions of the testator, but in another part we find an express agreement to pay an annual sum for a particular purpose, and also a distinct agreement to repair. If these had occurred in the first part of the instrument, it could hardly have been argued that the declaration was not well drawn and supported by the evidence. As to the suggestion of this being a voluntary conveyance, my impression is that this payment of £1 annually is more than a good consideration, it is a valuable consideration, it is clearly a thing newly created and not part of the old ground rent.

WISCONSIN & M. RY. CO. v. POWERS.

Mr. Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court:[17]

This is an appeal from a decree of the United States circuit court, dismissing the plaintiff's bill on demurrer. The bill seeks to enjoin the auditor general of the state of Michigan from collecting a tax, on the ground that the law imposing the tax is contrary to the Constitution of the United States as impairing the obligation of contracts, and interfering with interstate commerce.

The alleged contract is contained in a law of May 27, 1893, § 3, which, after levying a specific tax on railroads, provided "that the rate of taxation fixed by this act or any other law of this state shall not apply to any railway company hereafter building and operating a line of railroad within this state north of parallel forty-four of latitude until the same has been operated for the full period of ten years, unless the gross earnings shall equal $4,000 per mile, except," etc. Afterwards, on October 23, 1893, the Menominee & Northern Railroad Company was incorporated under the laws of the state, and forthwith conveyed all its property, rights, and franchises to the plaintiff, a Wisconsin corporation which is assumed to stand in the shoes of the Michigan company. The plaintiff thereupon constructed the road. This road is north of parallel forty-four, its gross earnings never have been equal to $4,000 per mile, and it would be entitled to the exemptions just stated if the law of 1893 still were in force. But on June 4, 1897, the state passed a law amending the act of 1893, and levying a "specific tax upon the property and business of [every] railroad corporation operated within the state," and enacted that "when the railroad lies partly within and partly without this state, prima facie, the gross income of said company from such road for the purposes of taxation shall be on the actual earnings of the road in Michigan, computed by adding to the income derived from the business transacted by said company entirely within this state, such proportion of the income of said company arising from the interstate business as the length of the road over which said interstate business is carried in this state bears to the entire length of the road over which said interstate business is carried." This is the law which the plaintiff says is unconstitutional for the reasons above set forth.

The demurrer to the bill was sustained on the ground that the act of 1893 made no valid contract of exemption from taxation, and that the act of 1897, repealing the exemption granted in 1893, was a constitutional law. * * *

The first and main question, then, is whether the act of 1893 purported to make an irrevocable contract with such railroad as might thereafter comply with its terms. The question is pretty well answered by a series of decisions in this court. A distinction between an exemption from taxation contained in a special charter, and general encouragement to all persons to engage in a certain class of enterprise, is pointed out in East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. Ed. 611; Id., 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82. In earlier and later cases it was mentioned that there was no counter-obligation, service, or detriment incurred, that properly could be regarded as a consideration for the supposed contract. Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 24 How. 300, 16 L. Ed. 602; Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. Ed. 805; Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. v. New Orleans, 166 U. S. 143, 17 Sup. Ct. 523, 41 L. Ed. 951. See Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 459, 21 L. Ed. 204. But whatever the ground, thus far attempts like the present to make a contract out of the clauses in a scheme of taxation which happen to benefit certain parties have failed. See further Welch v. Cook, 97 U. S. 541, 24 L. Ed. 1112, and Manistee & N. E. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Railroads, 118 Mich. 349, 76 N. W. 633, in which the state court deals with this very act.

It may be that a state, by sufficient words, might bind itself without consideration, as a private individual may bind himself by recognizance or by affixing a seal. A state might abolish the requirement of consideration altogether for simple contracts by private persons, and, it may be that it equally might dispense with the requirement for itself. But the presence or absence of consideration is an aid to construction in doubtful cases,—a circumstance to take into account in determining whether the state has purported to bind itself irrevocably or merely has used words of prophecy, encouragement, or bounty, holding out a hope but not amounting to a covenant.

In the case at bar, of course the building and operating of the railroad was a sufficient detriment or change of position to constitute a consideration if the other elements were present. But the other elements are that the promise and the detriment are the conventional inducements each for the other. No matter what the actual motive may have been, by the express or implied terms of the supposed contract, the promise and the consideration must purport to be the motive each for the other, in whole or at least in part. It is not enough that the promise induces the detriment or that the detriment induces the promise, if the other half is wanting. If we are to deal with this proviso in a general tax law as we should deal with an alleged simple contract, while, no doubt, in some cases between private persons the above distinctions have not been kept very sharply in mind (Martin v. Meles, 179 Mass. 114, 117, 60 N. E. 397), it is clear that we should require an adequate expression of an actual intent on the part of the state to set change of position against promise before we hold that it has parted with a great attribute of sovereignty beyond the right of change. See Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 668, 6 Sup. Ct. 625, 29 L. Ed. 770. Looking at the case in this way, then, we find no such adequate expression. No doubt the state expected to encourage railroad building, and the railroad builders expected the encouragement; but the two things are not set against each other in terms of bargain. See Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 238, 239, 19 Sup. Ct. 383, 43 L. Ed. 679.

But this is a somewhat narrow and technical mode of discussion for the decision of an alleged constitutional right. The broad ground in a case like this is that, in view of the subject-matter, the legislature is not making promises, but framing a scheme of public revenue and public improvement. In announcing its policy, and providing for carrying it out, it may open a chance for benefits to those who comply with its conditions, but it does not address them, and therefor, it makes no promise to them. It simply indicates a course of conduct to be pursued until circumstances or its views of policy change. It would be quite intolerable if parties not expressly addressed were to be allowed to set up a contract on the strength of their interest in, and action on the faith of, a statute, merely because their interest was obvious and their action likely, on the face of the law.

Decree affirmed.

BRAWN et al. v. LYFORD.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1907. 103 Me. 362, 69 Atl. 544.)

Action by Charles H. Brawn and others against John F. Lyford. Case reported. Judgment for defendant.

PEABODY, J.[18] The defendant on the 31st day of August, 1901, conveyed to the plaintiffs his farm in St. Albans, in the county of Somerset and state of Maine, and assigned to them his interest in a policy of fire insurance to the extent of the buildings insured, reserving the insurance on the personal property covered by the policy.

The policy was to insure $1,350 on the buildings, and $450 on the personal property, for a term of three years, about half of which was unexpired. The premium was $27.

The defendant did not deliver the deed when it was signed, but did so at his home later in the day when he received the purchase price.

[18] The statement of facts is omitted.

After the deed and assignment were signed the attorney who prepared the instruments called attention to the necessity of having the consent of the insurance company to the assignment, and the evidence shows that after conversation on the subject the defendant promised to send the assigned policy as soon as the deed was delivered by mail to Parks Bros., agents, at Pittsfield, Me., to obtain the assent of the insurance company to the assignment; that he neglected to do this; and that on the 7th day of September the buildings were struck by lightning and wholly destroyed by the resulting fire.

The plaintiffs seek their remedy by a special action of assumpsit to recover of the defendant the amount of the insurance on the buildings, $1,350, with interest from September 7, 1901, for the alleged breach of a promise to send the policy to the agents of the company for assent necessary to the validity of the assignment.

The defendant pleads the general issue, with a brief statement denying the alleged consideration, and alleging that any promise to send the policy to the insurance agents was without consideration and void, and denying also that not sending the policy was the legal cause of the buildings being uninsured, for which he should be held responsible.

The case is before the law court on report.

There is some conflict of evidence as to whether in the original trade the $2,000, named as consideration in the deed included an assignment of the unexpired term of the insurance on the buildings. The defendant's testimony indicates that the subject came up when the parties met to have the deed drawn, but that of the plaintiffs and their witness Katen shows that it was previously agreed that the $2,000 was to be paid for the property and insurance. But this is immaterial, since the trade as consummated was for the farm and insurance on the buildings.

There is nothing in the nature of the defendant's undertaking to constitute it a part of what was purchased by the plaintiffs. The payment of the consideration and the execution of the deed and assignment embraced the whole transaction. We cannot agree with the plaintiffs' theory that the promise of the defendant to send the policy to the agents of the company is based upon the pecuniary consideration paid. It was an independent matter. The defendant was under no more obligation to procure the consent of the company to the assignment than to procure the record of the deed. He volunteered to forward the policy by mail to the agents; and he claims that his promise was not legally binding, because without consideration. Thorne et al. v. Deas, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 84, upon which he relies, was an action on the case for the defendant's neglect to fulfill his promise to procure insurance on a vessel owned jointly by himself and the plaintiff. Chief Justice Kent thus concludes his opinion in which he held that there should be a verdict for the defendant: "A short review of the leading cases will show that by the common law a mandatory who undertakes to do an act for another without reward is not responsible for omitting to do the act, and is only responsible when he attempts to do it and does it amiss. In other words, he is responsible for a misfeasance, but not for a nonfeasance, even though special damages be averred." But it was not decided upon the ground that there was no consideration for the alleged promise as consideration was not an element of that form of the action, but that the defendant had not assumed a legal duty by entering upon the execution of his undertaking. The doctrine of this case was reaffirmed in Smedes v. Bank, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 372, although it was an action of assumpsit; but the plaintiff seems to have misconceived his remedy.

New rules have arisen from the development of the action of special assumpsit from an action on the case for deceit into one for the breach of a parol promise. Since the decision in Rann v. Hughes, 7 T. R. 350, note, a consideration for all promises not under seal has been necessary; and consideration is now generally defined as a benefit to the promisor, or a detriment to the promisee.

In this case the promisor's undertaking was not for any antecedent pecuniary consideration, or for an anticipated recompense, but the consideration, if any, was a detriment to the promisee. If, under the facts of the case, it may be considered that the plaintiffs, on the faith of the defendant's undertaking, parted with a present right, were delayed in the present use of a right, or suffered some immediate prejudice, it would be consideration, provided it was so treated by the parties. 5 Cyc. 168; Harriman on Contracts, §§ 91, 96; Fire Insurance Association v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 564, 12 Sup. Ct. 84, 35 L. Ed. 860; Dutton's Estate, 181 Pa. 426, 37 Atl. 582; Ames v. Taylor, 49 Me. 381.

The defendant claims that the policy remained in his custody; that he retained it because he had an interest under it; and that consequently it cannot be said that the plaintiffs parted with the document, or surrendered any present right, or suffered any prejudice on the faith of the defendant's undertaking. But we do not consider that this custody of the policy was inconsistent with the plaintiffs' legal possession. They had a right to it until it was presented to the insurance company for assent to the assignment, and they intrusted it to the defendant to do what they otherwise would presumably have done themselves for the protection of their legal rights. By reason of the defendant's "assumption" the plaintiffs were delayed in the present use of the assigned policy for a purpose recognized as important.

But the consideration of the assumpsit as "detriment to the promisee" lacks the element of inducement. Fitch v. Snedaker, 38 N. Y. 248, 97 Am. Dec. 791. It is true that a motive might be implied from circumstances; but it clearly appears that the intrusting of the policy to the defendant was not at his solicitation, and therefore was not the consideration of the promise, but a mere condition precedent to the performance of the promise. Holmes' Common Law, 291; Haigh v. Brooks, 10 Ad. & El. 309; Hart v. Miles, 4 C. B. N. S. 371.

The voluntary promise of the defendant to perform a gratuitous service was nudum pactum, and he cannot be held liable for its nonperformance as a breach of contract.

Judgment for the defendant.[19]

CARR et al. v. MAINE CENT. R. R.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1917. 78 N. H. 502, 102 Atl. 532, L. R. A. 1918E, 389.)

Case for negligence by J. T. Carr and another against the Maine Central Railroad. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and defendant brings exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

YOUNG, J. The defendant bases its demurrer on (1) the nature of the plaintiffs' cause of action, and (2) the character of the agreement they allege it made with them.

The plaintiffs allege in substance that the defendant charged them more for hauling four cars of pulp wood than they had been accustomed to pay, and that when they claimed a rebate, informed them that the rate had been raised by mistake, but that it could not allow their claim unless they obtained the assent of the Interstate Commerce Commission; that if they would execute the necessary papers it would undertake to procure the assent of the commission to the allowance of their claim; that they executed the necessary papers and gave them to the defendant, but that it, either negligently or fraudulently, failed to act in the matter until after the time within which the commission could give its consent had expired. The fault with which the declaration charges the defendant is its failure to do what the average man would have done if he had undertaken to procure the assent of the commission to the allowance of the plaintiffs' claim; not its failure to perform a duty imposed on it by the federal statute entitled "An Act to regulate commerce." Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379. In other words, the plaintiffs allege that they have been damaged by the defendant's failure to perform a duty imposed on it by the common law—not a federal statute. Since this is so there is no merit in the defendant's contention that the courts of this state have no jurisdiction of the plaintiffs' cause of action.

This also disposes of the defendant's contention that the plaintiffs cannot recover because the agreement they allege it made is one that it could not legally make, and that it had no consideration to support it, for as has already appeared their declaration sounds in tort. In other words, they are not seeking to enforce the agreement they allege the defendant made, but to recover the damages they sustained because of its fraudulent or negligent failure to do what the average man would have done if he had undertaken to procure the assent of commission to the allowance of their claim. In short, the office of the allegation that the defendant agreed to procure the assent of the commission is not to set forth the foundation on which the plaintiffs rest their cause of action, but to show how they came to rely on it to procure the assent of the commission to the allowance of their claim.

The question therefore and the only question of law raised by the defendant's exception is whether the common law imposes the duty of using average care on those who undertake to perform a service for them. The common law imposes that duty on every member of the community for the benefit of all those with whom he comes in contact, regardless of whether he is or is not to be compensated for his services. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909; Edwards v. Lamb, 69 N. H. 599, 45 Atl. 480, 50 L. R. A. 160.

It follows that if the defendant accepted the papers evidencing the plaintiffs' claim for the purpose of forwarding them to the commission, it then and there became its duty to do what the average man would do in that situation. Pittsfield, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co., 71 N. H. 522, 533, 53 Atl. 807, 60 L. R. A. 116. In other words, notwithstanding the defendant owed the plaintiffs no duty in respect to procuring the assent of the commission to the allowance of their claim, still when it undertook to perform that service for them the law then and at that instant imposed on it the duty of doing what the average man would do in that situation, and it is no answer to an action to recover damages caused by its failure to perform that duty to show that it was not to be paid for what it undertook to do. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909.

If, therefore, the plaintiffs show that the defendant accepted the papers evidencing their claim for the purpose of forwarding them to the commission, and then did or omitted to do something the average man would not have done or omitted, they can recover all the damage they sustained as the result of such failure, provided no fault of theirs contributed to produce their loss.

Defendant's exception overruled. All concurred.[20]

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1845. 8 Ala. 131.)

Assumpsit by the defendant, against the plaintiff in error.

The plaintiff was the wife of defendant's brother, but had for some time been a widow, and had several children. In 1840, the plaintiff resided on public land, under a contract of lease, she had held over, and was comfortably settled, and would have attempted to secure the land she lived on. The defendant resided in Talladega county, some sixty or seventy miles off. On the 10th October, 1840, he wrote to her the following letter:

"Dear Sister Antillico,—Much to my mortification, I heard that brother Henry was dead, and one of his children. I know that your situation is one of grief and difficulty. You had a bad chance before, but a great deal worse now. I should like to come and see you, but cannot with convenience at present. * * * I do not know whether you have a preference on the place you live on or not. If you had, I would advise you to obtain your preference, and sell the land and quit the country, as I understand it is very unhealthy, and I know society is very bad. If you will come down and see me, I will let you have a place to raise your family, and I have more open land than I can tend; and on the account of your situation, and that of your family, I feel like I want you and the children to do well."

Within a month or two after the receipt of this letter, the plaintiff abandoned her possession, without disposing of it, and removed with her family, to the residence of the defendant, who put her in comfortable houses, and gave her land to cultivate for two years, at the end of which time he notified her to remove, and put her in a house, not comfortable, in the woods, which he afterwards required her to leave.

A verdict being found for the plaintiff, for $200, the above facts were agreed, and if they will sustain the action, the judgment is to be affirmed, otherwise it is to be reversed.

ORMOND, J. The inclination of my mind is that the loss and inconvenience which the plaintiff sustained in breaking up and moving to the defendant's a distance of sixty miles is a sufficient consideration to support the promise to furnish her with a house and land to cultivate until she could raise her family. My brothers, however, think that the promise on the part of the defendant was a mere gratuity, and that an action will not lie for its breach.

The judgment of the court below must therefore be reversed, pursuant to the agreement of the parties.[21]

In Richards' Ex'r v. Richards, 46 Pa. 78, 82 (1863), Lowrie, C. J., said: "No doubt there is evidence that the testator said he would pay that balance, and that he drew up notes that would have held him to it, if they had been passed as at first intended; but they were given up and destroyed, and therefore go for nothing, and the securities actually given do not hold him. We have nothing, therefore, but his advice to the plaintiff to buy the farm, and not move to the West, accompanied with an assurance that he would furnish him with the balance of the purchase-money. But this does not make a legal contract. Assurances of assistance accompanying kind advice are never intended as contracts. And conformance to advice is never intended to stand as a legal consideration for the kind assurances that accompany the advice, though it is a motive for their fulfillment. It would be exceedingly hurtful to the freedom of social intercourse to create even a suspicion in the public mind, that those kind offers of advice and assistance, which take place among friends and kindred, could be converted into contracts which the law would enforce..

DEVECMON v. SHAW.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1888. 69 Md. 199, 14 Atl. 464, 9 Am. St. Rep. 422.)

BRYAN, J. John Semmes Devecmon brought suit against the executors of John S. Combs, deceased. He declared on the common counts, and also filed a bill of particulars. After judgment by default, a jury was sworn to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff. The evidence consisted of certain accounts taken from the books of the deceased, and testimony that the plaintiff was a nephew of the deceased, and lived for several years in his family, and was in his service as clerk for several years. The plaintiff then made an offer of testimony which is thus stated in the bill of exceptions: "That the plaintiff took a trip to Europe in 1878, and that said trip was taken by said plaintiff, and the money spent on said trip was spent by the said plaintiff, at the instance and request of said Combs, and upon a promise from him that he would reimburse and repay to the plaintiff all money expended by him in said trip; and that the trip was so taken, and the money so expended, by the said plaintiff, but that the said trip had no connection with the business of said Combs; and that said Combs spoke to the witness of his conduct, in being thus willing to pay his nephew's expenses, as liberal and generous on his part." On objection the court refused to permit the evidence to be given, and the plaintiff excepted.

It might very well be, and probably was the case, that the plaintiff would not have taken a trip to Europe at his own expense. But, whether this be so or not, the testimony would have tended to show that the plaintiff incurred expense at the instance and request of the deceased, and upon an express promise by him that he would repay the money spent. It was a burden incurred at the request of the other party, and was certainly a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay. Great injury might be done by inducing persons to make expenditures beyond their means, on express promise of repayment, if the law were otherwise. It is an entirely different case from a promise to make another a present, or render him a gratuitous service. It is nothing to the purpose that the plaintiff was benefited by the expenditure of his own money. He was induced by this promise to spend it in this way, instead of some other mode. If it is not fulfilled, the expenditure will have been procured by a false pretense.

As the plaintiff, on the theory of this evidence, had fulfilled his part of the contract, and nothing remained to be done but the payment of the money by the defendant, there could be a recovery in indebitatus assumpsit, and it was not necessary to declare on the special contract. The fifth count in the declaration is for "money paid by the plaintiff for the defendants' testator in his life-time, at his request." In the bill of particulars we find this item: "To cash contributed by me, J. Semmes Devecmon, out of my own money, to defray my expenses to Europe and return, the said John S. Combs, now deceased, having promised me in 1878 'that, if I would contribute part of my own money towards the trip, he would give me a part of his, and would make up to me my part,' and the amount below named is my contribution, as follows," etc. It seems to us that this statement is a sufficient description of a cause of action covered by the general terms of the fifth count. The evidence ought to have been admitted.

The defendants offered the following prayer, which the court granted:

"The defendants, by their attorneys, pray the court to instruct the jury that there is no sufficient evidence in this case to entitle the plaintiff to recover the interest claimed in the bill of particulars marked 'Exhibit No. 1, Bill of Particulars.'"

The only evidence bearing on this question is the account taken from the books of the deceased, which was offered in evidence by the plaintiff. This account showed on its face a final settlement of all matters embraced in it. In the absence of proof showing errors of some kind, the parties must be concluded by it in all respects. We think the prayer was properly granted.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.[22]

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER CO. v. CENTURY REALTY CO.

LAMM, J.[23] This case is here from the St. Louis Court of Appeals on the dissent of Judge Bland. 118 Mo. App. 197, 94 S. W. 787. The majority opinion of that court reversed the judgment of the circuit court sustaining a demurrer to the petition, and remanded the case to be tried on its merits. We think the majority opinion is soundly reasoned on both principle and precedent. It should be read in connection with this; for we shall not restate its reasoning, but rest content with adopting it, only supplying a sufficient statement here to make this opinion intelligible, and adding some observations of our own.

The statement: Plaintiff was tenant of defendant in possession under a written lease for a five-year term beginning on the 1st day of February, 1901, and ending on the last day of January, 1906. The lease provided, inter alia, that plaintiff could not assign or underlet without the written consent of defendant indorsed on it. Thereafter plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement to the effect that defendant would give its written assent to an assignment of the lease to an acceptable tenant. The petition pleads the lease, the provision against assigning or subletting, and the subsequent written agreement to give consent in writing to an acceptable tenant; and then states, in substance, that plaintiff, in reliance on said written agreement, with the knowledge of defendant, expended a large amount of time and labor in securing an acceptable and satisfactory tenant, and did secure such tenant, but that, notwithstanding that fact, defendant refused and still refuses to consent to the assignment of said lease and to permit said tenant to enter into the possession of said premises, though often requested to do so; that by reason of defendant's refusal to consent to said assignment of said lease plaintiff was and is prevented by defendant from securing such tenant at a large advance over the rent reserved by defendant under said lease, to its damage in the sum of $4,500. Wherefore, etc. The circuit court sustained a general demurrer to the petition. Thereat plaintiff stood on its petition, and, refusing to plead over, judgment went on the demurrer. From that judgment plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals, with the result indicated. When the case came here it was assigned to Division 1, and there argued and submitted. That division was evenly divided, and the cause came into banc. So much by way of statement.

The observations: True, the typewriter company was not bound to do anything under the written agreement. True, it was executory only, and may be called in a sense a nude pact as born. True, defendant realty company could at no time have sued the typewriter company on that agreement for failure to perform. Why should it sue? It already had a tenant in the person of the typewriter company. It wanted no other. But mutuality, in its essence, is but a phase, strictly speaking, of the consideration that will support a contract. It is not the only phase. If mutuality, in a broad sense, was held to be an essential element in every valid contract, to the extent that both contracting parties could sue on it, there could be no such a thing as a valid unilateral or option contract, or a contract evidenced by a subscription paper, or a contract to enforce a reward offer, or a guaranty, or in many other instances readily put in ordinary business affairs. The contract sued on in this case was made for the benefit of the typewriter company. It could furnish an acceptable tenant to defendant to take its place, or let it alone. In that respect it does not differ from many contracts, the breach of which is actionable at the option of the promisee.

Being in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, it was not obnoxious to the statute of frauds. Being fully performed by the promisee, it was no longer a nude pact, but became clothed with a consideration executed on request. That performance, on the strength of the offer made, having been accomplished at an outlay of time and labor on the part of the offeree or promisee, with defendant's knowledge as alleged in the petition, makes it enforceable against the offerer or promisor so long as both parties were capable of contracting and their contract be not vitiated by fraud or as against good morals or public policy.

We take it as good doctrine worthy of all acceptance that it is the primary duty of courts to enforce contracts, not to abrogate them. A contract (such as this) between two parties not in fiduciary relation, but dealing at arm's length, free from taint of fraud, duress, or other form of overreaching or oppression, when performed by the promisee, comes into a court of justice entitled to every fair presumption of validity. Such a contract bespeaks, in the first instance, judicial diligence and astuteness to support the act of the party by the act and art of the law. To that extent, at least, those fine rules of personal honor obtaining between man and man, requiring one to keep his word with another, accord with the rules of law.

It is afield to point to the contract word "acceptable," and say that it would be illusory or unthinkable to suppose that its terms could be complied with by the plaintiff by its furnishing a tenant acceptable to the landlord. As to whether a landlord could stand on mere whim and caprice or some fanciful conceit in rejecting a party furnished by his tenant, under the contract sued on and the lease out of which it grew, we need not inquire. It is likely his refusal would have to stand on something better than mere caprice and whim. It is likely the law would compel such landlord to acquit himself by acting with reason, and that courts would hold that the contract implied he would so act. But in this case, as pointed out in the majority opinion in the court of appeals the petition says that the party furnished was acceptable. The demurrer assumes that allegation true; hence, for present purposes, it is true.

Discussing the question of mutuality, a law-writer, whose views are fortified by the weight due to a virile and a luminous mind, enriched with great research and strengthened by a profound grasp of legal principles, lays down the right doctrine to be: "But if, without any promise whatever, the promisee does the thing required, then the promisor is bound on another ground. The thing done is itself a sufficient and a completed consideration; and the original promise to do something, if the other party would do something, is a continuing promise until the other party does the thing required of him. A very large proportion of our most common contracts rest upon this principle." 1 Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) bottom p. 488.

In a learned note to American Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 15 C. C. A. 543, Mr. Clark, author of Clark on Contracts, in speaking to the point, says: "Again, contracts may be formed by the offer of a promise for an act and acceptance by performing the act, as where a man requests another to perform services for him, and the latter does so. The request is an offer of a promise to pay for the services, and performance of the services is an acceptance of the offer. This is described as consideration executed upon request. Here, also, the act of one party forms the consideration which supports the promise of the other. In these two cases one of the parties, in the formation of the contract, does all that he can be required to do, and there remains an outstanding obligation on the other side only. The contract is unilateral. It is obvious that in these cases the question of mutuality of obligation or contract cannot arise. The question is whether the act is such as to supply a consideration for the promise of the other party."

To illustrate, if Roe writes Doe: "If you loan Lowe your Jersey cow, I will see she is returned in good order." And, if Doe (relying) loan her to Lowe and she is not returned in good order, is Roe not liable to Doe?

If Box write Cox: "If you find my lost horses, Bucephalus and Rosinante, I will release the debt of $50 you owe me." And if Cox (relying) find and return Bucephalus and Rosinante, is his debt not paid to Box?

If Smith agree in writing with Jehu that he will pay him $100 if he drive from Jefferson City to Kansas City and return in four days, and Jehu presently (relying) drives it in four days, is not Smith liable?

If John agree in writing with Gambrinus that if the latter will not drink beer for a year he will pay him a sum certain, and if Gambrinus (relying) drink no beer for that year, is not John bound?

Yet in each of these cases neither Doe, Cox, Jehu, nor Gambrinus was bound to do anything. In each of them there was no consideration other than acceptance by actual performance on request. In the last two and the first no benefit accrued to Roe, Smith, or John. But in each of them there was a consideration (i. e., performance) moving from the promisee in the form of labor done and inconvenience and detriment suffered.

In an old case, Lindell v. Rokes, 60 Mo. 249, 21 Am. Rep. 395, Rokes agreed to pay Lindell $50 if he would not use intoxicating liquors and beer for one year. Lindell performed. Rokes refused to pay, and, being sued, set up a want of consideration as a defense. * * * The case was put on the reason of the thing, and the law was declared to be that: "It is true that the plaintiff did not undertake, in direct terms, to do anything when the note was made; but the prevailing doctrine now is that if one promise to pay another a sum of money if he will do a particular act, and he does the act, the contract is not void for want of mutuality, and the promisor is liable, though the promisee did not at the time of the promise engage to do the act; for upon the performance of the condition by the promisee the contract becomes clothed with a valid consideration, which relates back and renders the promise obligatory." * * *

In another case (Williams v. Jensen, 75 Mo. 681), Stonebreaker, as principal, and Jensen, as surety, executed a note to Williams. Being sued on the note, Jensen contended he was released from liability on two grounds. One of them was an extension of time to the principal by a valid contract without his consent. It was held that the contract to extend was valid as supported by a sufficient consideration, hence Jensen was discharged as surety. The consideration for the extension agreement arose in this way: When the note was about due, Williams agreed with Stonebreaker he would extend the time to a date certain if Stonebreaker would get his wife to sign the note. Stonebreaker procured this to be done without his surety's knowledge or consent. The signature of Mrs. Stonebreaker was worthless, as the law then stood, she being a married woman with no separate estate, and Williams contended there was no consideration for the extension agreement. But this court, disallowing that contention, said: "Whatever may have been his motive, he agreed to extend the time of payment upon the condition that her husband would obtain her signature to the note; and the obtainment of her signature, though such signature be of no value to Williams, constitutes a sufficient consideration for his agreement to extend the time of payment. It is not always necessary that the consideration for a promise should be of some value to the promisor. Damage or inconvenience to the promisee is a sufficient consideration, and where the court can see that there may have been such inconvenience it will uphold the contract. It may have been an inconvenience for Stonebreaker to secure the signature of his wife, and, thus much appearing, the law will shut its eyes to the inequality between the consideration and the promise." At this point the court cites Lindell v. Rokes, supra. Continuing, the court said: "In Brooks v. Ball, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 337, a promise to pay a certain demand if the claimant would swear to its correctness was enforced. Any trouble or labor, however slight, undertaken by one person at the request of another, will support a promise by such other person, although the trouble or labor be of no benefit to the promisor. Addison on Contracts (Morgan's Ed.) § 9; Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511. Being of opinion that the agreement to extend the time of payment was supported by a sufficient consideration, the judgment, which was for the defendant, will be affirmed."

In a late case in banc (Strode v. Transit Co., 197 Mo. loc. cit. 622 et seq., 95 S. W. 851, 7 Ann. Cas. 1084) to which we all agreed, our Brother Graves reviewed authorities and case learning on the question of consideration, and announced the right doctrine to be, as laid down in 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 689, viz., "If the promisee do any act to his injury, however slight, at the request of the promisor, either express or implied, the detriment sustained operates as a consideration."

Barclay, J., in Trustees of Christian Univ. v. Hoffman, 95 Mo. App. loc. cit. 495, 69 S. W. 475, with the concurrence of all his learned brethren, said: "But, apart from the inference of law arising under the above-mentioned statute" (Rev. St. 1899, § 894, supra), "it has been held that where such a promise as that under review has been made to an institution like that of the plaintiffs, and, before the promise is withdrawn, obligations have been created or expenses incurred by the promisee upon the faith of the promise, these facts furnish a consideration to support the original agreement, although in the first instance, it may have partaken somewhat of the nature of a gift. Koch v. Lay, 38 Mo. 147; Pitt v. Gentle, 49 Mo. 74; Corrigan v. Detsch, 61 Mo. 290; School District v. Sheidley, 138 Mo. 672, 40 S. W. 656, 37 L. R. A. 406, 60 Am. St. Rep. 576." See, also, authorities collected in the principal opinion, 118 Mo. App. 197, 94 S. W. 787, and there applied.

But I have pursued the matter further than intended. The upshot of it all is the conclusion that the petition was good and the demurrer bad. Hence, the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the cause remanded to be tried on its merits. It is so ordered.[24]

GANTT, FOX, and GRAVES, JJ., concur.

[24] The opinion of the lower court contained the following language: "It is true that in such agreements, which at first are insufficient by reason of the want of the very essential element of every valid contract, sufficient consideration and mutuality, the promisor can, if he sees fit, revoke and recall the promise at any time prior to the promisee having moved toward its fulfillment and expended time, labor or money and inconvenience himself thereabout, for up to that time nothing having been done thereunder, by the promisee, it will remain a nude pact and is not obligatory. Andreas v. Holcombe, 22 Minn. 339 (1876). But if the promise is permitted to stand and with the knowledge of the promisor, the promisee expends time, labor or money, or otherwise inconveniences himself or forfeits any legal rights, relying upon the faith of the promise, the element of consideration and mutuality is thereby supplied as of the date of the agreement and the contract at once becomes enforceable at law. It appears from the allegations of the petition that although the defendant was under no obligation to make the promise, and although it received no recompense for so doing, that nevertheless it did promise

WOODSON, J. (dissenting). * * * In the case at bar the promise of respondent to permit appellant to assign the lease was unilateral, and was without consideration of any kind to support it. The appellant never at any time, even down to the time of bringing this suit, agreed to find or furnish respondent a suitable tenant; and if appellant had at any time, or even now should withdraw its tender of such tenant, clearly the respondent would have no cause of action against the former for said refusal or withdrawal, for the obvious reason that it never agreed to do so. According to the allegations of the petition, the appellant was under no legal or moral obligation to find for respondent a suitable tenant for the occupancy of the floor space in question.

For the purpose of illustration, let us suppose a farmer should enter a shoe store and ask the proprietor thereof if he would take a cord of hickory wood for a certain designated pair of shoes, and in reply thereto the proprietor should say, "Yes," and without more the farmer should turn and walk from the store without agreeing to take the shoes or to furnish the wood, and he should then return home and chop a cord of hickory wood, load it upon his wagon, haul it to town, drive up to the store, and say to the proprietor that he had chopped the wood, hauled it in for him, and demand the shoes in consideration of and in payment for the wood; and in reply thereto suppose the merchant had said to the farmer that he was sorry, but he could not deliver the shoes to him, for the reason that he had sold them during the time which had elapsed between the first conversation and the time when the wood was hauled to town and tendered to the merchant—could it be seriously contended that the farmer would have a cause of action against the merchant for breach of contract for his failure to deliver the shoes? I think not, for the reason the farmer never agreed to take the shoes, or to cut, haul, and deliver the wood in exchange for them. Such a contract, if it may be so called, would clearly be unilateral in character, and the subsequent tender of the wood would not change the agreement into a bilateral contract. The tender of the wood could not perform in writing to the plaintiff as alleged. No doubt this promise was purely a matter of accommodation to the plaintiff, but it appears that the promise was permitted to stand unrevoked and unrecalled when the defendant had the clear right to recall it for want of mutuality and consideration, and that the plaintiff, relying upon the faith of the promise, which he had a right to do, proceeded and with knowledge of the defendant, expended a large amount of time and labor in securing an acceptable and satisfactory tenant. Under the circumstances stated, a majority of the court are of the opinion that a sufficient consideration and mutuality was imported into the agreement by such performance, which related back to its origin and rendered it a contract valid in law, and affixed a mutual obligation on the defendant to respond."

In Spitzli v. Guth, 112 Misc. Rep. 630, 183 N. Y. Supp. 743 (1920), a lessor gave an option to his lessee for the purpose of protecting the latter in case he made valuable improvements. Such improvements were made, after which the lessor give notice of revocation. The lessee accepted in spite of such notice and obtained a decree for specific performance. See, also, "Power of Revocation," ante, chapter I, section 9, and note to Vickrey v. Maier, post, p. 311.

the twofold office of furnishing a consideration for the contract, and at the same time constitute an agreement to accept the shoes, which had never been done before. And the same is true as regards the case at bar. The finding of a suitable tenant could not perform the twofold function of furnishing a consideration to support the promise of the Century Realty Company to agree to subletting of the floor space to such tenant, and at the same time constitute an agreement on the part of the typewriter company to furnish such tenant, which, confessedly, it has never done down to this date in any mode or manner whatsoever.

The principle announced in the majority opinion is too far-reaching and startling in its effect. Under that holding no merchant or property owner could safely answer a question as to what he would take for a certain article or piece of property, for, if he should do so, he would be liable at any time within the period prescribed by the statute of frauds to be called upon to deliver the property to the party who asked the question, and be subjected to an action for damages for breach of contract for failure to deliver the property, if for any reason he should see proper to decline to deliver it, even though he had disposed of it in the meantime. * * *

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the petition was proper, and that the judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals reversing the judgment of the circuit court is erroneous.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASS'N v. ESTILL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1913. 140 Ga. 291, 78 S. E. 1075, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 783, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 136.)

Action by the Young Men's Christian Association against M. H. Estill and others, executors. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Young Men's Christian Association, a corporation, brought suit against the executors of J. H. Estill to recover an amount alleged to be due on a verbal contract to give $500 for the construction of a building to be devoted to the general purposes of the plaintiff corporation. * * * On April 21, 1905, W. B. Stubbs and J. B. Reid, representing the plaintiff, solicited from Mr. Estill a subscription for the construction of the building. Mr. Estill agreed to subscribe and did subscribe $500, and the following memorandum was made on a card at the time: "Will give $500 as soon as work begins." This memorandum was not signed by Mr. Estill, and the subscription was verbal. Subscriptions were made by others for the same purpose, prior and subsequent to the promise of Mr. Estill, all of which were mutual subscriptions for the common object; and because of the subscriptions made by Mr. Estill and others the work was undertaken by the plaintiff. The contract was given out and the work completed at a very large expense; and if the subscriptions had not been made by Mr. Estill and others, the work would not have been undertaken by the plaintiff. * * * The contract for the erection of the building was let on April 24, 1907, and the work was begun on June 3, 1907, and on the last-mentioned day the subscription became due and payable. On November 9, 1907, Mr. Estill died, and on November 12, 1907, his will was duly probated and letters testamentary issued to his executors. The executors refuse to pay the subscription of Mr. Estill to the plaintiff and judgment is prayed for the sum of $500, the amount of the subscription, with interest thereon from June 3, 1907. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition and dismissed it.[25]

Evans, P. J. * * *

The Young Men's Christian Association is a charitable corporation, and its directors determined to erect in the city of Savannah a large building for the advancement of the cause represented by it, which was entirely charitable and benevolent. Several persons subscribed in writing, promising to give named sums of money for the accomplishment of the enterprise. When Mr. Estill was solicited for a subscription, he promised to give $500 for the work as soon as the work of constructing the building began. The local newspaper owned and published by a company of which he was the chief, if not the only, stockholder, and managed by him, published a list of the subscribers, which included his name among the rest as subscribing the amount which he had orally promised to give. The building was completed at great expense, in reliance upon the subscriptions of promises of Mr. Estill and others. Work began upon the building more than six months before the death of Mr. Estill, and has been fully completed. Mr. Estill never withdrew or repudiated his promise to pay the amount he promised to donate. His executors deny the binding force of his promise to donate $500 to the enterprise. The contention is that a promise to donate a named sum to a charitable purpose is purely gratuitous and unenforceable, for want of a consideration. If Mr. Estill had signed a subscription contract with others to erect this building, the mutual promises of the subscribers would have furnished a good consideration. Our Code declares that "in mutual subscriptions for a common object the promise of the others is a good consideration for the promise of each." Civil Code, § 4246. This section has been held applicable to subscriptions to build churches, and to locate assembly grounds of a religious denomination at a particular point. Wilson v. First Presbyterian Church, 56 Ga. 554; Owenby v. Georgia Baptist Assembly, 137 Ga. 698, 74 S. E. 56, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 238. The petition alleges that other subscriptions were made by other persons before and after Mr. Estill's promise to give $500, and that all of them, including Mr. Estill's verbal promise, were mutual subscriptions for the common object. Notwithstanding this allegation, we do not think the case in hand comes within the Code section quoted. That section has application to mutual subscriptions, which means written promises mutually entered into by the subscribers. The statute is not sufficiently broad to include oral promises, and cannot be extended so as to cover the promise in the case at bar.

A promise to donate money to a charitable purpose is gratuitous and unenforceable, unless some consideration therefor exists. Such a promise amounts to nothing more than a voluntary offer, which may be withdrawn before being acted upon. But if, on the faith of the promise, the promisee, before withdrawal of the promise, expends money and incurs enforceable liabilities in furtherance of the enterprise the promisor intended to promote, the consideration is supplied, and the promise is rendered valid and binding. Owenby v. Georgia Baptist Assembly, supra; School District of Kansas City v. Sheidley, 138 Mo. 672, 40 S. W. 656, 37 L. R. A. 406, 60 Am. St. Rep. 576; McCabe v. O'Connor, 69 Iowa, 134, 28 N. W. 573; Amherst Academy v. Cowls, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 427, 17 Am. Dec. 387; Richelieu Hotel Co. v. International Military Encampment Co., 140 Ill. 248, 29 N. E. 1044, 33 Am. St. Rep. 234; 1 Page on Contracts, § 298; 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 228. In 1 Parsons on Contracts (8th Ed.) *453, it is said: "On the important question, how far voluntary subscriptions for charitable purposes, as for alms, education, religion, or other public uses are binding, the law has in this country passed through some fluctuation, and cannot now be regarded as on all points settled. Where advances have been made, or expenses or liabilities incurred by others in consequence of such subscriptions, before any notice of withdrawal, this should, on general principles, be deemed sufficient to make them obligatory, provided the advances were authorized by a fair and reasonable dependence on the subscriptions; and this rule seems to be well established." The death of the promisor before any liability has been incurred on the faith of the promise would, of course, serve to withdraw or revoke the promise.

We do not think that, because the promise to give rests in parol, it is unenforceable after it has been acted on. If the promise is found in a written subscription by the promisor and others, the mutual promises furnish a consideration under our Code. But the promise to give to a charitable purpose need not be in writing to be an enforceable contract, where the promisee has acted on the faith of it. So long as the promise is gratuitous, it is without consideration; but, when acted on, there is not only mutuality of contract, but a consideration for the contract. If A. promise to buy a house for his nephew, that is nothing; but if A. promise to buy a house for his nephew, and request the nephew to enter into a contract of purchase in the nephew's own name, and the nephew does so, the law implies a promise on the part of A. to reimburse the nephew any part of the purchase money which he may be called on to pay. Skidmore v. Bradford, L. R. 8 Eq. 134. * * *

Judgment reversed.[26]

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF ALBANY v. COOPER et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1889. 112 N. Y. 517, 20 N. E. 352, 3 L. R. A. 468, 8 Am. St. Rep. 767.)

Appeal from supreme court, general term, Third department.

Action by the Presbyterian Church of Albany against Thomas C. Cooper and another, administrators of Thomas P. Crook, deceased, on a subscription made by the decedent towards paying off a mortgage debt owing by the plaintiff. Judgment was given for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

ANDREWS, J. It is, we think, an insuperable objection to the maintenance of this action that there was no valid consideration to uphold the subscription of the defendants' intestate. It is of course unquestionable that no action can be maintained to enforce a gratuitous promise, however worthy the object intended to be promoted. The performance of such a promise rests wholly on the will of the person making it. He can refuse to perform, and his legal right to do so cannot be disputed, although his refusal may disappoint reasonable expectations, or may not be justified in the forum of conscience.

By the terms of the subscription paper the subscribers promise and [26] Subscriptions for a charitable purpose have been enforced in very many cases. Action toward carrying out the purpose and in reliance on the subscription is the fact that is most commonly approved as a consideration. Keuka College v. Ray, 167 N. Y. 96, 60 N. E. 325 (1901), other subscriptions obtained in reliance; De Pauw University v. Ankeny, 97 Wash. 451, 166 Pac. 1148 (1917); Young Men's Christian Ass'n of Wenatchee v. Olds Co., 84 Wash. 630, 147 Pac. 406, L. R. A. 1917F, 1132 (1915); Brokaw v. McElroy, 162 Iowa, 288, 143 N. W. 1087, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 835 (1913); Beatty's Estate v. Western College of Toledo, Iowa, 177 Ill. 280, 52 N. E. 432, 42 L. R. A. 797, 69 Am. St. Rep. 242 (1898); Albert Lea College v. Brown, 88 Minn. 524, 93 N. W. 672, 60 L. R. A. 870 (1903); Hodges v. Nalty, 104 Wis. 464, 80 N. W. 726 (1899); Irwin v. Lombard University, 56 Ohio St. 9, 46 N. E. 63, 36 L. R. A. 239, 60 Am. St. Rep. 727 (1897); Rogers v. Galloway Female College, 64 Ark. 627, 44 S. W. 454, 39 L. R. A. 636 (1898).

Some cases hold that one subscription is sufficient consideration for another, creating an enforceable right in the beneficiary. In re Leigh's Estate (Iowa) 173 N. W. 143 (1919). In re Converse's Estate, 240 Pa. 458, 87 Atl. 849 (1913); Higert v. Trustees of Indiana Asbury University, 53 Ind. 326 (1876); Christian College v. Hendley, 49 Cal. 347 (1874).

In some cases the court has found an implied promise by the trustees of the charity to execute the work contemplated, such promise operating as a consideration. Trustees of Maine Cent. Inst. v. Haskell, 73 Me. 140 (1882); Collier v. Baptist Education Soc., 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 68 (1847); In re Helfenstein's Estate, 77 Pa. 328, 18 Am. Rep. 449 (1875); Superior Consolidated Land Co. v. Bickford, 93 Wis. 220, 67 N. W. 45 (1896); Martin v. Meles, 179 Mass. 114, 60 N. E. 397 (1901).

In England charitable subscriptions are generally not enforceable. In re Hudson, 54 L. J. Ch. 811 (1885). There are cases in the United States holding likewise. See note in 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 783.

agree to and with the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Albany to pay to said trustees within three years from its date the sums severally subscribed by them, for the purpose of paying off "the mortgage debt of $45,000 on the church edifice," upon the condition that the whole sum shall be subscribed or paid in within one year. It recites a consideration, viz.: "In consideration of one dollar to each of us (subscribers) in hand paid, and the agreement of each other in this contract contained." It was shown that the one dollar recited to have been paid was not in fact paid, and the fact that the promise of each subscriber was made by reason of and in reliance upon similar promises by the others, constitutes no consideration as between the corporation for whose benefit the promise was made and the promisors. The recital of a consideration paid does not preclude the promisor from disputing the fact in a case like this, nor does the statement of a particular consideration, which on its face is insufficient to support a promise, give it any validity, although the fact recited may be true. It has sometimes been supposed that when several persons promise to contribute to a common object desired by all, the promise of each may be a good consideration for the promise of others, and this although the object in view is one in which the promisors have no pecuniary or legal interest, and the performance of the promise would not in a legal sense be beneficial to the promisors entering into the engagement. This seems to have been the view of the chancellor, as expressed in the Hamilton College Case, when it was before the court of errors, (2 Denio, 417;) and dicta of the judges will be found to the same effect in other cases. Trustees v. Stetson, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 508; Watkins v. Eames, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 537. But the doctrine of the chancellor, as we understand, was repudiated when the Hamilton College Case came before this court, (1 N. Y. 581), as have been also the dicta in the Massachusetts cases, by the court in that state, in the recent case of Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 23 Am. Rep. 286. The doctrine seems to us unsound in principle. It proceeds on the assumption that a stranger both to the consideration and the promise, and whose only relation to the transaction is that of donee of an executory gift, may sue to enforce the payment of the gratuity for the reason that there has been a breach of contract between the several promisors, and a failure to carry out, as between themselves, their mutual engagement. It is in no proper sense a case of mutual promises as between the plaintiff and defendant. If any action would lie at all, it would be one between the promisors for breach of contract.

In the disposition, therefore, of this case, we must reject the consideration recited in the subscription paper as ground for supporting the promise of the defendants' intestate,—the money consideration,—because it had no basis in fact, and the mutual promise between the subscribers, because, as to their promises there is no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the promisors. Some consideration must therefore be found other than that expressly stated in the subscription paper in order to sustain the action. It is urged that a consideration may be found in the efforts of the trustees of the plaintiff during the year, and the time and labor expended by them during that time, to secure subscriptions in order to fulfill the condition upon which the liability of the subscribers depended. There is no doubt that labor and services rendered by one party at the request of another would constitute a good consideration for a promise made by the latter to the former, based on the rendition of the service. But the plaintiff encounters the difficulty that there is no evidence, express or implied, on the face of the subscription paper, nor any evidence outside of it, that the corporation or its trustees did, or undertook to do, anything upon the invitation or request of the subscribers. Nor is there any evidence that the trustees of the plaintiff, as representatives of the corporation, in fact did anything in their corporate capacity, or otherwise than as individuals interested in promoting the general object in view. Leaving out of the subscription paper the affirmative statement of the consideration, (which for reasons stated may be rejected,) it stands as a naked promise of the subscribers to pay the several amounts subscribed by them for the purpose of paying the mortgage on the church property, upon a condition precedent limiting their liability.

Neither the church nor the trustees promise to do anything, nor are they requested to do anything, nor can such a request be implied. It was held in the Hamilton College Case, 1 N. Y. 581, that no such request could be implied from the terms of the subscription in that case, in which the ground for such an implication was, to say the least, as strong as in this case. It may be assumed from the fact that the subscriptions were to be paid to the trustees of the church for the purpose of paying the mortgage that it was understood that the trustees were to make the payment out of the moneys received. But the duty to make such payment in case they accepted the money, would arise out of their duty as trustees. This duty would arise upon the receipt of the money, although they had no antecedent knowledge of the subscription. They did not assume even this obligation by the terms of the subscription, and the fact that the trustees applied money paid on subscriptions upon the mortgage debt did not constitute a consideration for the promise of the defendants' intestate.

We are unable to distinguish this case in principle from the Hamilton College Case, 1 N. Y. 581. There is nothing that can be urged to sustain this subscription that could not with equal force have been urged to sustain the subscription in that case. In both the promise was to the trustees of the respective corporations. In each case the defendant had paid part of his subscription, and resisted the balance. In both part of the subscription had been collected and applied by the trustees to the purpose specified. In the Hamilton College Case, (which in that respect is unlike the present one,) it appeared that the trustees had incurred expense in employing agents to procure subscriptions to make up the required amount, and it was shown also that professors had been employed upon the strength of the fund subscribed. The Hamilton College Case is a controlling authority in this case. It has not been overruled, and has been frequently cited with approval in the courts of this and other states.

The cases of Barnes v. Perine, 12 N. Y. 18, and Roberts v. Cobb, 103 N. Y. 600, 9 N. E. 500, are not in conflict with the decision in the Hamilton College Case. There is, we suppose, no doubt that a subscription invalid at the time for want of consideration may be made valid and binding by a consideration arising subsequently between the subscribers and the church or corporation for whose benefit it is made. Both of the cases cited, as we understand them, were supported on this principle. There was, as was held by the court in each of these cases, a subsequent request by the subscriber to the promisee to go on and render service, or incur liabilities, on the faith of the subscription, which request was complied with, and services were rendered or liabilities incurred pursuant thereto. It was as if the request was made at the very time of the subscription, followed by performance of the request by the promisor. Judge Allen, in his opinion in Barnes v. Perine, said "the request and promise were to every legal effect simultaneous;" and he expressly disclaims any intention to interfere with the decision in the Hamilton College Case.

In the present case it was shown that individual trustees were active in procuring subscriptions. But, as has been said, they acted as individuals, and not in their official capacity. They were deeply interested, as was Mr. Crook, in the success of the effort to pay the debt on the church, and they acted in unison. But what the trustees did was not prompted by any request from Mr. Crook. They were all co-laborers in promoting a common object. We can but regret that the intention of the intestate in respect to a matter in which he was deeply interested, and whose interest was manifested up to the very time of his death, is to be thwarted by the conclusion we have reached; but we think there is no alternative, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

All concur.

HOLMES, C. J. This is an action to recover the contribution promised by the following paper, which was signed by the defendants and others:—"January 21, 1896. We, the undersigned manufacturers of leather, promise to contribute the sum of five hundred (500) dollars each, and such additional sums as a committee appointed by the Massachusetts Morocco Manufacturers Association may require; in no case shall the Committee demand from any manufacturer or firm a total of subscriptions to exceed the sum of two thousand (2,000) dollars, such sum to be employed for legal and other expenses, under the direction of the Committee, in depending and protecting our interests against any demands or suits growing out of Letters Patent for Chrome Tanning, and in case of suit against any of us, the Committee shall take charge thereof and apply as much of the fund as may be needed to the expense of the same."

The plaintiffs are the committee referred to in the agreement, and subscribers to it. They were appointed and did some work before the date of the agreement, and then prepared the agreement which was signed by nine members of the association mentioned, and by the defendants who were not members. They went on with their work, undertook the defence of suits, and levied assessments which were paid, the defendants having paid $750. In November, 1896, the defendants' firm was dissolved, and two members of it, Meles and Auerbach, ceased tanning leather. The defendants notified the plaintiffs of the dissolution, and on June 23, 1897, upon demand for the rest of their subscription refused to pay the same. The main questions insisted upon, raised by demurrer and by various exceptions, are whether the defendants' promise is to be regarded as entire and as supported by a sufficient consideration.

It will be observed that this is not a subscription to a charity. It is a business agreement for purposes in which the parties had a common interest, and in which the defendants still had an interest after going out of business, as they still were liable to be sued. It contemplates the undertaking of active and more or less arduous duties by the committee, and the making of expenditures and incurring of liabilities on the faith of it. The committee by signing the agreement promised by implication not only to accept the subscribers' money but to perform those duties. It is a mistaken construction to say that their promise, or indeed their obligation, arose only as the promise of the subscribers was performed by payments of money.

If then the committee's promise should be regarded as the consideration, as in Institute v. French, 16 Gray, 196, 201 (see Institute v. Haskell, 71 Me. 487), its sufficiency hardly would be open to the objection which has been urged against the doctrine of that case, that the promise of trustees to apply the funds received for a mere benevolence to the purposes of the trust imposes no new burden upon them. Johnson v. University, 41 Ohio St. 527, 531. See Presbyterian Church v. Cooper, 112 N. Y. 517, 20 N. E. 352, 3 L. R. A. 468, 8 Am. St. Rep. 767. Neither would it raise the question whether the promise to receive a gift was a consideration for a promise to make one. The most serious doubt is whether the promise of the committee purports to be the consideration for the subscriptions by a true interpretation of the contract.

In the later Massachusetts cases more weight has been laid on the incurring of other liabilities and making expenditures on the faith of the defendant's promise than on the counter-promise of the plaintiff. Cottage St. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 23 Am. Rep. 286; Sherwin v. Fletcher, 168 Mass. 413, 47 N. E. 197. Of course the mere fact that a promisee relies upon a promise made without other consideration does not impart validity to what before was void. Bragg v. Danielson, 141 Mass. 195, 196, 4 N. E. 622. There must be some ground for saying that the acts done in reliance upon the promise were contemplated by the form of the transaction either impliedly or in terms as the conventional inducement, motive and equivalent for the promise. But courts have gone very great lengths in discovering the implication of such an equivalence, sometimes perhaps even having found it in matters which would seem to be no more than conditions or natural consequences of the promise. There is the strongest reason for interpreting a business agreement in the sense which will give it a legal support, and such agreements have been so interpreted. Sherwin v. Fletcher, ubi supra.

What we have said justifies, in our opinion, the finding of a consideration either in the promise or in the subsequent acts of the committee, and it may be questioned whether a nicer interpretation of the contract for the purpose of deciding which of the two was the true one is necessary. It is true that it is urged that the acts of the committee would have been done whether the defendants had promised or not, and therefore lose their competence as consideration because they cannot be said to have been done in reliance upon the promise. But that is a speculation upon which courts do not enter. When an act has been done, to the knowledge of another party, which purports expressly to invite certain conduct on his part, and that conduct on his part follows, it is only under exceptional and peculiar circumstances that it will be inquired how far the act in truth was the motive for the conduct, whether in case of consideration,—Williams v. Carwardine, 4 Barn. & Adol. 621 (see Institute v. Haskell, 71 Me. 487),—or of fraud. Windram v. French, 151 Mass. 547, 553, 24 N. E. 914, 8 L. R. A. 750. In Cottage St. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 23 Am. Rep. 286, the form of the finding in terms excluded subsequent acts as consideration, and therefore it did not appear whether the facts were such that reliance upon the promise would be presumed. In Academy v. Gilbert, 2 Pick. 579, 13 Am. Dec. 457, the point was that merely signing a subscription paper without more did not invite expenditure on the faith of it. See Academy v. Cowls, 6 Pick. 427, 438, 17 Am. Dec. 387; Ives v. Sterling, 6 Metc. 310, 316. In this case the paper indisputably invited the committee to proceed.

A more serious difficulty if the acts are the consideration is that it seems to lead to the dilemma that either all acts to be done by the committee must be accomplished before the consideration is furnished, or else that the defendant's promise is to be taken distributively and divided up into distinct promises to pay successive sums as successive steps of the committee may make further payments necessary and may furnish consideration for requiring them. The last view is artificial and may be laid on one side. In the most noticeable cases where a man has been held entitled to stop before he has finished his payments, the ground has not been the divisibility of his undertaking but the absence of consideration, which required the court to leave things where it found them. In re Hudson, 54 Law J. Ch. 811; Presbyterian Church v. Cooper, 112 N. Y. 517, 20 N. E. 352, 3 L. R. A. 468, 8 Am. St. Rep. 767. As against the former view, if necessary, we should assume that the first substantial act done by the committee was all that was required in the way of acts to found the defendants' obligation. See Academy v. Cowls, 6 Pick. 427, 438, 17 Am. Dec. 387. But if that were true, it would follow that as to the future conduct of the committee their promise not their performance was the consideration, and when we have got as far as that, it may be doubted whether it is not simpler and more reasonable to set the defendants' promise against the plaintiffs' promise alone. We are inclined to this view, but do not deem a more definitive decision necessary, as we are clearly of opinion that, one way or the other, the defendants must pay.

What has been said pretty nearly disposes of a subordinate point raised by the defendants. It is argued that, by notice pending performance that they would not go on with the contract, the defendants, even if they incurred a liability to damages, put an end to the right of the plaintiffs to go on and to recover further assessments, as in the case where an order for work is countermanded at the moment when performance is about to begin under the contract,—Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 300, 50 N. W. 836, 16 L. R. A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 783,—or when at a later moment the plaintiff was directed to stop. Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 317, 43 Am. Dec. 670, followed by many later cases in this country. See Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159, 162. We assume that these decisions are right in cases where the continuance of work by the plaintiff would be merely a useless enhancement of damages. But we are of opinion that they do not apply. In the first place, it does not appear that such a notice was given. The first definite notice and the first breach was a refusal to pay on demand. At that time the liability was fixed, and the damages were the sum demanded.

In the next place if a definite notice had been given by the defendants in advance that they would not pay, whatever rights it might have given the plaintiffs at their election (Ballou v. Billings, 136 Mass. 307), it would not have been a breach of the contract (Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530, 19 Am. Rep. 384), and it would not have ended the right of the plaintiffs to go on under the contract in a case like the present, where there was a common interest in the performance, and where what had been done and what remained to do probably were to a large extent interdependent (Davis v. Campbell, 93 Iowa, 524, 61 N. W. 1053; Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499, 53 N. W. 756, 22 L. R. A. 80; Cravens v. Mills Co., 120 Ind. 6, 21 N. E. 981, 16 Am. St. Rep.

298). See Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, 112; Johnstone v. Milling, 16 Q. B. Div. 460, 470, 473; Dalrymple v. Scott, 19 Ont. App. 477; John A. Roebling's Sons' Co. v. Lock-Stitch Fence Co., 130 Ill. 660, 22 N. E. 518; Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 300, 303, 50 N. W. 836, 16 L. R. A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 783.

Before leaving the case it is interesting to remark that the notion rightly exploded in Cottage St. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 530, 531, 23 Am. Rep. 286, that the subscription of others than the plaintiff may be a consideration, seems to have remained unquestioned with regard to agreements of creditors to accept a composition. Compare the remarks of Wells, J., in Perkins v. Lockwood, 100 Mass. 249, 250, 1 Am. Rep. 103 (Farrington v. Hodgdon, 119 Mass. 453, 457; Trecy v. Jefts, 149 Mass. 211, 212, 21 N. E. 360; Emerson v. Gerber, 178 Mass. 130, 59 N. E. 666), with what he says in Music Hall Co. v. Carey, 116 Mass. 471, 474.

It is not argued that whatever contract was made was not made with the plaintiffs. Sherwin v. Fletcher, 168 Mass. 413, 47 N. E. 197.

SECTION 3.—FORBEARANCE AS CONSIDERATION

(Compromise Agreements)

HAMER v. SIDWAY.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1891. 124 N. Y. 538, 27 N. E. 256, 12 L. R. A. 463, 21 Am. St. Rep. 693.)

Appeal from an order of the general term of the supreme court in the fourth judicial department, reversing a judgment entered on the decision of the court at special term in the county clerk's office of Chemung county on the 1st day of October, 1889. The plaintiff presented a claim to the executor of William E. Story, Sr., for $5,000 and interest from the 6th day of February, 1875. She acquired it through several mesne assignments from William E. Story, 2d. The claim being rejected by the executor, this action was brought. It appears that William E. Story, Sr., was the uncle of William E. Story, 2d; that at the celebration of the golden wedding of Samuel Story and wife, father and mother of William E. Story, Sr., on the 20th day of March, 1869, in the presence of the family and invited guests, he promised his nephew that if he would refrain from drinking, using tobacco, swearing, and playing cards or billiards for money until he became 21 years of age, he would pay him the sum of $5,000. The nephew assented thereto, and fully performed the conditions inducing the promise. When the nephew arrived at the age of 21 years, and on the 31st day of January, 1875, he wrote to his uncle, informing him that he had performed his part of the agreement, and had thereby become entitled to the sum of $5,000.

The uncle received the letter, and a few days later, and on the 6th day of February, he wrote and mailed to his nephew the following letter: "Buffalo, Feb. 6, 1875. W. E. Story, Jr.—Dear Nephew: Your letter of the 31st ult. came to hand all right, saying that you had lived up to the promise made to me several years ago. I have no doubt but you have, for which you shall have five thousand dollars, as I promised you. I had the money in the bank the day you was twenty-one years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain. Now, Willie, I do not intend to interfere with this money in any way till I think you are capable of taking care of it, and the sooner that time comes the better it will please me. I would hate very much to have you start out in some adventure that you thought all right and lose this money in one year. The first five thousand dollars that I got together cost me a heap of hard work. * * * This money you have earned much easier than I did, besides, acquiring good habits at the same time, and you are quite welcome to the money. Hope you will make good use of it. I was ten long years getting this together after I was your age. * * * Truly yours, W. E. Story. P. S. You can consider this money on interest."

The nephew received the letter, and thereafter consented that the money should remain with his uncle in accordance with the terms and conditions of the letter. The uncle died on the 29th day of January, 1887, without having paid over to his nephew any portion of the said $5,000 and interest.[28]

PARKER, J. * * * The defendant contends that the contract was without consideration to support it, and therefore invalid. He asserts that the promisee, by refraining from the use of liquor and tobacco, was not harmed, but benefited; that that which he did was best for him to do, independently of his uncle's promise,—and insists that it follows that, unless the promisor was benefited, the contract was without consideration,—a contention which, if well founded, would seem to leave open for controversy in many cases whether that which the promisee did or omitted to do was in fact of such benefit to him as to leave no consideration to support the enforcement of the promisor's agreement. Such a rule could not be tolerated, and is without foundation in the law. The Exchequer Chamber in 1875 defined "consideration" as follows: "A valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to the one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other." Courts "will not ask whether the thing which forms the consideration does in fact benefit the promisee or a third party, or is of any substantial value to any one. It is enough that something is promised, done, forborne, or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made as consideration for the promise made to him." Anson, Cont. 63. "In general a waiver of any legal right at the request of another party is a sufficient consideration for a promise." Pars. Cont. *444. "Any damage, or suspension, or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise." 2 Kent, Comm. (12th Ed.) *465. Pollock in his work on Contracts, (page 166,) after citing the definition given by the Exchequer Chamber, already quoted, says: "The second branch of this judicial description is really the most important one. 'Consideration' means not so much that one party is profiting as that the other abandons some legal right in the present, or limits his legal freedom of action in the future, as an inducement for the promise of the first."

Now, applying this rule to the facts before us, the promisee used tobacco, occasionally drank liquor, and he had a legal right to do so. That right he abandoned for a period of years upon the strength of the promise of the testator that for such forbearance he would give him $5,000. We need not speculate on the effort which may have been required to give up the use of those stimulants. It is sufficient that he restricted his lawful freedom of action within certain prescribed limits upon the faith of his uncle's agreement, and now, having fully performed the conditions imposed, it is of no moment whether such performance actually proved a benefit to the promisor, and the court will not inquire into it; but, were it a proper subject of inquiry, we see nothing in this record that would permit a determination that the uncle was not benefited in a legal sense. Few cases have been found which may be said to be precisely in point, but such as have been, support the position we have taken. * * *

Order appealed from reversed, and judgment of the special term affirmed.[29]

(Appellate Court of Illinois, 1913. 181 Ill. App. 148.)

Mr. Justice PHILBRICK delivered the opinion of the court.

Mina M. Orr, appellee, was married to one Fred W. Orr, on June 5, 1909. Prior to the time of his marriage to appellee, Fred W. Orr held a benefit certificate in the Modern Woodmen of America in the sum of $2,000. One child, Carol W. Orr, was born of this marriage. Fred W. Orr died on August 17, 1910, intestate, at his father's house where he had been sick for several weeks, leaving surviving him ap-pellee and his son, Carol W. Orr. Appellee and her child were dependent upon the father and husband for their support. The father, John W. Orr, was the beneficiary named in this policy at the time of the death of Fred W. Orr, and after his death, proper proofs having been made, the amount of the policy was paid to John W. Orr.

Appellee contends that prior to the death of her husband, it had been her desire that the beneficiary in the said benefit certificate be changed so that she would become the beneficiary. After Fred W. Orr was taken sick and while at his father's house, appellee insists that she and John W. Orr, the father, talked over and discussed the question of the change in the name of the beneficiary in this certificate from John W. Orr, the father, to appellee. That she made known to John W. Orr, her intention to go to her husband while he was sick at the home of John W. Orr and have him surrender the old certificate and to cause to be issued in lieu thereof another benefit certificate in which appellee should be named as beneficiary, so that upon the death of her husband appellee would receive this money. Appellee insists that when her intention of going to her husband for this purpose was made known to John W. Orr that he demurred to her going to his son with this request; fearing that a request of this kind at a time when Fred W. Orr was sick and not expected to recover would result fatally to him; the said John W. Orr promised and agreed with appellee herein that if she would refrain from going to Fred W. Orr who was then dangerously ill, and not worry or bother him concerning the change of beneficiaries that he would hold the policy for the benefit of her and the child, and that he, fearing that if the husband was worried about a change in the beneficiary that the result to the said Fred W. Orr, who was dangerously ill and suffering from a weak heart, might hasten his death and result fatally to him; and that the said John W. Orr then and there promised and agreed to and with appellee that if she would refrain from approaching Fred W. Orr upon this subject that he would guarantee to her and see that she and her child received the benefit of this certificate; and that if his son did not recover from that sickness he would collect the same and hold it for the benefit of her and the child; and that, relying upon the promises of the said John W. Orr, she did refrain and forbear from going to her husband with a request that the beneficiary be changed.

John W. Orr collected the insurance and claims to own and hold the same for his own use and benefit. The suit was originally commenced by appellee as administratrix. Before final judgment, the child died, and thereupon appellee was granted leave and amended the cause of action so as to prosecute the cause in her own name. The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment against appellant, from which he appeals.

Appellant contends this judgment is erroneous and should be reversed, insisting that the evidence does not sustain the allegations of the declaration regarding the promise alleged to have been made by appellant to appellee; also, that, conceding that the promise was made, there was no consideration therefor for the reason that she had no power even though she did request her husband to change this policy, to compel him to do so; further, that it was a mere speculation on her part whether or not he would make the change at her request; that the court erred in permitting appellee to amend and prosecute the cause in her own name.

The child died soon after the death of the father, and if appellant made a promise that he would collect the money and pay it over to appellee for the benefit of herself and child, after the death of the child appellee would be entitled to receive the entire amount.

We are satisfied from the testimony of the various witnesses that the contention of appellee that appellant made the promise alleged to have been made to her is fully sustained, and that the verdict of the jury is not contrary to the evidénec and that it cannot be set aside on the ground that there is no evidence to support it.

Appellee had the right to request her husband to make the change of beneficiary in this policy before his death, and secure the benefit of the certificate for herself and child if it was possible for her to do so. The policy was taken out by the deceased before his marriage to appellee and the father then made beneficiary; after appellee and his only child became the natural objects of his bounty, it would only be natural that he should change the beneficiary during his last illness so that they would derive the benefit therefrom, unless some urgent reasons for his not so doing are shown. Appellee at least had the right to go to him and urge this, with such persuasion as she might bring to bear upon him for that purpose. And the father, knowing the condition of his son and desiring that he should recover from his illness, undoubtedly desired to do everything in his power to prevent anything which might worry or aggravate the condition of his son, and to avoid any serious consequence to him by reason of the importunities that the wife might make, promised appellee that if she would refrain from exercising her right in endeavoring to secure a change of beneficiary in this policy and would allow the policy to stand as it was that she and the child should receive the benefits of it, and that he would collect the same and pay it to her.

It is well established that a promise or agreement carried out or completed which deprives the party of any substantial right, when done at the request of another, is a sufficient consideration to sustain the promise by the other party for the fulfillment and enforcement of the agreement then made by him, that one promise is a sufficient consideration for another, and the question of the adequacy of the consideration or the inequality of the consideration is wholly immaterial. And it is wholly immaterial on the question of the consideration for this promise whether or not appellee would have been able to have secured the change in the beneficiary which she desired, it was a valuable consideration, if by acceding to the demands or request of appellant she waived and abandoned a right she then had of endeavoring to persuade her husband to make the wife and child beneficiaries under the policy.

In determining whether there was a valuable consideration for the making of this promise by defendant it is not necessary that there should have been any pecuniary benefit to appellant, if there was a valuable consideration, however small it might have been, then it was sufficient. Parsons on Cont. (6th Ed.) 443; Page on Cont. vol. 1, § 274; Talbott v. Stemmons' Ex'r, 89 Ky. 222, 12 S. W. 297, 5 L. R. A. 856, 25 Am. St. Rep. 531; Hamer v. Sidway, 124 N. Y. 538, 27 N. E. 256, 12 L. R. A. 463, notes, 21 Am. St. Rep. 693.

We are of the opinion that the agreement of appellee to refrain from going to her husband in his then condition with the request which she had the right to make and which she had the right to expect would be granted her, was sufficient consideration on her part to sustain the promise of appellant that in case the husband should not recover from that sickness appellant would collect the money and pay the same over to appellee for the benefit of herself and child.

There is no error in this record. The judgment is right and will be affirmed.

Affirmed.[30]

WHITE v. McMATH & JOHNSTON.

Action by McMath & Johnston against W. C. White. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and defendant petitions for a writ of certiorari. Denied.

WILLIAMS, J.[31] This suit was brought by McMath & Johnston against White to recover $240, and is before us on petition of certiorari to reverse the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, affirming the judgment of the circuit court of Shelby county in favor of plaintiffs in the last-named court.

McMath & Johnston were engaged in the business, in Memphis, of buying and selling real estate, and had entered into negotiations with the owners of a tract of land near Dundee, Miss., and had examined the land and obtained an offer from the owners to sell same to them at $17.50 per acre, and an acceptance was under consideration. White later made an examination of the tract, and endeavored to negotiate with its owners; but, in view of the offer then outstanding to McMath & Johnston, the owners of the land would not sell. White then went to the office of McMath & Johnston in an effort to get them out of the way. At his instance and for his benefit the following contract was entered into:

[30] Forbearance to make unwelcome visits and requests. Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29, 8 Pac. 614 (1885); Jamieson v. Renwick, 17 Vict. L. R. 124 (1891). Cf. White v. Bluett, 23 L. J. Ex. 36 (1853), forbearance of son to make complaints to his father held no consideration; "by the argument a principle is pressed to an absurdity, as a bubble is blown until it bursts."

"For a valuable consideration to me in hand paid by McMath & Johnston, receipt of which I hereby acknowledge, I hereby agree that I will purchase from Trotter & Dreyfus, owners, a certain tract of 480 acres of land near Dundee, Miss., and upon delivery to me by owners of satisfactory conveyance therefor I will pay said McMath & Johnston the sum of $240.

"It being expressly understood between the parties hereto that said McMath & Johnston have had said land offered to them by the owners at $17.50 per acre, and they are now considering the purchase of said land on their own account. The consideration for the payment of said sum is relinquishment by said McMath & Johnston of their right to purchase said land at said prices, and leaving me, W. C. White, free to conduct negotiations on my own account with said owners. Sale to any one else caused by me, or in my interest, shall be deemed a sale to me. We agree to perform the above contract [Signed] W. C. White. McMath & Johnston, Incorporated, by F. M. McMath, Pres."

The errors assigned disclose two defenses: (1) That the contract is void, because executed for the purpose of preventing competition, and is, therefore, against public policy;[32] (2) that the contract is not supported by a consideration. * * *

That the contract was supported by a sufficient consideration is held in the cases above cited. Withholding competition, when not opposed to public policy, is a binding consideration. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 746, and cases there cited; Spitz v. Bank, 8 Lea, 641; Bedford County v. Railroad, 14 Lea, 525.

The result of the decree of the Court of Civil Appeals being a correct one the writ of certiorari is denied.[33]

[32] The court held, citing several authorities, that the agreement was not illegal, there being no stifling of competition at a public or auction sale.

[33] Did the agreement destroy the plaintiffs' power of accepting the Dundee offer, or did it create merely a duty not to exercise such power of acceptance? Did it create a power in White to accept the Dundee offer?

The surrender of any legal power that one is privileged to exercise is a sufficient consideration, and so also is the forbearance to exercise such a power, even if it is not surrendered. Schade v. Muller, 75 Or. 225, 146 Pac. 144 (1915), power of filing mechanic's lien; Skinner v. Fisher, 120 Ark. 91, 178 S. W. 922 (1915); Bickel v. Wessinger, 58 Or. 98, 113 Pac. 34 (1911), forbearance to redeem property sold under mortgage foreclosure.

Forbearance to make an offer or bid, or the revocation of an offer already made, or the forbearance to accept an offer, is sufficient consideration. See Hughes v. Foltz, 142 Mo. App. 513, 127 S. W. 112 (1910); Rauch v. Donovan, 126 App. Div. 52, 110 N. Y. Supp. 690 (1908).

GILL v. HAREWOOD.

(In the Common Pleas, 1587. 1 Leon. 61.)

Gill brought an action upon the case against Harewood, and declared, that where the defendant was endebted to the plaintiff in such a sum, and shewed how; the defendant in consideration that the plaintiff, per parvum tempus deferret diem solutionis, &c. did promise to pay, &c. And upon non assumpsit pleaded it was found for the plaintiff, and it was moved in arrest of judgment, that here is not any consideration, for no time is limited for the forbearance, but generally, parvum tempus, which cannot be any commodity to the defendant, for the same may be, but punctum temporis, &c. But the exception was not allowed, for the debt in itself is a sufficient consideration.

MAPES v. SIDNEY.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1623. Cro. Jac. 683.)

Assumpsit; for that the defendant, in consideration the plaintiff would forbear to sue one J. S. on an obligation of eighty pounds, promised to pay to him the said debt; and alledgeth in fact, in the writ, that he forbore to sue the said J. S. per magnum tempus, and that the defendant had not as yet paid it to him, licet requisitus.

The declaration was, that he forbore him per magnum tempus, viz. from such a time of the promise until such a day, which was for a year and a half after the promise, yet he had not paid it.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and it was found against him to the damage of eighty pounds.

Hitcham moved in arrest of judgment.

Lord HOBART, WINCH, and HUTTON, (JONES being absent in Chancery) held, that the plaintiff should recover: for they all conceived that a consideration to forbear to sue a person for such a debt is a good consideration, and it shall be intended a total and absolute forbearance (as HUTTON and WINCH held); and that if the defendant paid it before upon this promise, and after the plaintiff sued for the debt, the plaintiff is chargeable in an action upon the case, for it is an implied promise in the plaintiff that he should forbear his suit totally; but yet when the plaintiff hath forborne a convenient time (when there is no time mentioned), if the defendant do not pay the debt according to his promise, the plaintiff may well sue him upon his promise, and he needs not tarry all his life. And here, when he shows that he forbore per magnum tempus, viz. such a day and year, that well agrees with the writ; and when the date of the writ doth not appear, it shall be intended that he did forbear until the day of the writ; and so the action is well brought.

HOBART, Chief Justice, agreed with them, that the action was well brought, and the declaration good, because he shews he did forbear it for a convenient time: and he held that he was not bound by this agreement to forbear totally; and denied, that upon this agreement he is chargeable in an assumpsit, if he (after this debt recovered from the defendant) should sue for the same debt; for it is not a promise to restrain him totally, and without express words he is not chargeable by promise. Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.[34]

DAVIES v. WARNER.

(In the King's Bench, 1620. Cro. Jac. 593.)

Assumpsit. Whereas the defendant's testator was indebted to him in thirty-three pounds; that in consideration the plaintiff would forbear to sue the defendant until he had execution upon such a judgment, the defendant promised to pay the said thirty-three pounds upon request, after he had obtained execution of such a judgment; and alledgeth in facto, that he had obtained execution of the said judgment: et licet requisitus, &c. such a day had not paid.

Upon non assumpsit pleaded, and found for the plaintiff, it was alledged in arrest of judgment, that it doth not appear how he was indebted, nor that he had assets, otherwise there is no cause to bind him.

Sed non allocatur; for if the action were founded upon the debt, then he ought to shew how he was indebted; but it is grounded upon his own promise; and it shall be intended he was indebted; otherwise he would not assume: wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.[35]

[34] The surrender and discharge of any legal right, or a forbearance to enforce it, even though it is not surrendered, is a sufficient consideration. This is true, even though the right is future and subject to an uncertain contingency. Release of "inchoate right of dower" by woman whose husband is still living. Fitcher v. Griffiths, 216 Mass. 174, 103 N. E. 471 (1913); Holmes v. Winchester, 133 Mass. 140 (1882); Beverlin v. Casto, 62 W. Va. 158, 57 S. E. 411 (1907).

Release from engagement to marry. Snell v. Bray, 56 Wis. 156, 14 N. W. 14 (1882); Henderson v. Spratlen, 44 Colo. 278, 98 Pac. 14, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 655 (1908).

A promise to forbear for a "reasonable time" is sufficient. Traders' Nat. Bank v. Parker, 130 N. Y. 415, 29 N. E. 1094 (1892). So also is actual forbearance for a "reasonable time." Oldershaw v. King, 2 H. & N. 399, 517 (1857).

Of course, the surrender of a privilege (or forbearance to exercise it) is a sufficient consideration. To surrender a privilege is to create a duty to some one. The doing of an act which creates a duty to a third person (e. g., giving a guaranty) is a sufficient consideration. Ziehm v. Frank Steil Brewing Co. of Baltimore City, 131 Md. 582, 102 Atl. 1005 (1917).

[35] In accord: Austin v. Bewley, Cro. Jac. 548 (1619); Linghill v. Broughton, Moore, K. B. 853 (1617).

"If an executor promiseth to a creditor that if he will forbear to sue him until such a time that then he will satisfy the creditor his debt, in that case the executor is liable to pay the debt of his own goods; adjudged." Escrig's Case, 4 Leon. 3 (1589).

DOWDENAY v. OLAND.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1599. Cro. Eliz. 768.)

Error of a judgment in the Common Pleas, in Trinity term, 40 Eliz. Roll 2716. Assumpsit, whereas he was obliged to the defendant by an obligation in £40 for the payment of £20 at a day mentioned in the condition; and whereas the plaintiff intending to exhibit a bill in the Chancery against the defendant pro eo, that he confessed that he was satisfied of the debt, took forth a writ of subpœna out of Chancery, returnable at a day certain; that the defendant, in consideration the plaintiff would desist from his suit in the Chancery, assumed to the plaintiff to restore that bond upon request: and alledgeth in fact, that he required the redelivery of that bond, and his desisting from the said suit; and that the defendant had not delivered it, but prosecuted suit thereupon, &c. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and found against him. And after divers motions in the Common Pleas in stay of judgment, because the consideration is not sufficient, being only to stay a suit in Chancery, which is matter of conscience, and not at the common law, it was held to be good enough, and adjudged for the plaintiff.—And now error being brought, the judgment was affirmed.

RIVETT and RIVETT'S CASE.

(In the King's Bench, 1588. 1 Leon. 118.)

Edmund Rivett brought an action upon the case against George Rivett, and declared, that where it was pretended by the defendant, that one R. made his will, and by the same devised certain legacies to the defendant, and the plaintiff upon that had sued in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury for to disprove the said will; and if he prosecutus fuisset, he might have disproved the said will and so defeated the defendant of his pretended legacies: the defendant in consideration that the plaintiff, ultra non procederet, did promise to give to the plaintiff one hundred pounds; and averred, that he had surceased his said suit; and further declared, that licet the defendant, ad hoc requisitus fuerit tali die & anno, &c. It was moved in arrest of judgment, that here is not any consideration, for the defendant hath not any means to compel the plaintiff for to surcease his suit, for there is not any cross promise set forth in the declaration; and although that he doth surcease his suit, yet he may begin the same again, and therefore the plaintiff ought to have shewed in his declaration a release or other discharge of it. Judgment was given for the plaintiff.[36] * * *

J. H. QUEAL & CO. v. PETERSON.

Action on a written instrument of guaranty. At the conclusion of the evidence there was a directed verdict for defendant, and from the judgment thereon plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McCLAIN, J. On April 8, 1896, one Nielson was indebted to plaintiff on a promissory note for $120 then past due, and defendant executed to plaintiff his promise to pay the same in the following words: "In regard to the N. S. Nielson note of $120 held by you and due September 1, 1895, if this note is not paid by said Nielson by October 1, 1896, I hereby agree to take it up October 1, 1896, for $100."

Action being brought against defendant on this obligation, nonpayment by Nielson of his note being alleged, defendant denied his liability on the ground that his obligation was entered into without any consideration, and the evidence showed that, while defendant did voluntarily undertake to satisfy Nielson's obligation for $120, with interest, by paying $100 at a future date, provided Nielson's note then remained unpaid, there is no evidence that defendant requested plaintiffs to forbear suit on the Neilson note, or that plaintiffs agreed to forbear such suit, or that plaintiffs did forbear in reliance on defendant's guaranty. An agreement to forbear for a time the enforcement of a claim is a valid consideration for the promise of a third person to pay. Burke v. Dillin, 92 Iowa, 557, 564, 61 N. W. 371; Rix v. Adams, 9 Vt. 233, 31 Am. Dec. 619. While it seems to have been thought at one time that the promise to forbear which would serve as consideration for a guaranty by a third person must be for a definite time, or for a reasonable time, nevertheless it has been held that, where there is an agreement to forbear, it will be presumed to be for a reasonable time in the absence of any stipulation as to a specified time. Strong v. Sheffield, 144 N. Y. 392, 39 N. E. 330; Sidwell v. Evans, 1 Pen. & W. (Pa.) 383, 21 Am. Dec. 387. If the creditor does in fact forbear from suing at the request of another, there is a good consideration for the guaranty of the indebtedness in connection with such request. Crears v. Hunter, 19 Q. B. D. 341.[37] But the mere fact of forbearance is not sufficient evidence from which a promise to forbear may be presumed, in the absence of any circumstances from which such agreement may be inferred. Manter v. Churchill, 127 Mass. 31.

[37] Forbearance to press a claim against A. is a sufficient consideration for a promise of B. to pay A.'s debt, if so agreed. Thayer v. Pray's Estate, 111 Minn. 449, 127 N. W. 392 (1910); Wells & Morris v. Brown, 67 Wash. 351, 121 Pac. 828, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 317 (1912); United & Globe Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Conard, 80 N. J. Law, 286, 78 Atl. 203, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 412 (1910), promise to forbear; Silver v. Graves, 210 Mass. 26, 95 N. E. 948 (1911); Waters v. White, 75 Conn. 88, 52 Atl. 401 (1902); Markel v. Di Francesco, 93 Conn. 355, 105 Atl. 703 (1919); Estate of Thomson, 165 Cal. 290, 131 Pac. 1045 (1913).

As the defendant did not request plaintiffs to forbear suit on the Nielson note, and plaintiffs did not agree to do so, the fact of forbearance does not indicate that it was in pursuance of a promise to forbear, nor does the forbearance itself imply a request. Had plaintiffs brought suit against Nielson immediately after the execution of defendant's obligation, Nielson could not have defended on the ground that there was an agreement of extension. Therefore plaintiffs, having remained without interruption entitled to all the rights which they had against Nielson, suffered no detriment in consequence of the guaranty given by defendant, and, on the other hand, neither Nielson nor defendant received any benefit in consequence of defendant's promise. It is clear that under such circumstances defendant's promise to pay Nielson's debt was without consideration.

Judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.[38]

Assumpsit on notes by E. E. Schroyer and others against Josiah V. Thompson and others. From an order refusing judgment for plaintiffs for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and record remitted to lower court, with directions to enter judgment against defendants, unless cause is shown.

FRAZER, J. Plaintiffs' action is founded on two demand notes signed by one defendant as principal and the others as sureties, and assigned by the payees to plaintiffs. The sureties each filed an affidavit of defense alleging release from liability, owing to a memorandum indorsed on the back of the notes, subsequent to their execution and without consent of the sureties, stating, "All overdue int. to bear int. to be compounded semiannually." A rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense was discharged, and plaintiffs appealed.

It is not denied the agreement to pay interest on interest is a material alteration affecting the sum payable for interest within the meaning of the 125th section of the Negotiable Instrument Act of May 16, 1901 (P. L. 194). Plaintiffs contend, however, the memorandum is without effect so far as the sureties are concerned, because not on the face of the instrument, and consequently not an alteration of its terms, but merely a separate agreement between maker and payee. Discussing or deciding this question is unnecessary since, under the view we take of the case, the decree of the court below must be reversed for a different reason.

[38] Is not forbearance in fact a detriment to the creditor and a benefit to the debtor, irrespective of any agreement? What caused the creditor to forbear in this case?
In accord: Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 18 Pac. 403 (1888).

A surety has a right to require strict performance of the contract, and an agreement between the principals varying its terms in a material part without the consent of the surety will release him from liability. Bensinger v. Wren, 100 Pa. 500; Nesbitt v. Turner, 155 Pa. 429, 26 Atl. 750; Robbins v. Robinson, 176 Pa. 341, 35 Atl. 337. It must be conceded that an agreement between the principals having the effect of altering the written terms of the contract must be based upon a sufficient consideration, that is, must be a valid and enforceable contract.

The affidavit of defense filed contained no averment of an extension of time for payment of interest, nor do they set up other facts capable of being construed as a consideration for the agreement to pay compound interest. No consideration appears in the memorandum unless it be an extension of the time for payment of interest implied by the recognition of nonpayment from time to time by reason of the provision that it should bear interest. Nothing is said specifically as to extension of time, or concerning an agreement not to enforce payment of interest for a definite or indefinite period. While forbearance to sue has always been recognized as an adequate consideration for a promise made in reliance thereon, there must be an agreement to that effect; mere forbearance without an agreement has been held not a good consideration, because of there being nothing to prevent the bringing of suit at any time. Clark v. Russel, 3 Watts, 213, 27 Am. Dec. 348; Sidwell v. Evans, 1 Pen. & W. 383, 21 Am. Dec. 387; Cobb v. Page, 17 Pa. 469; Saalfield v. Manrow, 165 Pa. 114, 30 Atl. 823. While it has been said that actual forbearance at the instance of a defendant may also be sufficient (Clark v. Russel, supra), yet, in such case, the burden is on the one relying thereon to show by clear and satisfactory proof that the request to forbear was, in fact, the inducing cause of the act of forbearance. Clark v. Russel, supra.

In the present case the court below, in discussing this question, stated there was an actual forbearance in the enforcement of the payment of interest for a period of nearly four years, and such forbearance was sufficient consideration for the agreement to pay compound interest. The difficulty with this view of the case is that the record fails to show the delay of four years in collecting the interest was pursuant to a request or promise made to the payee by the maker. Under the circumstances there was no valid agreement to pay compound interest, the sureties are not prejudiced, and there is nothing to effect their discharge from liability.

The judgment is reversed, and the record remitted to the court below, with directions to enter judgment against defendants for such sum as to right and justice may belong, unless other legal or equitable cause be shown to the court below why such judgment should not be entered.

ALLIANCE BANK v. BROOM.

(In the Court of Chancery, 1864. 2 Drew. & S. 289.)

This case came on upon a demurrer.

It appeared, from the bill, that in June, 1864, the Alliance Bank opened a loan account with the defendants, who are merchants at Liverpool, and that such loan account was continued down to September 19th, 1864, when there was a balance due from the defendants to the bank on such loan account to the amount of £22,205 15s. 1d.

On September 19th, 1864, the plaintiffs requested the defendants, Messrs. Broom, to give them some security for the amount so due, and the defendants, who stated that they were entitled to certain goods, wrote to the manager of the bank the following letter:

"Liverpool, September 19th, 1864.

"Dear Sir: We hand you the following particulars of produce, which we propose to hypothecate against our loan account, and at the same time undertake to pay the proceeds as we receive them, to the credit of the said account."

The letter then contained a list of goods and their values, and was signed by Messrs. Broom.

In pursuance of this letter the plaintiffs, on September 20th, 1864, applied to the defendants for the warrants for delivery of the goods mentioned in the letter, and the defendants promised to deliver the warrants to the plaintiffs as soon as they could obtain them from the warehouses.

The bill stated that the defendants refused to deliver the warrants, or other documents relating to the goods, to the plaintiffs, and threatened and intended to deliver them to other persons; and the bill charged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien or charge upon the goods mentioned in the letter by virtue of the agreement, and prayed for a declaration to that effect. The bill also prayed that the defendants might be ordered to deliver to the plaintiffs the warrants and other documents relating to the title of said goods, and cause the said goods to be delivered to the plaintiffs, by way of security for the amount due to them on the loan account. The bill also prayed an injunction to restrain the defendants from dealing with the warrants or goods in the mean time.

To this bill the defendants filed a demurrer, on the ground that the agreement contained in the letter was without consideration; and therefore one which the Court would not enforce.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR: The defendant demurs to the plaintiff's bill in this case, on the ground that the promise to give security, which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, was without any consideration—that it is, in fact, a nudum pactum, which the Court will not enforce; and in support of this proposition it is argued that the plaintiffs, so far from giving any consideration for the promise, could at any time have brought an action for the payment of the debt; and that they could have done so is perfectly true.

Now, according to the facts stated in the bill, a demand was made by the creditor for security; and upon that demand a promise and agreement was made by the debtor that he would give such security; and that, although it might take some time to get the warrants, he would hand them over to the creditor when he obtained them.

It appears to me, that when the plaintiffs demanded payment of their debt, and, in consequence of that application, the defendant agreed to give certain security, although there was no promise on the part of the plaintiffs to abstain for any certain time from suing for the debt, the effect was, that the plaintiffs did, in effect, give, and the defendant received, the benefit of some degree of forbearance; not, indeed, for any definite time, but, at all events, some extent of forbearance. If, on the application for security being made, the defendant had refused to give any security at all, the consequence certainly would have been that the creditor would have demanded payment of the debt, and have taken steps to enforce it. It is very true that, at any time after the promise, the creditor might have insisted on payment of his debt, and have brought an action; but the circumstances necessarily involve the benefit to the debtor of a certain amount of forbearance, which he would not have derived if he had not made the agreement.

On this ground the demurrer must be overruled.[39]

STRONG v. SHEFFIELD.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1895. 144 N. Y. 392, 39 N. E. 330.)

ANDREWS, C. J. The contract between a maker or endorser of a promissory note and the payee forms no exception to the general rule that a promise, not supported by a consideration, is nudum pactum. The law governing commercial paper which precludes an inquiry into the consideration as against bonâ fide holders for value before maturity, has no application where the suit is between the original parties to the instrument. It is undisputed that the demand note upon which the action was brought was made by the husband of the defendant and endorsed by her at his request and delivered to the plaintiff, the payee, as security for an antecedent debt owing by the husband to the plaintiff. The debt of the husband was past due at the time, and the only consideration for the wife's endorsement, which is or can be claimed, is that as part of the transaction there was an agreement by the plaintiff when the note was given to forbear the collection of the debt, or a request for forbearance, which was followed by forbearance for a period of about two years subsequent to the giving of the note. There is no doubt that an agreement by the creditor to forbear the collection of a debt presently due is a good consideration for an absolute or conditional promise of a third person to pay the debt, or for any obligation he may assume in respect thereto. Nor is it essential that the creditor should bind himself at the time to forbear collection or to give time. If he is requested by his debtor to extend the time, and a third person undertakes in consideration of forbearance being given to become liable as surety or otherwise, and the creditor does in fact forbear in reliance upon the undertaking, although he enters into no enforcible agreement to do so, his acquiescence in the request, and an actual forbearance in consequence thereof for a reasonable time, furnishes a good consideration for the collateral undertaking. In other words, a request followed by performance is sufficient, and mutual promises at the time are not essential, unless it was the understanding that the promisor was not to be bound, except on condition that the other party entered into an immediate and reciprocal obligation to do the thing requested. Morton v. Burn, 7 A. & E. 19; Wilby v. Elgee, L. R., 10 C. P. 497; King v. Upton, 4 Greenl. (Me.) 387, 16 Am. Dec. 266; Leake on Con., p. 54; Am. Lead. Cas., Vol. II., p. 96 et seq. and cases cited.[40] The general rule is clearly, and in the main accurately, stated in the note to Forth v. Stanton (1 Saund. 210, note b). The learned reporter says: "And in all cases of forbearance to sue, such forbearance must be either absolute or for a definite time, or for a reasonable time; forbearance for a little, or for some time, is not sufficient." The only qualification to be made is that in the absence of a specified time a reasonable time is held to be intended. Oldershaw v. King, 2 H. & N. 517; Calkins v. Chandler, 36 Mich. 320, 24 Am. Rep. 593. The note in question did not in law extend the payment of the debt. It was payable on demand, and although being payable with interest it was in form consistent with an intention that payment should not be immediately demanded, yet there was nothing on its face to prevent an immediate suit on the note against the maker or to recover the original debt. Merritt v. Todd, 23 N. Y. 28, 80 Am. Dec. 243; Shutts v. Fingar, 100 N. Y. 539, 3 N. E. 588, 53 Am. Rep. 231.

[39] See, in accord, In re All Star Feature Corp. (D. C.) 232 Fed. 1004 (1916), where Hand, J., said: "It is quite true that here there was no express reference to forbearance in the contract, and no statement that the lien was in exchange for it, but the situation reasonably implied that the parties so intended it." Schoening v. Maple Valley Lumber Co., 61 Wash. 332, 112 Pac. 381 (1910).

In the present case the agreement made is not left to inference, nor was it a case of request to forbear, followed by forbearance, in pursuance of the request, without any promise on the part of the creditor at the time. The plaintiff testified that there was an express agreement on his part to the effect that he would not pay the note away, nor put it in any bank for collection, but (using the words of the plaintiff) "I will hold it until such time as I want my money, I will make a demand on you for it." And again: "No, I will keep it until such time as I want it." Upon this alleged agreement the defendant endorsed the note. It would have been no violation of the plaintiff's promise if, immediately on receiving the note, he had commenced suit upon it. Such a suit would have been an assertion that he wanted the money and would have fulfilled the condition of forbearance. The debtor and the defendant, when they became parties to the note, may have had the hope or expectation that forbearance would follow, and there was forbearance in fact. But there was no agreement to forbear for a fixed time or for a reasonable time, but an agreement to forbear for such time as the plaintiff should elect. The consideration is to be tested by the agreement, and not by what was done under it. It was a case of mutual promises, and so intended. We think the evidence failed to disclose any consideration for the defendant's endorsement, and that the trial Court erred in refusing so to rule.

[40] In some cases it has been held that mere forbearance cannot be a consideration and that there must be a promise to forbear, wholly overlooking the possibility of a unilateral contract. See Manter v. Churchill, 127 Mass. 31 (1879); Shupe v. Galbraith, 32 Pa. 10 (1858); Lambert v. Clewley, 80 Me. 480, 15 Atl. 61 (1888); Smith v. Bibber, 82 Me. 34, 19 Atl. 89, 17 Am. St. Rep. 464 (1889). But see Moore v. McKenney, 83 Me. 80, 21 Atl. 749, 23 Am. St. Rep. 753 (1890).

The order of the General Term reversing the judgment should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed for the defendant on the stipulation with costs in all courts.

All concur, except GRAY and BARTLETT, JJ., not voting, and HAIGHT, J., not sitting.

Ordered accordingly.

BARNARD v. SIMONS.

(1617. 1 Roll. Abr. f. 26, pl. 39; 1 Vin. Abr. 312, pl. 39.)

If A. makes a void assumpsit to B., and then a third party comes to B. and promises to pay him £10 in consideration that B. will relinquish the assumpsit made to him by A., there is no valid consideration to charge him on the promise, because the first assumpsit was void.

LOYD v. LEE.

(At Nisi Prius, before Pratt, C. J., 1718. 1 Strange, 94.)

A married woman gives a promissory note as a feme sole; and after her husband's death, in consideration of forbearance, promises to pay it. And now in an action against her it was insisted that though she being under coverture at the time of giving the note, it was voidable for that reason; yet by her subsequent promise, when she was of ability to make a promise, she had made herself liable, and the forbearance was a new consideration. But the CHIEF JUSTICE held the contrary, and that the note was not barely voidable, but absolutely void; and forbearance, where originally there is no cause of action, is no consideration to raise an assumpsit. But he said it might be otherwise where the contract was but voidable. And so the plaintiff was called.

BIDWELL v. CATTON.

(In the King's Bench. 1618. Hobart, 216.)

Bidwell, an attorney, brought an action of the case against Catton, executor of Reve, and counted, that whereas he had in Michaelmas term 14 Jac. prosecuted an attachment of privilege against Reve the Testator, retornable in Hil. term, the testator knowing of it, in consideration that at his request, the plaintiff would forbear to prosecute the said writ any farther against the testator, the testator did promise to pay him fifty pounds, and then avers, &c. And after a verdict it was excepted in arrest of judgment.

First, that it was not alledged, that the plaintiff had any just cause of action.

Secondly, that this action still remains.

Thirdly, that this kind of action would not lie against an executor, because it is not in the nature of a debt.

But THE COURT nevertheless gave judgment: For first, suits are not presumed causeless, and the promise argues cause, in that he desired to stay off the suit. Quære, if the defendant had averred that there was no cause of suit.

Secondly, though this did not require a discharge of the action, yet it requires a loss of the writ, and a delay of the suit, which was both a benefit to the one, and a loss to the other.

Thirdly, it was agreed, that if the testator promise to build an house, or to do some such collateral act, that an assumpsit upon that will not lie against the executor. But the Court held an action of debt would well lie against the testator for the fifty shillings, being a sum of money due upon a contract in which he received quid pro quo; for the forbearing of a suit is as beneficial in saving, as some other things would have been in gaining. And 17 E. 4. If a man promise a chirurgeon money to cure a poor man, he shall have an action of debt for it.

WADE v. SIMEON.

(In the Common Pleas, 1846. 2 C. B. 548.)

Assumpsit.[41] The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff had brought a previous suit against the defendant in the court of Exchequer, to recover two sums amounting to £2,000; that issue was joined in said action, and trial set for December 7, 1844; that the defendant had notified the plaintiff that he would apply to the Chancery for an injunction; that thereupon, on the day before the day set for trial, in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear prosecuting and would stay all proceedings in the said action until December 14, 1844, the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would on that day pay the sum of £2,000 with interest and costs, and that the application for an injunction should be abandoned. The plaintiff averred that he had forborne to prosecute until December 14, and had stayed all proceedings, but the defendant had failed and refused to pay as agreed and had prevented the plaintiff from getting any judgment in the action that had been brought. * * *

[41] The statement has been condensed and concurring opinions are omitted.

Fourth plea,—to the first count,—that the plaintiff never had any cause of action against the defendant in respect to the subject-matter of the action in the Court of Exchequer in that count mentioned; which he the plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of the action, and thence until and at the time of the making of the promise in the said first count mentioned, well knew—Verification. * * *

Special demurrer to the fourth plea, * * *

The defendant joined in demurrer.

TINDAL, C. J. The only question now remaining is upon the demurrer to the fourth plea. I am of opinion that the fourth plea is a good and valid plea, on general demurrer. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff had commenced an action against the defendant in the Exchequer, to recover two sums of £1,300 and £700, respectively, which action was about to be tried, and that, in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear proceeding in that action, until the 14th of December then next, the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would on that day pay the money, with interest, and costs; that the plaintiff, confiding in the defendant's promise, forbore prosecuting the action, and stayed the proceedings until the day named; but that defendant did not pay the money or the costs. The fourth plea states that the plaintiff never had any cause of action against the defendant in respect of the subject-matter of the action in the Court of Exchequer, which he, the plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of the said action, and thence until the time of the making the promise in the first count mentioned, well knew. By demurring to that plea, the plaintiff admits that he had no cause of action against the defendant in the action therein mentioned, and that he knew it. It appears to me, therefore, that he is estopped from saying that there was any valid consideration for the defendant's promise. It is almost contra bonos mores, and certainly contrary to all the principles of natural justice, that a man should institute proceedings against another, when he is conscious that he has no good cause of action. In order to constitute a binding promise, the plaintiff must show a good consideration, somewhat beneficial to the defendant, or detrimental to the plaintiff. Detrimental to the plaintiff it cannot be, if he has no cause of action; and beneficial to the defendant it cannot be; for, in contemplation of law, the defence upon such an admitted state of facts must be successful, and the defendant will recover costs, which must be assumed to be a full compensation for all the legal damage he may sustain. The consideration, therefore, altogether fails. On the part of the plaintiff it has been urged that the cases cited for the defendant were not cases where actions had already been brought, but only cases of promises to forbear commencing proceedings. I must, however, confess that, if that were so, I do not see that it would make any substantial difference. The older cases, and some of the modern ones too, do not afford any countenance to that distinction. In Tooley v. Windham (Cro. Eliz. 206, more fully reported, 2 Leon. 105), it is stated that the plaintiff had purchased a writ out of Chancery against the defendant, to the intent to exhibit a bill against him; upon the return of the writ, which was for the profits of certain lands, which the father of the defendant had taken in his lifetime, the defendant, in consideration he would surcease his suit, promised to him, that, if he could prove that his father had taken the profits, or had the possession of the land under the title of the father of the plaintiff, he would pay him for the profits of the land: and the court held that the promise was without consideration, and void. There the suit was in existence at the time of the making of the promise. So, in Atkinson v. Settree (Willes, 482), an action had been commenced at the time the promise was made. These cases seem to me to establish the principle upon which our present judgment rests; and I am not aware that it is at all opposed by Longridge v. Dorville (5 B. & Ald. 117). It may be that the peculiar circumstances of that case took it out of the general rule. The ship was under detention by virtue of process from the Admiralty Court; the event of the suit in that court was uncertain; neither party could foresee the result; and therefore the relinquishment by the plaintiff of his hold upon the ship might well be a good consideration for the promise declared on. Here, however, there was no uncertainty: the defendant asserts, and the plaintiff admits, that there never was any cause of action in the original suit, and that the plaintiff knew it. I therefore think the fourth plea affords a very good answer, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment thereon.[42]

[42] In accord: Majors v. Majors, 92 Neb. 473, 138 N. W. 574 (1912); Nicholson v. Neary, 77 Wash. 294, 137 Pac. 492 (1914), forbearance to sue on a note void for lack of consideration; Osborne v. Fridrich, 134 Mo. App. 449, 114 S. W. 1045 (1908), on a note known to be void for usury.

SPRINGSTEAD et al. v. NEES et al.

(Supreme Court, Appellate Division, of New York, 1908. 125 App. Div. 230, 109 N. Y. Supp. 148.)

Action by Anna Springstead and others against George Nees and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

JENKS, J. This action was tried by stipulation as a common-law action before the court without a jury. The parties are all of the surviving children of Nees, deceased, who died intestate, leaving them his sole heirs at law. Nees died, the owner and seised of realty called the "Sackett Street Property" and the owner of realty, called the "Atlantic Avenue Property," which he held by deed to him as trustee for his children, Sophia and George. Shortly after Nees' death all of the parties, an attorney at law, and friends met in Nees' house. Nees' strong box was opened, and when the deed to the Atlantic avenue property was found therein the attorney handed it to Sophia, saying: "This is yours." The evidence for the plaintiffs is that they, or some of them, were surprised to learn that this deed was to their father in trust for two of the children; for theretofore they had believed that he was the owner and seised in fee. They expressed their surprise, and there were murmurings. Thereupon Sophia spoke up, saying, "We will give you our share in the Sackett street property if you don't bother us about the Atlantic avenue property," and George assented. The Sackett street property was sold thereafter. This action is brought by the other three children against Sophia and George, upon that alleged promise of Sophia and George, to recover their proportionate share of the proceeds of that sale. Sophia and George testified that no such promise ever was made. The learned court gave judgment for the defendants, dismissing the complaint, with costs.

After finding the preliminary facts, which were not disputed, the court found that the defendants, after the death of their father, were seised in fee simple of the Atlantic avenue property and held indefeasible title thereto; that the plaintiffs had no color of right in the Atlantic avenue property, and did not at any time threaten or attempt to assert any claim of right hostile to the defendants in that property; that there was no compromise, either wholly or partly executed, between the parties, affecting rights which the plaintiffs might have in that property; that the plaintiffs had given up no rights in that property, nor had they changed their position therein; and that a promise (referring to which I have heretofore described as shown by the testimony for the plaintiffs) made by the defendants to the plaintiffs that, if the plaintiffs "would not 'molest,' or 'bother,' or 'make a fuss' about, the defendants' rights on the Atlantic avenue property, the defendants would give the plaintiffs their share in the Sackett street property, if made, would have been without consideration." The plaintiffs appeal.

The record sustains the facts found. Assuming that such promise was made, I am of opinion that there was no consideration shown. In

"'A valuable consideration may consist of some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other.' 3 Am. & Eng. Cyclopedia of Law, 831; Currie v. Misa, L. R. 10 Ex. 162; Chitty on Cont. (9th Am. Ed.) 29; 2 Kent's Comm. 465. It is not essential that the person to whom the consideration moves should be benefited, provided the person from whom it moves is in a legal sense injured. The injury may consist of a compromise of a disputed claim or forbearance to exercise a legal right; the alteration in position being regarded as a detriment that forms a consideration independent of the actual value of the right forborne."

The consideration for the promise cannot be found in the fact that there was a compromise of a disputed claim, for there is no evidence thereof. It must rest, then, upon the forbearance to exercise a legal right. Forbearance to assert either a legal or an equitable claim is sufficient consideration, as we have seen. See. also, Wharton on Contracts, § 532, and authorities cited; Leake on Contracts (Randall's Ed.) 438; 1 Parsons on Contracts (15th Ed.) p. 441. It seems unnecessary to consider the conflict over the question whether forbearance as to a claim without foundation can constitute good consideration. See 1 Parsons on Contracts (8th Ed.) p. 441, note, discussing the various authorities. It seems to be the rule with us that it is not essential that the claim should be valid; but it is enough if it could be regarded as doubtful or colorable. In White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 515, the court cites the language of Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229: "It is not necessary that the party should have a right to hold, if he be doubtful whether he has a right to hold"—and of Mr. Chitty, when he describes a claim as "colorable." See Cox v. Stokes, 156 N. Y. 491–505, 51 N. E. 316; Zoebisch v. Von Minden, 120 N. Y. 406–419, 24 N. E. 795. But if the claim be not even doubtful, or colorable, or plausible, in that there is no reason for an honest belief that it has some foundation in law or in equity, then forbearance applied to it is not good consideration. Parsons in his final note (ut supra) says:

"In all jurisdictions it would be admitted that forbearance of a claim is no consideration, if the claimant knows his claim to be unfounded or conceals material facts relating thereto"—citing authorities.

Wharton on Contracts, § 532, says:

"The fact that the suit is not well founded makes no difference, if it has a show of title though it is otherwise in cases of fraud, and in cases where the claim to be forborne is utterly destitute of support."

See, too, Parsons, supra; Bishop on Contracts, § 63, and note; Wald's Pollock on Contracts, p. 214; Leake on Contracts, p. 439; Smith on Contracts (7th Ed.) p. 187, note 1.

In the case at bar the court, as I have said, found properly that the plaintiffs had no color of right in the Atlantic avenue property; nor did they at any time threaten or attempt to assert any claim. The evidence of the plaintiffs is that, when they were surprised to find that the deed to the Atlantic avenue property was in trust for but two of their number, thereupon and without any further reason, save that they expressed surprise and were dissatisfied, the defendants made the promise in question. The promise was not even in response to any suggestion of any possible claim then or thereafter against the deed, or despite it, or of any action adverse to it. There was no suggestion, then or at any time thereafter, made that the deed was invalid for any reason, or of any ground upon which it was open to attack. Indeed, I can discover no reason upon the evidence how any of the parties could seriously suppose that even a doubtful or a colorable claim could be asserted then or thereafter. It does not appear that anything was ever done, then or thereafter, in consequence of the alleged promise, or that the rights of the parties were in any way thereby changed or affected.

I think that the judgment must be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except HOOKER, J. (dissenting). The circumstances surrounding the opening of the strong box after decedent's death and the finding there of a deed running to the defendants, and the conversation then between the children, seem to me such as to present a situation where there was at least color of a valid claim by the plaintiffs, by reason of their heirship, to the Atlantic avenue property. One of these circumstances is that the strong box where the deed was found belonged to the decedent, and it might well be doubted whether there had ever been a delivery of the deed before the grantor's death, which was necessary to pass title. If such claim was open to be urged, there was consideration for the promise.

The judgment should be reversed.

COOK et al. v. WRIGHT.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1861. 1 Best & S. 559.)

Action on two promissory notes. The plaintiffs, as commissioners acting under the Whitechapel improvement act, had expended money in paving streets adjoining certain houses owned by one Mrs. Bennett, a nonresident. One of the houses was occupied by the defendant as tenant, and he acted as Mrs. Bennett's agent in collecting rents on the other houses and in paying taxes. The defendant informed the plaintiffs of these facts, and they nevertheless believed that the defendant was the person described in the improvement act as the owner against whom the charges for paving should be assessed. The defendant insisted that he was not bound to pay under the act; but when the plaintiffs threatened proceedings against him he induced the plaintiffs to reduce the amount of the charges and to give further time for payment, in return for his giving the notes now sued upon.

At the trial a verdict was entered for the defendant, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff. In pursuance of such leave, a rule to show cause was obtained on the ground that there was a sufficient consideration shown by the evidence and that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.[43]

BLACKBURN, J. In this case it appeared on the trial that the defendant was agent for a Mrs. Bennett, who was nonresident owner of houses in a district subject to a local act. Works had been done in the adjoining street by the commissioners for executing the act, the expenses of which, under the provisions of their act, they charged on the owners of the adjoining houses. Notice had been given to the defendant, as if he had himself been owner of the houses, calling on him to pay the proportion chargeable in respect of them. He attended at a board meeting of the commissioners, and objected both to the amount and nature of the charge, and also stated that he was not the owner of the houses, and that Mrs. Bennett was. He was told that, if he did not pay, he would be treated as one Goble had been. It appeared that Goble had refused to pay a sum charged against him as owner of some houses, and the commissioners had taken legal proceedings against him, and he had then submitted and paid, with costs. In the result it was agreed between the commissioners and the defendant that the amount charged upon him should be reduced, and that time should be given to pay it in three instalments. He gave three promissory notes for the three instalments. The first was duly honoured; the others were not, and were the subject of the present action. At the trial it appeared that the defendant was not in fact owner of the houses. As agent for the owner he was not personally liable under the act. In point of law, therefore, the commissioners were not entitled to claim the money from him; but no case of deceit was alleged against them. It must be taken that the commissioners honestly believed that the defendant was personally liable, and really intended to take legal proceedings against him, as they had done against Goble. The defendant, according to his own evidence, never believed that he was liable in law, but signed the notes in order to avoid being sued as Goble was. Under these circumstances the substantial question reserved (irrespective of the form of the plea) was whether there was any consideration for the notes. We are of opinion that there was.

There is no doubt that a bill or note given in consideration of what is supposed to be a debt is without consideration if it appears that there was a mistake in fact as to the existence of the debt (Bell v. Gardiner, 4 Man. & G. 11), and, according to the cases of Southall v. Rigg and Forman v. Wright, 11 C. B. 481, the law is the same if the bill or note is given in consequence of a mistake of law as to the existence of the debt. But here there was no mistake on the part of the defendant, either of law or fact. What he did was not merely the making an erroneous account stated, or promising to pay a debt for which he mistakenly believed himself liable. It appeared on the evidence that he believed himself not to be liable, but he knew that the plaintiffs thought him liable, and would sue him if he did not pay, and in order to avoid the expense and trouble of legal proceedings against himself he agreed to a compromise; and the question is, whether a person who has given a note as a compromise of a claim honestly made on him, and which but for that compromise would have been at once brought to a legal decision, can resist the payment of the note on the ground that the original claim thus compromised might have been successfully resisted.

If the suit had been actually commenced, the point would have been concluded by authority. In Longridge v. Dorville, 5 B. & Ald. 117, it was held that the compromise of a suit instituted to try a doubtful question of law was a sufficient consideration for a promise. In Atlee v. Backhouse, 3 M. & W. 633, where the plaintiff's goods had been seized by the excise, and he had afterward entered into an agreement with the Commissioners of Excise that all proceedings should be terminated, the goods delivered up to the plaintiff, and a sum of money paid by him to the commissioners, Parke, B., rests his judgment (page 650) on the ground that this agreement of compromise honestly made was for consideration and binding. In Cooper v. Parker, 15 Com. B. 822, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the withdrawal of an untrue defence of infancy in a suit, with payment of costs, was a sufficient consideration for a promise to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger.

In these cases, however, litigation had been actually commenced; and it was argued before us that this made a difference in point of law, and that though, where a plaintiff has actually issued a writ against a defendant, a compromise honestly made is binding, yet the same compromise, if made before the writ actually issues, though the litigation is impending is void. Edwards v. Baugh, 11 M. & W. 641, was relied upon as an authority for this proposition. But in that case Lord Abinger expressly bases his judgment (pages 645, 646) on the assumption that the declaration did not, either expressly or impliedly, show that a reasonable doubt existed between the parties. It may be doubtful whether the declaration in that case ought not to have been construed as disclosing a compromise of a real bonâ fide claim, but it does not appear to have been so construed by the Court. We agree that unless there was a reasonable claim on the one side, which it was bonâ fide intended to pursue, there would be no ground for a compromise; but we cannot agree that (except as a test of the reality of the claim in fact) the issuing of a writ is essential to the validity of the compromise. The position of the parties must necessarily be altered in every case of compromise, so that, if the question is afterward opened up, they cannot be replaced as they were before the compromise. The plaintiff may be in a less favorable position for renewing his litigation, he must be at an additional trouble and expense in again getting up his case, and he may no longer be able to produce the evidence which would have proved it originally. Besides, though he may not in point of law be bound to refrain from enforcing his rights against third persons during the continuance of the compromise, to which they are not parties, yet practically the effect of the compromise must be to prevent his doing so. For instance, in the present case, there can be no doubt that the practical effect of the compromise must have been to induce the commissioners to refrain from taking proceedings against Mrs. Bennett, the real owner of the houses, while the notes given by the defendant, her agent, were running; though the compromise might have afforded no ground of defence had such proceedings been resorted to. It is this detriment to the party consenting to a compromise arising from the necessary alteration in his position which, in our opinion, forms the real consideration for the promise, and not the technical and almost illusory consideration arising from the extra costs of litigation. The real consideration therefore depends, not on the actual commencement of a suit, but on the reality of the claim made and the bonâ fides of the compromise.

In the present case we think that there was sufficient consideration for the notes in the compromise made as it was.

The rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

PROUT v. INHABITANTS OF FIRE-DIST. OF TOWN OF PITTSFIELD.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1891. 154 Mass. 450, 28 N. E. 679.)

Action of contract by Florence Prout against the Inhabitants of the Fire-District of the Town of Pittsfield on an offer of compromise, and an acceptance thereof, of a claim which plaintiff had against defendant. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

ALLEN, J. The defendant is a fire-district, duly organized and established under the general laws of the commonwealth. St. 1844, c. 152; Pub. St. c. 35, §§ 40–61. By express provision of statute, fire-districts may raise money for the purchase of engines and other articles necessary for the extinguishment of fires, for the purchase of land, for the erection and repairs of necessary buildings, for the erection and maintenance of street lamps within their limits, and for other incidental expenses of the fire department. Pub. St. c. 35, § 51. Certain other powers were specially conferred upon the defendant by the legislature, in respect to water supply and to sewers and drains. St. 1854, c. 210; St. 1867, c. 132. By virtue of its general authority, defendant established an electric fire-alarm system, one of the wires of which ran into the house where the plaintiff lived, and during a thunder-storm she was injured by electricity conducted into the house by means of the wire. It is not controverted that the establishment of the fire-alarm system was within the defendant's authority. The plaintiff sued the defendant for this injury, and obtained a verdict, with substantial damages, in the superior court, under instructions from the presiding justice authorizing the same to be rendered. Exceptions were taken to these instructions, and before the same were argued in this court the defendant passed the vote which is the subject of the present action, appropriating a sum less than the verdict to be paid in compromise of the action and claim, and the plaintiff accepted the vote and the offer therein contained.

The defendant now contends that it was not liable in the first instance for any negligence of the fire department, or of its members and officers, and that it was wholly beyond its power to assume liability therefor by a compromise of the plaintiff's claim. This latter ground of objection is clearly untenable, and we have therefore no occasion to consider the former. The defendant, as a fire-district, is a quasi corporation, with certain limited corporate powers, which are to be measured by its other powers, its privileges and duties. Among its inherent corporate powers is the power to sue and be sued. School-Dist. v. Wood, 13 Mass. 193; Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick. 173, 188; Linehan v. Cambridge, 109 Mass. 212; 2 Kent, Comm. 277, 278, 283, 284, and notes; Ang. & A. Corp. §§ 23, 24, 78; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 21, 22. The general power to compromise doubtful and disputed claims is necessarily incident to the power to sue and the liability to be sued. If a claim against the defendant cannot be adjusted by way of compromise, neither could a claim in its favor. If this doctrine were applied generally to all claims, the result would be that in all disputed cases the defendant must perforce engage in a litigation, the expense of which would be certain, but the result doubtful. The defendant would be under the necessity of insisting at all hazards upon a judicial determination of all its controverted rights, and would be bound to pursue or resist all doubtful claims until final adjudication by the court of last resort.

The learned counsel for the defendant does not carry his objection so far as this, but he contends that liability for negligence of the kind now in question is so far removed from any obligation imposed upon the defendant by law that it was entirely outside of its power to assume any such liability, even by way of compromise. This argument overlooks the ground upon which compromises rest and are upheld by courts. Whether the result of a litigation depends chiefly upon the ascertainment of the facts by the verdict of a jury, or upon the determination of the rules of law found applicable by the court, in either case there is an uncertainty until the decision is reached. No better illustration could be needed than the present case affords. The counsel for the defendant asks us to say that the rules of law so clearly exempted the fire-district from liability that a settlement of the claim by way of compromise was ultra vires. But the learned justice of the superior court ruled that the fire-district might be held liable. It certainly could not be said, therefore, that the law was so plain as to be free from doubt.[44] It must at least be assumed that the defendant was involved in a litigation in which the result might be adverse to it. If the defendant had chosen to rest content with the verdict of the jury and the ruling of the judge of the superior court, there would have been a final judicial determination that it was liable. Could it be urged, in such a case, that it would be beyond its powers to raise money to pay the judgment against it? Or could it be urged that it would be beyond its powers to submit to the result in the superior court, without taking or pressing in this court exceptions in matters of law?

What the defendant has done is, in effect, to agree to waive its exceptions taken at the trial in consideration that the plaintiff will accept a sum less than the verdict of the jury. This verdict was rendered in the due course of the administration of justice. Although subject to be set aside upon a further hearing in this court of the matters of law involved in the case, it was prima facie an obligation resting upon the defendant, which it was in great danger of being compelled to meet. Certainly the plaintiff's claim cannot be said to be merely frivolous or vexatious, or one not urged in good faith. It must be conceded that the plaintiff, or those acting for her, might well believe in its justice and legality, since the court and jury have upon a trial upheld it. There is no suggestion of fraud or misrepresentation practiced on the defendant. Under these circumstances, we can see no good ground for holding that the compromise was beyond the power of the fire-district, or that its promise to pay was founded on no sufficient consideration. The power is incident to its liability to be sued. Cushing v. Stoughton, 6 Cush. 389; Drake v. Stoughton, 6 Cush. 393; Matthews v. Westborough, 131 Mass. 521, Id., 134 Mass. 555; Medway v. Milford, 21 Pick. 349, 354; Bean v. Jay, 23 Me. 117; Petersburg v. Mappin, 14 Ill. 193, 56 Am. Dec. 501; Agnew v. Brall, 124 Ill. 312, 16 N. E. 230; Supervisors v. Bowen, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 24, 30, 31; Supervisors v. Birdsall, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 453; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 30, 477, 478.

The plaintiff's claim, whether on a final determination it might or might not be found to be valid, was sufficiently substantial to furnish a good consideration for the compromise. Barlow v. Insurance Co., 4 Metc. 270; Cobb v. Arnold, 8 Metc. 403; Allis v. Billings, 2 Cush. 19, 25, 26; Leach v. Fobes, 11 Gray, 506, 71 Am. Dec. 732; Kerr v. Lucas, 1 Allen, 279; Easton v. Easton, 112 Mass. 438, 443; Riggs v. Hawley, 116 Mass. 596; Wilton v. Eaton, 127 Mass. 175; Bank v. Geary, 5 Pet. 99, 114, 8 L. Ed. 60; Miles v. New Zealand Alford Est. Co., 32 Ch. Div. 266, 283, 284, 291, 292, 297, 298; Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. Div. 480; Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449; Cook [44] The rule of law generally followed is that a municipal corporation is not bound to pay for injuries caused by the operation of its fire department. A few cases have held contra. See 29 Yale L. Jour. 911.

v. Wright, 1 Best & S. 559; Metc. Cont. 177; Poll. Cont. 181, 182, 407; Chit. Cont. (11th Amer. Ed.) 35–41, 46–50. The case of Palfrey v. Railroad Co., 4 Allen, 55, is to be distinguished on the ground that there it was plain that the plaintiff had no real claim to be compromised; and Wade v. Simeon, 2 C. B. 548, rests on the same ground. The defendant's further objection that the plaintiff has given no complete and unreserved acceptance of the defendant's vote cannot prevail. The plaintiff's acceptance was complete and unreserved, but the defendant's prudential committee sought to repudiate the defendant's vote, the effect of which, if successful, would be to leave the plaintiff's original action as it was. The plaintiff has never withdrawn from its agreement to accept the sum voted by the defendant in full satisfaction of all her claims.

Judgment for the plaintiff affirmed.[45]

BLOUNT v. WHEELER et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1908. 199 Mass. 330, 85 N. E. 477, 17 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1036.)

Suit by Edith Eliza Dillaway Blount against Frank Henry Dillaway and Frank A. Wheeler to compel specific performance of an agreement of compromise. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loring, J.[46] This is a bill brought by a sister against her brother and against the executor of the will of their mother. The plaintiff seeks to establish an agreement of compromise between her brother and herself as to the will and property of their mother, and to have the executor directed to pay to her one-third of the residue when his accounts are settled in the probate court and the time for distribution shall have come.

The mother died at 1:30 a. m. on Friday, July 28, 1905, at the City Hospital. There had been an estrangement between the plaintiff and her mother for some 10 years. The brother lived in New York. He reached Boston in the afternoon of the day of his mother's death, and went directly to the house of the plaintiff in Everett. The judge found that on the morning of the 29th the defendant Dillaway told the plaintiff there was a will leaving him everything and her nothing. This was the only knowledge she had of the contents of the will. They made the agreement of compromise on the evening of that day. By this agreement the plaintiff promised not to contest the will and the defendant promised that he would share with her, she taking one part and he two parts of the estate.

[45] See, also, Longridge v. Dorville, 5 B. & Ald. 117 (1821); Cook et al. v. Wright, 1 Best & S. 559 (1861); Attorney General v. Supreme Council, American Legion of Honor, 206 Mass. 193, 92 N. E. 151 (1910). If the claim was ill-founded as a matter of positive law, and no question as to the validity of the claim was raised, forbearance is insufficient. First Nat. Bank of Plattsmouth v. Lehnhoff's Estate, 77 Neb. 303, 109 N. W. 164 (1906). If the claim was void because based upon an illegal consideration (as distinguished from insufficient), a forbearance to press the claim by suit is not a valid consideration for a new promise. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609 (1907).

The mother was buried on Sunday. After the funeral the brother told his sister that he would not keep this agreement. The will was admitted to probate on September 27th, without opposition, and this bill was filed on November 14th.

The cause was heard on the merits, the evidence being taken by a commissioner. The judge made findings of the material facts and ordered a decree to be entered for the plaintiff. In pursuance of that order a decree was entered declaring that by virtue of the agreement of compromise the plaintiff was entitled to one-third of all moneys coming to the defendant in addition to one-third of the legacy of $5 bequeathed to her, and directing the defendant Wheeler as executor to make said payments after the settlement of his final account in the probate court. It was further provided in said decree that the plaintiff should have the same standing in the probate proceedings that she would have had if the plaintiff and defendant had been residuary legatees.

The case is now before us on appeal by both defendants.

1. The first contention of the appellants is that the offer of the defendant was by its terms to ripen into a contract of compromise on the plaintiff's not contesting the probate of the will, that it was withdrawn before the time for such an acceptance came, and therefore no contract ever came into existence. But the plaintiff testified that when the defendant made the offer to her she told him that she would not contest the will. The judge in terms found that to be true. He found that "the plaintiff in good faith stated to the defendant, her brother, that she would contest the will on the ground of undue influence and want of sanity, and in consideration of his agreement to share the estate with her promised not to make any contest." After a careful examination of the whole evidence we see no reason to overturn that finding.

2. The second contention is that on the evidence there was as matter of law no valid consideration because it was not proved that the plaintiff had a fair chance of success in contesting the will. Their argument in support of this contention is that forbearance to prosecute an invalid claim is not a valid consideration for a promise unless "the promisee as a reasonable person believed that she had some fair chance of already succeeding in the contest." As we have already said, the judge found that the plaintiff "acted in good faith" in stating that she would contest the will and in agreeing not to contest it in consideration of his agreement to share with her. The judge further ruled "that she is not required to go further and prove that there was a doubtful question as to sanity or undue influence in order to establish a valid consideration. She had the right, acting in good faith, to go to court and make a contest and she promised not to exercise that right, and did not exercise it."

There are decisions in other jurisdictions for the position taken by the appellants. A collection of the decisions to that effect may be found in Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Am. Ed.) 214, note 23. But since the decision of this court in Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District, 154 Mass. 450, 28 N. E. 679, those cases are not law in this commonwealth, and the earlier case of Palfrey v. Portland, Saco & Portsmouth Ry. Co., 4 Allen, 55, must be taken to be modified accordingly. This court in Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District adopted the rule finally established in England in Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co., 32 Ch. D. 266, in which Cook v. Wright, 1 B. & S. 559, Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449, Ockford v. Barelli, 20 W. R. 116, and the doubts thrown on those decisions by Lord Esher, M. R., in Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, 490, were considered at length. The rule there laid down was stated on page 291 with accuracy by Lord Bowen to be: "If an intending litigant bona fide forbears a right to litigate, he does give up something of value." He added, speaking of the case then before him: "I think therefore that the reality of the claim which is given up must be measured, not by the state of the law as it is ultimately discovered to be, but by the state of the knowledge of the person who at the time has to judge and make the concession." Again, on page 292, Lord Bowen says: "When the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, says he doubts, if there was really and obviously no cause of action, whether the belief of the parties that there was, would be sufficient ground for a compromise, I agree if by that he means there must be a real cause of action, that is to say, one that is bona fide and not frivolous or vexatious; but I do not agree if he means by a real cause of action some cause of action which commends itself to the ultimate reasoning of the tribunal which has to consider and determine the case." The case of Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District, 154 Mass. 450, 453, 28 N. E. 679, was affirmed in Kennedy v. Welch, 196 Mass. 592, 83 N. E. 11.

In the case at bar, having regard to the knowledge of the plaintiff, can it be said that her claim was a vexatious or frivolous one? Unless a duly executed will had been made she was entitled as one of the two next of kin to a half of her mother's estate. She had just been told by the other next of kin, her brother, that their mother had left a will by which everything had been bequeathed to him. Even although she had been estranged from her mother for ten years, a determination to examine the will and the circumstances under which it had been made could not be said (having regard to the knowledge of the plaintiff) to be either vexatious or frivolous. We are of opinion that this finding and this ruling were right. The claim in Palfrey v. Portland, Saco &

Portsmouth Ry. Co., 4 Allen, 55, was a frivolous and vexatious one. * * *

Decree affirmed.[47]

MILES v. NEW ZEALAND ALFORD ESTATE CO.

The New Zealand Alford Estate Company, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, with articles of association, the material clauses of which were as follows:

"8. The company shall not be bound to recognize any contingent, future, partial, or equitable interest, in the nature of a trust or otherwise, in any share, or any other right in respect of any share, except an absolute right thereto in the person from time to time registered as the holder thereof. * * *"

"23. No shares shall be transferred to a stranger so long as the company or any member is willing to purchase the same at a fair value."

"28. The company may decline to register any transfer of shares upon which the company has a lien by virtue of clause 43 hereof."

Potlatch Lumber Co., 18 Idaho, 42, 108 Pac. 343, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707 (1910), the claim being made in good faith; Latulippe v. New England Inv. Co., 77 N. H. 31, 86 Atl. 361 (1913).

A compromise contract is not invalidated by the fact that the claim was unfounded, if it was believed in by the party making the claim. It is hard to be convinced of good faith if there was no reasonable ground for belief. Such contracts are nearly always sustained. See Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 Pac. 451 (1899); Lewis v. Gove County Tel. Co., 95 Kan. 136, 147 Pac. 1122, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1035 (1915); Western & Southern Life Ins. Co. v. Quinn, 130 Ky. 397, 113 S. Law, 327, 60 Atl. 362 (1905); Smith v. Monteith, 13 M. & W. 427 (1844), discharge of one from arrest; Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449 (1870); Crawford v. Engram, 157 Ala. 314, 47 South. 712 (1908), forbearance is no consideration, if no suit has been brought and there is no reasonable ground to contest.

"It is settled in this commonwealth that forbearance to sue constitutes or may be found to constitute a good consideration for a promise to an intending litigant, and that it is not necessary in a suit on such promise that it should appear that there was in fact a good cause of action, or a fair and reasonable ground of success in the threatened suit. * * * In order that forbearance to sue should constitute a valid consideration for the defendant's promise there must have been a bona fide intention on the part of the plaintiff to contest the will, * * * a threat to contest the will, merely for the purpose of compelling the defendant to settle with her and buy his peace without any intention on her part of actually contesting the will if no such settlement was made, would not be sufficient and would not constitute a valid consideration for the defendant's promise." Mackin v. Dwyer, 205 Mass. 472, 91 N. E. 893 (1910).

"43. The company shall have a first and paramount lien upon all the shares of each member for his debts, liabilities and engagements, solely or jointly with any other person, to or with the company, whether the period for the payment, fulfilment, or discharge thereof shall have actually arrived or not."

"44. For the purpose of enforcing such lien the directors may sell the shares subject thereto without any notice to or consent by the holder of such shares, or any other person; but no sale shall be made unless and until default be made in the payment, fulfilment, or discharge of such debts, liabilities, or engagements."

The defendant, Samuel Grant, who was one of the promoters of the company, was in May, 1882, and at the hearing of this action was still, the registered holder of 125 shares of £100 each in the company. In May, 1882, when £40 apiece had been paid up on these shares, Grant accepted and discounted two accommodation bills payable at six and eighteen months after date for £5,000 each, drawn on him by the plaintiff, E. P. W. Miles, applied the proceeds to his own use, and deposited the certificates of his shares with the plaintiff.

By indenture dated October 19th, 1882, the defendant Grant charged his 125 shares with the two sums of £5,000 and interest thereon at £5 per cent. per annum, and covenanted at any time during the continuance of the security to execute a legal transfer of the shares in favor of the plaintiff; and by an agreement under seal of the same date Grant covenanted with the plaintiff to pay all calls upon the shares during the continuance of the security, and it was agreed that in default the plaintiff might pay such calls and add the moneys so paid with interest thereon to his security.

On November 4th, 1882, notice in writing of the plaintiff's interest in Grant's 125 shares under the indenture of October 19th, 1882, was served upon the company, and this notice was acknowledged by the company on November 6th, and was entered in the share register.

When the bills came to maturity Grant made default in payment, and the plaintiff paid them.

A call of £20 per share was made by the company on December 12th, 1882. Grant made default in payment, and this and the subsequent calls made by the company were paid by the plaintiff in order to avoid a forfeiture of the shares.

Grant, besides being a promoter of the company and the holder of the above-mentioned shares, was the vendor to the company of the property in New Zealand known as the Alford Estate, the acquisition and working of which was the substantial object of the formation of the company. He was also the chairman of the board of directors, and at a general meeting of the company held on March 15th, 1883, an angry discussion took place, at the close of which he gave to the company a written guarantee or warranty signed by himself in the following terms:

"Gentlemen: I hereby guarantee that a dividend (duly earned during the year) of not less than £3 per centum per annum be paid to the shareholders for the year ending June 30th, 1883, and afterward that there shall be paid to them a yearly dividend of not less than £5 per centum per annum (duly earned during the year) for a period of ninety years, and I undertake within three calendar months after the end of any and every year to pay to you any sum requisite to pay the agreed minimum dividend if the company has not earned it."

No resolution was passed at the general meeting with reference to the giving of the guarantee.

Grant was adjudicated a bankrupt on February 19th, 1884. In May, 1884, there being due to the plaintiff upon the security of the indenture and memorandum of agreement of October 19th, 1882, the sum of £7,885, he applied to the company to do and concur in all acts necessary for effecting a sale and transfer of the 125 shares.

The company, however, claimed a lien on the shares under the guarantee given to them by grant in their articles of association in priority to the plaintiff's charge; and they refused to permit any sale or transfer of the shares until their claim was satisfied. The plaintiff then brought this action against the company and Grant and his trustee in bankruptcy, and claimed a declaration that under the deed of October 19th, 1882, he was entitled to a first charge on the 125 shares for the principal and interest secured thereby, and for all sums paid by him for calls, and to have this charge enforced by foreclosure or otherwise, and he pleaded that the guarantee given by Grant was not under seal, that no consideration had been given for it, and that even if consideration had been given, the document did not comply with the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. To this the company rejoined that the guarantee "was executed as part of a contract whereby the company and the shareholders for whose benefit it was executed, in consideration of the execution by the defendant S. Grant of the said documents, agreed to put an end to certain contemplated proceedings against the defendant S. Grant and to give up certain claims against him, and that they did in pursuance of such contract abandon such proceedings and give up such claims and accept the guarantee in full accord and satisfaction of the right of action founded on such claims;" and they pleaded also that the said contract was one to be performed, and that it was in fact performed, within one year from the making thereof.

There was evidence that Grant had misrepresented the Alford Estate, that the defendant company had made claims against Grant and had threatened proceedings, that at a shareholders' meeting Grant had made several offers of compromise and finally offered to sign the guaranty previously set out in consideration of the defendant company and the said shareholders agreeing to abandon their claims against him, and that the company did in fact forbear to bring action and did give up all claims.

The action came on for trial before North, J., upon motion for judgment in default of pleading against the defendant Grant and his trustee in bankruptcy, and was heard on June 22d, 23d, and 24th, 1885.[48]

COTTON, L. J. This is an appeal of the defendant company from a judgment of North, J., in an action brought by the plaintiff in order to enforce his right under an equitable mortgage on shares in the company, and two questions are raised for the decision of the Court. First, whether the company, supposing them to have a legal claim against Grant, the holder of the shares, are entitled under their articles of association to priority for that claim as against the claim of the plaintiff; and, secondly, whether they had in fact any legal claim against Grant. Mr. Justice North held that, in fact, they had a good claim, but he held on the authority of Bradford Banking Company v. Briggs & Co. [29 Ch. D. 149], as decided in the Court below, that the company were not entitled in priority to the plaintiff. * * *[49]

But then comes the question, had the company in fact any legal claim as against Grant? Their claim was under a letter signed by Grant, which guarantees or undertakes that a certain yearly dividend shall be paid to the shareholders during a long period of years, and it is objected that no consideration appears upon the face of the letter, and that no consideration was in fact given to Grant for that promise (I call it "promise," because to call it "contract" would be to assume there was consideration) given by the shareholders.

Now there was much argument upon the question, what is a good consideration for a compromise; and there are authorities which for a considerable time were considered as laying down the law upon the subject; but Lord Esher, the present Master of the Rolls, in Ex parte Banner [17 Ch. D. 480], is supposed to have thrown doubts on these authorities; and what he said was in fact that if the question ever came before this Court the authority of Callisher v. Bischoffsheim [L. R. 5 Q. B. 449], Ockford v. Barelli [20 W. R. 116], and Cook v. Wright [1 B. & S. 559] would have to be considered.

Now, what I understand to be the law is this, that if there is in fact a serious claim honestly made, the abandonment of the claim is a good "consideration" for a contract; and if that is the law, what we really have to now consider is whether in the present case there is any evidence on which the Court ought to find that there was a serious claim in fact made, and whether a contract to abandon that claim was the consideration for this letter of guarantee. I am not going into the question at present as to how far the Statute of Frauds will raise any difficulty in the way. And I think also that the mere fact of an action being brought is not material except as evidence that the claim was in fact made. That, I think, was laid down by Lord Blackburn in Cook v. Wright, and also in Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, and, subject to the question whether these cases are overruled, or ought to be considered as unsound, that, I think, is a correct statement of the law. Now, by "honest claim," I think is meant this, that a claim is honest if the claimant does not know that his claim is unsubstantial, or if he does not know facts, to his knowledge unknown to the other party, which show that his claim is a bad one. Of course, if both parties know all the facts, and with knowledge of those facts obtain a compromise, it cannot be said that that is dishonest. That is, I think, the correct law, and it is in accordance with what is laid down in Cook v. Wright and Callisher v. Bischoffsheim and Ockford v. Barelli. What was stated in Cook v. Wright by Lord Blackburn is this: "We agree that unless there was a reasonable claim on the one side, which it was bona fide intended to pursue, there would be no ground for a compromise; but we cannot agree that (except as a test of the reality of the claim in fact) the issuing of a writ is essential to the validity of the compromise." Again, what his Lordship says in the subsequent case of Callisher v. Bischoffsheim is this: "If we are to infer that the plaintiff believed that some money was due to him, his claim was honest, and the compromise of that claim would be binding and would form a good consideration, although the plaintiff, if he had prosecuted his original claim, would have been defeated." The doubt of the Master of the Rolls seems to have been whether a compromise would not be bad, or a promise to abandon a claim would be a good consideration if, on the facts being elicited and brought out, and on the decision of the Court being obtained, it was found that the claim which was considered the consideration for the compromise was a bad one. But if the validity of a compromise is to depend upon whether the claim was a good one or not, no compromise would be effectual, because if it was afterward disputed, it would be necessary to go into the question whether the claim was in fact a good one or not; and I consider, notwithstanding the doubt expressed by the Master of the Rolls, that the doctrine laid down in Cook v. Wright and Callisher v. Bischoffsheim and Ockford v. Barelli is the law of this Court.

[48] Statement of facts is condensed. Opinion of North, J., and part of opinions of Cotton and Bowen, L. JJ., are omitted.

[49] The court held that Justice North's decision on this point was wrong, the Bradford Case having been later reversed. North's opinion will be found in 32 Ch. D. 273.

Now was there here any claim in fact made on behalf of the company against Grant, and was there, in fact, anything which would bind the company to abandon that claim? The conclusion at which I have arrived is, that there is no evidence on which we ought to rely that there was in fact a claim intended to be made against Grant, and, in my opinion, on the evidence before us, we ought not to arrive at the conclusion that there was ever intended to be any contract by the company, much less that there was in fact any contract binding the company that that claim should not be prosecuted, and should be given up. [His Lordship alluded shortly to the facts of the case, and continued.] Now, undoubtedly, on the evidence, several of the shareholders present at the general meeting of March 15th, 1883, expressed a very hostile feeling against Mr. Grant, who had sold the property to the company; that is admitted by him, and is in my opinion clear. But then what was done? There is nothing at all on the face of this letter of guarantee, as I have already stated, which says that it was given by Grant in consequence of the company giving up any claim they might have against him, and there is nothing whatever in the minutes of the board which states in fact that this was so, nor is there anything after that time in the minutes of the board of directors which can be referred to as showing an agreement by them to give up any claim they otherwise intended to prosecute against him. What I should say was the state of the case is this—there was angry feeling, and Mr. Grant thought it might result in proceedings being taken against him; and, therefore, what he considered the wisest course was to make this offer in the hope and expectation that he would keep things quiet, and let things go on peaceably.

Now, in my opinion, a simple expectation, even though realized, would not be a good consideration for the promise which he gave. In order to make a good consideration for the promise there must be something binding done at the time by the other party, there must be something moving from the other party toward the person giving the promise. In my opinion, to make a good consideration for this contract, it must be shown that there was something which would bind the company not to institute proceedings, and shown also that in fact proceedings were intended on behalf of the company; and, in my opinion, I cannot come to the conclusion as a matter of fact that these two things existed. It is true that directors were present at the meeting, and that their guarantee was entered on the minutes, but although this was the case, it cannot in my opinion be considered that the directors by being there entered into any contract as directors not to enforce the claim of the company. The proper mode of proving any agreement made by the directors would be the production of evidence of its having been made at a meeting held by them as the persons having the conduct of the business of the society. No doubt, they might, if they had been so minded, at a meeting of the board agree that they should not make any claim against him in consideration of this having taken place, but I find nothing of that kind.

Again, this is an incorporated company, and even if any statement had been made at this meeting that no proceedings should be taken, yet to bind the company there ought to be something done by way of a resolution, and mere statements by individual members that they were satisfied with this guarantee would not in any way bind the company so as to prevent them from taking proceedings if they ever intended to do so. In my opinion this promise was given in the expectation that this would be a sop to the angry shareholders, and that no proceedings would be taken. The mere fact that none have been taken, will not in my opinion make that a consideration, unless (putting aside the question as to the company being bound) something was done or said in such a way as to be the action or saying of the company, that if this guarantee was given no proceedings would be taken. Of course if this company were an individual, and the individual made a representation that if this guarantee was given he would take no proceedings, that would be a contract binding him, but in my opinion if a company is to be bound, it ought to be bound by some more formal proceedings, either by the action of the directors sitting as such, or by something equivalent to a resolution of the shareholders in general meeting.

Mr. Justice NORTH, although he decided in favor of the plaintiff, has held that there was sufficient consideration for the guarantee; and if he had come to the conclusion that there was upon the evidence before him that which amounted to a contract binding the company, then I should undoubtedly feel some difficulty, because he had a better opportunity of judging of the evidence than we can have. But, on reading his judgment, I come to the conclusion that he rather considered there was an expectation than that this would be the result, and that if that expectation was performed and completed, this would be enough to give a consideration. * * *

I come accordingly to the conclusion that there is, in fact, no consideration to support the guarantee on which the company rely, and to make it a contract binding on Mr. Grant; and as I have come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient consideration to support the promise, it is not necessary for me to enter into the question as to the Statute of Frauds.

BOWEN, L. J. * * * Therefore we have to determine whether or no there was any consideration for this guarantee, and it is upon that point that I am, with great regret, obliged to state that my opinion is at variance with the view at which Lord Justice COTTON has arrived. The inquiry whether there was or was not consideration for this guarantee renders it necessary to say some words upon the law, and then to apply the law to the question of fact.

Speaking broadly, what has to be determined is, in my opinion, whether there was at a critical moment any forbearance to press a real claim on the part of the company, or of the directors of the company, who had ample powers under their articles of association to act for the company, and, if so, whether such forbearance was brought about by the express or implied request of Mr. Grant, and in consideration of his guarantee. A valuable consideration may, of course either consist of some right, interest, profit, or benefit which accrues to one party, or some forbearance, or detriment, or loss, or responsibility, which is given to or undertaken by the other. We have to see here in the first place whether there was forbearance promised, in which case the promise would be the consideration for the guarantee, or whether there was an actual forbearance given at the request of the guarantor and in return for something. The two views run very close together. If the directors, in consideration of this guarantee, made an actual agreement to forbear, they really took the agreement in accord and satisfaction of any claims, if there were claims, and beyond that agreed not to prosecute the question whether there were any; but such an agreement as that need not be in writing. It seems to me there is no magic at all in formalities, and that there would be ample evidence of such an agreement, if this guarantee to the knowledge of both parties was given and accepted upon the understanding that no proceedings should be instituted. But I do not accept the proposition that this guarantee cannot be effectual and supported by consideration unless there is at the moment it was given something to bind the company. If the guarantee were given on the condition and on the contingency that there should be forbearance, and was taken upon that condition, and upon that contingency and the contingency afterwards happened, then the forbearance when given, being at the request expressed or implied of the guarantor, would furnish an implied consideration for the guarantee which had already been given. That is, I think, no new law. In Oldershaw v. King, 2 H. & N. 399, 517, 520, there was a guarantee given to the following effect: "I am aware," said the guarantor, "that my uncles Messrs. J. & J. F. King, stand considerably indebted to you for professional business, and for cash lent and advanced to them, and that it is not in their power to pay you at present, and as in all probability they will become further indebted to you, though I by no means intend that this letter shall create or imply any obligation on your part to increase your claim against them, I am willing to bear you harmless against any loss arising out of the past and future transactions between you and my said uncles to a certain extent, and therefore in consideration of your forbearing to press them for the immediate payment of the debt now due to you, I hereby engage and agree to guarantee you the payment of any sum they may be indebted to you upon the balance of accounts between you at any time during the next six years, to the extent of £1,000, whenever called upon by you to pay the same, and after twelve calendar months' previous notice." In that case, Erle, J., expressed himself in the following language: "Looking at the whole letter, and the circumstances under which it was written, and considering the importance of further advances, I come to the conclusion, that the consideration contemplated was, that further advance should be made, and time given by the creditor before he would press for the payment of the existing debt. Though the contract did not bind the creditor to make further advances, or to give time unless he chose to do so, it is clear that if he did make the advances and did give time, that which was contingent at the time when the instrument was written became an absolute and binding contract." The same principle was applied in the case of the Alliance Bank v. Broom, 2 Dr. & Sm. 289. "It appears to me," said the Vice-Chancellor, 2 Dr. & Sm. 292, "that when the plaintiffs demanded payment of their debt, and, in consequence of that application, the defendant agreed to give certain security, although there was no promise on the part of the plaintiffs to abstain for any certain time from suing for the debt, the effect was, that the plaintiffs did, in effect, give, and the defendant received, the benefit of some degree of forbearance; not, indeed, for any definite time, but, at all events, some extent of forbearance." So it will be sufficient here that the directors did forbear, if their forbearance was at the request expressed or implied of the guarantor and in consequence of his guarantee being given, and it seems to me there is no sort of necessity to discover language of any particular form, or writing of any particular character, embodying the resolution of the directors. We must treat the thing in a business way and draw an inference of fact as to what the real nature of the transaction was as between business men. But an attempt was made to shew that the forbearance was worth nothing. Of course forbearance of a non-existing claim would not be forbearance at all. We were referred to the language of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, which seems to throw doubt upon the doctrine which has more than once been laid down in the Courts of Common Law, and finally in the well-known case of Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 449. It seems to me that if an intending litigant bona fide forbears a right to litigate a question of law or fact which it is not vexatious or frivolous to litigate, he does give up something of value. It is a mistake to suppose it is not an advantage, which a suitor is capable of appreciating, to be able to litigate his claim, even if he turns out to be wrong. It seems to me it is equally a mistake to suppose that it is not sometimes a disadvantage to a man to have to defend an action even if in the end he succeeds in his defence; and I think therefore that the reality of the claim which is given up must be measured, not by the state of the law as it is ultimately discovered to be, but by the state of the knowledge of the person who at the time has to judge and make the concession. Otherwise you would have to try the whole cause to know if the man had a right to compromise it, and with regard to questions of law it is obvious you could never safely compromise a question of law at all. With regard to the observations of the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Banner I should like to point out in respect to Callisher v. Bischoffsheim in the first place that whatever be the objection taken to the language of the Court in that case, in any point of view the case was rightly decided. The plea there only denied the existence of the debt, and left it on the record undisputed that the debt might have been put forward reasonably as a substantial claim. But with regard to the language of the Court in Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 449, I confess it seems to me that the language of Lord Blackburn was correct, that the decision in Ockford v. Barelli, 20 W. R. 116, was right, and that the language in Cook v. Wright, 1 B. & S. 559, is equally unimpeachable. When the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, says he doubts, if there was really and obviously no cause of action, whether the belief of the parties that there was, would be sufficient ground for a compromise, I agree if by that he means there must be a real cause of action, that is to say, one that is bona fide and not frivolous or vexatious; but I do not agree if he means by a real cause of action some cause of action which commends itself to the ultimate reasoning of the tribunal which has to consider and determine the case. * * *

[The Lord Justice then reviewed the evidence, and arrived at the conclusion "that proceedings had been threatened, that Mr. Grant knew that they had been threatened, that he gave the guarantee in order to put an end to them, and that the proceedings were dropped in consequence of his giving that undertaking." He said that he was differing from COTTON, L. J., only upon a question of fact, but that he was obliged to dissent.

[The opinion of FRY, L. J., is here omitted. He agreed with COTTON, L. J., in result, his reasons being that the company had no bona fide claim against Grant, and that if such a claim existed they had never agreed to extinguish it.

[The result was that the majority of the court, while differing with Mr. Justice NORTH on both points decided by him, affirmed the decree and dismissed the appeal. The claim of Miles to a charge on Grant's shares was sustained.]

SECTION 4.—MUTUAL PROMISES AS CONSIDERATION FOR EACH OTHER

(Conditional and Illusory Promises—Mutuality of Legal Duty or Obligation)

STRANGBOROUGH AND WARNER'S CASE.

(In the King's Bench, 1589. 4 Leon. 3.)

Note, that a promise against a promise will maintain an action upon the case, as in consideration that you do give to me £10 on such a day, I promise to give you £10 such a day after.[50]

[50] In Thorpe v. Thorpe, 12 Mod. 455 (1701), Holt, C. J., said: "A is possessed of Black Acre, to which B has no manner of right, and A desires B to release him all his right to Black Acre, and promises him, in consideration thereof, to pay so much money, surely this is a good consideration and a good promise, for it puts B to the trouble of making a release. Then where the doing a thing will be a good consideration, a promise to do that thing will be so too." See, also, 2 Street, Foundations of Legal Liability, 110 (1906); Williston, Consideration in Bilateral Contracts, 27 Harv. L. Rev. 518 (1914).

"So far as regards the matter of the consideration, as being executed or executory it may be observed that whatever matter, if executed, is sufficient to form a good executed consideration; if promised, is sufficient to form a good executory consideration: so that the distinction of executed and executory consideration has no bearing upon the question of the sufficiency of any

(In the King's Bench, 1588. 1 Leon. 103, 4 Leon. 31.)

In an action upon the case by Cook against Songat, the plaintiff declared, quod cum quædam lis and controversie had been moved betwixt the plaintiff lord of the manor, &c. and the defendant claiming certain lands parcel of the said manor, to hold it by copy; and whereas both parties submitted themselves to the judgment and arbitrament of J. S. counsellor at law, concerning the said land, and the title of the defendant to it: the defendant in consideration that the plaintiff promised to the defendant, that if the said J. S. should adjudge the said copy to be good and sufficient for the title of the defendant, that then he would suffer the defendant to enjoy the said land accordingly without molestation: the defendant reciprocally promised the plaintiff, that if the said J. S. should adjudge the said copy not sufficient to maintain the title of the defendant, that then he would deliver and surrender the possession of the said land to the plaintiff without any suit; and shewed further, that J. S. had awarded the said copy utterly insufficient, &c. yet the defendant did continue the possession of the land, &c. And by GODFREY, here is not any consideration: but by GAWDY, the same is a good and sufficient consideration, because it is to avoid variances and suits: and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

HOLT v. WARD CLARENCIEUX.

(In the King's Bench, 1732. 2 Strange, 937.)

The plaintiff declared, that it was mutually agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that they should marry at a future day, which is past, and that in consideration of each other's promises, each engaged to the other; notwithstanding which the defendant did not marry the plaintiff, but had married another, which she lays to her damage of £4,000.

The defendant with leave of the Court pleaded double (viz.) non assumpsit, and that the plaintiff at the time of the promise was an infant of fifteen years of age.

The plaintiff joins issue on the non assumpsit, and a verdict is found for her, with £2,000 damages. And as to the plea of infancy demurred.

particular matter to form a consideration." Leake, Contracts (1st Ed.) p. 314; Id. (2d Ed.) pp. 612, 613.

The theory that consideration must always be a detriment to the promisee is not properly applicable to bilateral contracts. See 2 Street, Foundations of Legal Liability; Holdsworth in 11 Mich. L. Rev. 347; Corbin, "Does a Pre-existing Duty Defeat Consideration?" (1918) 27 Yale L. Jour. 362, 374.

For further discussions see Ames, "Two Theories of Consideration," 12 Harv. L. Rev. 515; Williston, "Successive Promises of the Same Performance," 8 Harv. L. Rev. 27; Langdell, "Mutual Promises as a Consideration," 14 Harv. L. Rev. 496.

This cause was several times argued at the Bar: 1. By Mr. Strange for the plaintiff, and Serjeant Chapple for the defendant. When the Court inclined strongly with the plaintiff, because though the defendant would not have the same remedy against her by action for damages, yet they thought he might have some remedy, viz. by suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, to compel a performance, the plaintiff being of the age of consent: and that would be a sufficient consideration. And therefore appointed an argument by civilians, to see what their law would determine in such a case.

Upon the arguments of the civilians, no instance could be shewn, wherein they had compelled the performance of a minor's contract. And they who argued for the defendant, strongly insisted, that in the case of a contract per verba de futuro, (as this was) there was no remedy, even against a person of full age, in the Spiritual Court, but only an admonition. And the only reason why they hold jurisdiction in the case of a contract per verba de præsenti is, because that is looked upon amongst them to be ipsum matrimonium, and they only decree the formality of a solemnization in the face of the Church.

After their arguments it was spoke to a fourth time by Mr. Reeve and Serjeant Eyre. And now this term the CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the resolution of the Court.

The objection in this case is, that the plaintiff not being bound equally with the defendant, this is nudum pactum, and the defendant cannot be charged in this action. Formerly it was made a doubt by my Lord Vaughan, whether any action could be maintained on mutual promises to marry; but that is now a point not to be disputed. And as to the present case, we should have had no difficulty in giving judgment for the plaintiff, if we could have been satisfied by the arguments of the civilians, that as the plaintiff was of the age of consent, any remedy, though not by way of action for damages, could be had against her. But since they seem to have had no precedent in the case, we must consider it upon the foot of the common law. And upon that the single question is, whether this contract as against the plaintiff, was absolutely void. And we are all of opinion, that this contract is not void, but only voidable at the election of the infant; and as to the person of full age it absolutely binds.

The contract of an infant is considered in law as different from the contracts of all other persons. In some cases his contract shall bind him; such is the contract of an infant for necessaries, and the law allows him to make this contract as necessary for his preservation; and therefore in such case a single bill shall bind him, though a bond with a penalty shall not. 1 Lev. 87.

Where the contract may be for the benefit of the infant, or to his prejudice; the law so far protects him, as to give him an opportunity to consider it when he comes of age: and it is good or voidable at his election. Cro. Car. 502; 2 Roll. 24, 427; Hob. 69; 1 Brownl. 11; 1 Sid. 41; 1 Vent. 21; 1 Mod. 25; Sir W. Jones, 164. But though the infant has this privilege yet the party with whom he contracts has not; he is bound in all events. And as marriage is now looked upon to be an advantageous contract, and no distinction holds whether the party suing be man or woman, but the true distinction is whether it may be for the benefit of the infant, we think, that though no express case upon a marriage contract can be cited, yet it falls within the general reason of the law with regard to infants' contracts. And no dangerous consequence can follow from this determination, because our opinion protects the infant, even more than if we rule the contract to be absolutely void. And as to persons of full age, it leaves them where the law leaves them, which grants them no such protection against being drawn into inconvenient contracts.

For these reasons we are all of opinion that the plaintiff ought to have her judgment upon the demurrer.

COLEMAN v. EYRE.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1871. 45 N. Y. 38.)

RAPALLO, J. The plaintiff was interested to the extent of one-fourth in the profits or losses of a shipment of coffee undertaken by him jointly with other parties. After the adventure had been begun, and before the coffee had reached its port of destination, it was mutually agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the latter should have one-half interest in the plaintiff's one-fourth interest in the adventure. The speculation resulted in a loss, and this action was brought to recover one-half of the plaintiff's proportion of such loss. It is now claimed on the part of the defendant that no valid contract was made between him and the plaintiff; that inasmuch as the plaintiff had embarked in the speculation before and without reference to any arrangement with the defendant, and the defendant had not done or contributed any thing to aid in the joint enterprise, there was no partnership, and no consideration for the undertaking of the plaintiff to give him one-half of the profits; that therefore the defendant could not have enforced payment of half the profits, if the adventure had been successful, and consequently no agreement on his part to contribute to the loss can be implied.

This argument assumes that the agreement was simply that the defendant should have one-half of the profits, which the plaintiff might make out of the adventure, in case it should prove successful. But such was not the agreement proved. The agreement was that the defendant should share with the plaintiff in the adventure, and it seems to have been clearly understood that he should participate in the result, whether it should prove a profit or a loss. That it might result in a loss was contemplated by the parties. There is evidence in the case that the possibility of that event was the subject of conversation between them at the time of making the contract; that the hope was then expressed that the plaintiff would not be compelled to call upon the defendant to contribute to a loss; and that afterwards, when they did call upon him to contribute, he did not dispute his liability, but sought to reduce the amount by claiming a portion of the plaintiff's commissions.

The evidence fully justified a finding that in consideration of the agreement by the plaintiff to account to the defendant for half the profits in case of success, the defendant undertook to bear half the loss in the contrary event; and the intendment is that the referee did so find. Indeed, such is a proper construction of the actual finding. It is a clear case of mutual promises; and the obligation of each party was a good consideration for that of the other. Briggs v. Tillotson, 8 Johns. 304.

The evidence was conflicting as to whether the defendant was to share in the commissions. The referee found in the plaintiff's favor on that point, and the court below, at general term, refused to interfere with that finding. We cannot disturb it.

The agreement was not within the statute of frauds. It was not an agreement for the sale of any personal property or chose in action, but an executory agreement, whereby one party undertook to bear one part of a possible loss in consideration of a share of an expected profit.

The judgment of reversal and order granting a new trial should be reversed, and the judgment for the plaintiff entered on the report of the referee should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

Order of general term reversed, and judgment for the plaintiff affirmed.[51]

SEWARD & SCALES v. MITCHELL.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1860. 1 Cold. 87.)

CARUTHERS, J.[52] On the 16th Oct., 1856, Mitchell sold to Seward and Scales, for the consideration of $8,596.50, a tract of land in the county of Gibson, described in a deed of that date, by metes and bounds, "containing 521 acres, being a part of a 5,000-acre tract granted to George Dougherty, and bounded as follows," &c.

The title is warranted with the usual covenants, but nothing more said about the grants than what is above recited.

Some time after the deed was made, the parties, differing as to the quantity of land embraced in the tract, made an agreement that it should be surveyed by Gillespie, and if there were more than 521 acres, the vendee should pay for the excess at the rate of $16.50 per acre, that being the price at which the sale was made, and if less, then the vendor should pay for the deficiency, at the same rate. It turned out that there was an excess of 57 acres, and the tract embraced in the deed was 578 acres, instead of 521, as estimated in the sale. For this excess, the present suit was brought, and recovery had, for $1,079. * * *

There is more plausibility in the second objection, that there was no sufficient consideration for the promise. But this is also untenable. The argument is, that the deed embraced the whole tract, and passed a perfect title to the extent of the boundaries, and consequently there was nothing passing as a consideration for the new promise, that the party did not own before by a perfect legal right.

It is true, if the sale was by the tract and not by the acre, as appears from the deed, and no stipulations as to quantity, that the title was good for the whole and covered the excess. But if the sale was not in gross, but by the acre and the recitation in the deed would not be conclusive in a court of equity on that point if the fact could be shown to be otherwise, then there would be mutual remedies for an excess or deficiency in proper cases, as we held in Miller v. Bentley, 5 Sneed, 671, and a more recent case; but independent of that, and taking it to have been purely a sale in gross, and both parties desiring to act justly, and being of different opinions as to the quantity, mutually agreed to abide by an accurate survey to ascertain which was bound to pay, and recover from the other, and what amount, we see no good reason in law or morals why such an agreement should not be binding upon them. The case of Howe v. O'Mally, 5 N. C. 287, 3 Am. Dec. 693, is precisely in point. The court there held that a promise to refund in case of deficiency is a good consideration for a promise to pay for any excess over what is called for in the deed,—that such mutual promises are sufficient considerations for each other.

The case of Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 259, which is supposed to conflict with this, is entirely different; "there was no mutuality" because the promise sued upon was to pay for the deficiency, without any obligation on the other party to pay for an excess, if any there had been.

The principle of the North Carolina case commends itself to our approbation, because of its equity and justice.

Without further citation of authorities we are satisfied to hold that the promise in this case was binding upon the defendant, as his Honor charged, and therefore affirm the judgment.

GREAT NORTHERN RY. CO. v. WITHAM.

The cause was tried before Brett, J., at the sittings at Westminster after the last term. The facts were as follows: In October, 1871, the plaintiffs advertised for tenders for the supply of goods (amongst other things iron) to be delivered at their station at Doncaster, according to a certain specification. The defendant sent in a tender, as follows:

"I, the undersigned, hereby undertake to supply the Great Northern Railway Company, for twelve months from November 1st, 1871, to October 31st, 1872, with such quantities of each or any of the several articles named in the attached specification as the company's store-keeper may order from time to time, at the price set opposite each article respectively, and agree to abide by the conditions stated on the other side. [Signed] Samuel Witham."

The company's officer wrote in reply, as follows:

"Mr. S. Witham:

"Sir: I am instructed to inform you that my directors have accepted your tender, dated, etc., to supply this company at Doncaster station any quantity they may order during the period ending October 31st, 1872, of the descriptions of iron mentioned on the enclosed list, at the prices specified therein. The terms of the contract must be strictly adhered to. Requesting an acknowledgment of the receipt of this letter, [Signed] S. Fitch, Assistant Secretary."

To this the defendant replied:

"I beg to own receipt of your favor of 20th instant, accepting my tender for bars, for which I am obliged. Your specifications shall receive my best attention. S. Witham."

Several orders for iron were given by the company, which were from time to time duly executed by the defendant; but ultimately the defendant refused to supply any more, whereupon this action was brought.

A verdict having been found for the plaintiffs,

Digby Seymour, Q. C., moved to enter a nonsuit.[53]

KEATING, J. In this case Mr. Digby Seymour moved to enter a nonsuit. The circumstances were these: The Great Northern Railway Company advertised for tenders for the supply of stores. The defendant made a tender in these words: "I hereby undertake to supply the Great Northern Railway Company, for twelve months, from etc. to etc., with such quantities of each or any of the several articles named in the attached specifications as the company's store-keeper may order from time to time, at the price set opposite each article respectively," etc. Some orders were given by the company, which were duly executed. But the order now in question was not executed; the defendant seeking to excuse himself from the performance of his agreement, because it was unilateral, the company not being bound to give the order. The ground upon which it was put by Mr. Seymour was, that there was no consideration for the defendant's promise to supply the goods; in other words, that, inasmuch as there was no obligation on the company to give an order, there was no consideration moving from the company, and therefore no obligation on the defendant to supply the goods. The case mainly relied on in support of that contention was Burton v. Great Northern Railway Co., [9 Ex. 507; 23 L. J. (Ex.) 184.] But that is not an authority in the defendant's favor. It was the converse case. The Court there held that no action would lie against the company for not giving an order. If before the order was given the defendant had given notice to the company that he would not perform the agreement, it might be that he would have been justified in so doing. But here the company had given the order, and had consequently done something which amounted to a consideration for the defendant's promise. I see no ground for doubting that the verdict for the plaintiffs ought to stand.

Brett, J. The company advertised for tenders for the supply of stores, such as they might think fit to order, for one year. The defendant made a tender offering to supply them for that period at certain fixed prices; and the company accepted his tender. If there were no other objection, the contract between the parties would be found in the tender and the letter accepting it. This action is brought for the defendant's refusal to deliver goods ordered by the company; and the objection to the plaintiffs' right to recover is, that the contract is unilateral. I do not, however, understand what objection that is to a contract. Many contracts are obnoxious to the same complaint. If I say to another, "If you will go to York, I will give you £100," that is in a certain sense a unilateral contract. He has not promised to go to York. But if he goes, it cannot be doubted that he will be entitled to receive the £100. His going to York at my request is a sufficient consideration for my promise. So, if one says to another, "If you will give me an order for iron, or other goods, I will supply it at a given price;" if the order is given, there is a complete contract which the seller is bound to perform. There is in such a case ample consideration for the promise. So, here, the company having given the defendant an order at his request, his acceptance of the order would bind them. If any authority could have been found to sustain Mr. Seymour's contention, I should have considered that a rule ought to be granted. But none has been cited. Burton v. Great Northern Railway Co., [9 Ex. 507; 23 L. J. (Ex.) 184,] is not at all to the purpose. This is matter of every day's practice; and I think it would be wrong to countenance the notion that a man who tenders for the supply of goods in this way is not bound to deliver them when an order is given. I agree that this judgment does not decide the question whether the defendant might have absolved himself from the further performance of the contract by giving notice.

Rule refused.[54]

COHN v. LEVINE et al.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1918. 185 App. Div. 529, 173 N. Y. Supp. 289.)

Action by Alex Cohn, trading as the Cohn Company, against Barnett Levine and another, copartners. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, defendants appeal. Order reversed, motion denied, and demurrer sustained, with leave to file amended complaint.

DOWLING, J. This is an appeal from an order granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, consisting of the complaint and a demurrer thereto, which demurrer set forth that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The complaint alleges that on or about the 6th day of August, 1917, the plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement in writing, which was thereafter renewed on January 2, 1918, to continue until December 31, 1918. The contract in substance was that the defendants would furnish to the plaintiff certain samples of ladies' and misses' coats and suits identical with those furnished to salesmen for the defendants, in order that plaintiff might take orders therefor, and that upon the sale of such coats and suits by plaintiff to its customers the plaintiff would be entitled to the difference between the cost price, to be stipulated, and the price at which the plaintiff and his customers should agree as the sales price. Bills of all merchandise manufactured and shipped were to contain a statement that payment was to be made at the place of business of the defendants at 142 West Twenty-Fourth street, New York City, and all checks for said merchandise which came in for the Cohn Company were to be turned over to the defendants. The agreement then contained the following provision: "Upon the receipt of any and all checks as aforesaid, the parties of the second part shall pay to the party of the first part the difference between the amount which the customer was charged for the goods and the amount which it was mutually agreed and determined that the party of the first part shall be charged therefor."

The agreement also contained a stipulation that the defendants should not directly or indirectly "drum" customers of the plaintiff, and that, if any goods should be sold by defendants to any of said customers, the same should be sold in the name of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should receive the difference between the price at which the goods were to be sold to such customers and the price determined upon as the basis of allowance for cost of material and labor and for profit, the same as though the order had been given in the first instance to the plaintiff. A copy of the agreement in question is annexed to the complaint.

The complaint further set forth that the plaintiff entered upon the performance of the terms of the agreement and duly performed the same. It then alleges that the defendants, "without just cause, prevented plaintiff from fulfilling the terms and conditions of said contract," and that defendants dispossessed plaintiff from space occupied in defendants' place of business, and refused to deliver any of the merchandise to be delivered to the customers of the plaintiff, as set forth in the agreement, and wrongfully and unlawfully "converted checks for merchandise sent by customers to plaintiff at the address of the defendants in payment of bills for merchandise manufactured and shipped by defendants to plaintiff's said customers, which were sent by said customers to No. 142 West Twenty-Fourth street, borough of Manhattan, city of New York, to the order of the plaintiff," and that defendants secretly solicited trade or "drummed" the customers of plaintiff, and did not charge same to plaintiff, nor sell same in plaintiff's name, all to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $4,000.

It is apparent that the contract was unilateral, and consisted merely of an offer on the part of the defendants to furnish samples to the plaintiff for goods to be sold by him to his customers, and to be delivered to them when procured. There is no agreement of any kind on the part of the plaintiff either to take goods from the defendants or to endeavor to bring to the defendants plaintiff's customers, or other customers. The agreement is not under seal, and is not mutually binding. The general rule in respect to such contracts is laid down in Grossman v. Schenker, 206 N. Y. 466, 100 N. E. 39, as follows:

"The general rule is that a promise, not under seal, made by one party, with none by the other, is void, for, unless both are bound, so that either can sue the other for a breach, neither is bound."

While in certain special contracts courts have implied promises sufficient to create mutuality, the contract in the present case is not subject to any interpretation which would warrant the court in implying that the plaintiff in any way agreed to take any particular amount of merchandise, or to endeavor to sell or sell any of the designs of the defendants. Plaintiff did not even agree to pay anything to defendants, for they were to receive all the checks and pay the difference between cost and selling price to plaintiff.

The learned trial justice in the case at bar seems to have laid stress on the allegation in the complaint that the agreement had been performed on the part of the plaintiff. While the Code authorizes a general allegation of due performance by plaintiff of the conditions precedent to a right of recovery on certain contracts, without stating all of the facts constituting performance (Code of Civil Procedure, § 533), still the complaint in the case at bar sets forth no facts which show that plaintiff had done anything under the contract which called for action upon the part of defendants, or imposed any duty or obligation upon them under the contract. The complaint wholly fails to state that the plaintiff obtained any customers whatever for defendants' goods, or ever notified defendants of its alleged orders.

The learned court at Special Term upheld the complaint, upon the ground that it set forth a cause of action in conversion; but plaintiff admits upon this appeal that it sets forth no such cause of action, nor could such a contention be successfully urged, inasmuch as, under the contract, defendants were expressly given the right to receive all checks for merchandise which came in for plaintiff, and were only bound to turn over to plaintiff the difference between the amount of such checks and the cost price of the goods agreed to be charged against plaintiff by defendants. There are no facts alleged from which it appears that plaintiff is even entitled to an accounting from defendants.

The order appealed from will be reversed, with $10 costs and disbursements, and the motion for judgment on the pleadings denied, with $10 costs. The demurrer is sustained, with leave to plaintiff to serve an amended complaint on payment of said costs. Order filed. All concur.

LIMA LOCOMOTIVE & MACHINE CO. v. NATIONAL STEEL CASTINGS CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of United States, 1907. 155 Fed. 77, 83 C. C. A. 593, 11 L. R. A. [N. S.] 713.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Northern District of Ohio.

Action upon account for goods sold and delivered, and cross-action for damages for breach of contract. Jury waived. The trial judge made a finding of facts and a general finding for the plaintiff for the full amount of the account and against the defendant upon its cross-petition.

On April 10, 1902, the National Steel Castings Company made in writing the following proposition to the Lima Locomotive & Machine Company: "Gentlemen: We make the following proposition for furnishing all your requirements in steel castings for the remainder of the present year at the prices mentioned below, f. o. b. cars at Montpelier, the terms to be thirty days net. You agree to furnish us on or before the 15th of each month the tonnage that you wish to order during the following month. We agree to fill your orders as specified to the amount of this tonnage, and to make such deliveries as you require." Then followed a schedule of steel castings and prices per pound. This was accepted in writing by indorsing thereon, at the foot of the proposition, "Accepted April 10, 1902," and duly signed by the Lima Company. This contract the defendant set out in its cross-petition and averred: First, that the castings for which the plaintiff had sued were ordered and supplied under this contract; second, that the plaintiff had failed and refused, though requested, to supply it with other castings necessary to meet the requirements of its business, and that defendant in consequence had been obliged to contract for same with other founders and had paid for the castings so procured $5,498.24 over and above the contract price with plaintiff.

The defenses to the cross-petition were: First, that the contract was void for want of mutuality.[55] * * *

LURTON, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

1. We find ourselves unable to agree with the learned circuit judge in respect to the nonmutuality of the contract by which the plaintiff agreed to supply all of the "requirements" of the defendant's business for the remainder of the year 1902. The defendant was engaged in an established manufacturing business which required a large amount of steel castings. This was well known to the plaintiff, and the proposition made and accepted was made with reference to the "requirements" of that well-established business. The plaintiffs were not proposing to make castings beyond the current requirements of that business, and would not have been obligated to supply castings not required in the usual course of that business. By the acceptance of the plaintiff's proposal, the defendant was obligated to take from the plaintiff all castings which their business should require. The contract, if capable of two equally reasonable interpretations, should be given that interpretation which will tend to support it and thus carry out the presumed intent of both parties. The second and third paragraphs must be read in the light of the first. Thus read, there is no ground for doubting that the words the "tonnage you wish to order," and "such deliveries as you may require," have reference to the established "requirements" of the business for the following "month," and the deliveries of the tonnage thus estimated. The contract falls under and is governed by the case of Loudenback Fertilizer Co. v. Tennessee Phosphate Co., 121 Fed. 298, 58 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 402, where the contract was to sell to a manufacturer of fertilizer "its entire consumption of phosphate rock" for a term of five years. In that case we held that the contract was mutual, and the buyer under obligation to take its entire requirement of phosphate rock from the seller. Concerning the definiteness of such a contract, we said: "A contract to buy all that one shall require for one's own use in a particular manufacturing business is a very different thing from a promise to buy all that one may desire, or all that one may order. The promise to take all that one can consume would be broken by buying from another, and it is this obligation to take the entire supply of an established business which saves the mutual character of the promise."

To the same effect and directly in point are the cases of Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co., 114 Fed. 77, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696; Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co., 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529, and Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218. * * *

Judgment reversed.[56]

KOEHLER & HINRICHS MERCANTILE CO. v. ILLINOIS GLASS CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1919. 143 Minn. 344, 173 N. W. 703.)

Action by the Koehler & Hinrichs Mercantile Company against the Illinois Glass Company. Findings by the court for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

LEES, C. This was an action to recover damages for breach of a contract of sale tried by the court without a jury. The findings were in plaintiff's favor, and defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff is a dealer at wholesale in glassware, bottles, flasks, and other merchandise. Its place of business is at St. Paul. Defendant is a manufacturer of glassware at Alton, Ill., and has an agency for the sale of its goods at St. Paul. On January 9, 1915, a contract in writing between defendant and the Koehler & Hinrichs Company was executed. By its terms the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to buy, on or before December 31, 1916, 12 carloads of Ko-Hi flasks, at a stipulated price, shipments to be made upon specifications furnished by the buyer at least 30 days in advance of the shipping date, the final specifications to be furnished not later than October 1, 1916. Payments were to be made within 30 days after shipment, with certain discount privileges. It was provided that, if the financial responsibility of the buyer became impaired or unsatisfactory to the seller, cash in advance of shipment or satisfactory security might be demanded. There was a clause reading as follows:

"It is agreed that under this contract Koehler & Hinrichs Company may have the privilege of increasing quantity as much as they may desire at price shown herein during the period covered by this contract."

On June 6, 1916, the contract was assigned by Koehler & Hinrichs Company to Koehler & Hinrichs Mercantile Company, the plaintiff in this action. The latter was a corporation organized to succeed to the business of the former and became the owner of all its assets at that time. Prior thereto defendant had furnished and been paid for two carloads of Ko-Hi flasks. Defendant had notice of the transfer to plaintiff as early as July 1, 1916. Between that date and August 25th following, defendant furnished the plaintiff, at various times and upon its orders and specifications, 1 carload of flasks. They were furnished and paid for in accordance with the terms of the contract. Between

A. 2d) 269 Fed. 903, decided November 12, 1920, "the entire supply of half-tone newspaper required to print rotogravure supplements, * * * estimated at 400 tons."

August 25 and October 1, 1916, plaintiff furnished specifications and delivered orders to defendant for 13 carloads of flasks, and was able and offered to pay for them in cash at the contract price before they were shipped, but defendant refused to furnish any of them. The difference between the contract price of the flasks and their market price when defendant refused to deliver them was $1,993.70. This amount, with interest from January 1, 1917, was awarded to plaintiff.

The questions we are called upon to decide are: (1) Whether the contract was void for want of mutuality either generally or as to the flasks ordered in excess of 12 carloads. (2) Whether the contract was assignable, and, if not, whether defendant is estopped from defending on that ground.[57]

1. The contract contains an agreement by the glass company to sell, and an agreement by the Koehler & Hinrichs Company to buy a definite quantity of flasks at a stipulated price, payable on a day certain. It provides for delivery of the flasks upon specifications to be furnished by the buyer within a stated time, and it contains the clause we have quoted, giving to the buyer the privilege of increasing the quantity of flasks.

As to the 12 carloads, it is quite clear that the promises were not all on one side, for there is an express agreement on the one hand to sell and on the other to buy. Each party could hold the other to the performance of its agreement. The promises were mutual, were made at the same time, and are incorporated in a bilateral contract. Such promises so made are a sufficient consideration for each other. 1 Dun. Dig. § 1758; Ellsworth v. S. M. Ry. Ex. Co., 31 Minn. 543–549, 18 N. W. 822; Bayne v. Greiner's Estate, 118 Minn. 350, 136 N. W. 1041; Page on Contracts, § 296.

Furthermore, the parties, by their acts after the contract was executed, treated it as one having mutuality of obligation. In March, 1916, the buyer sought to have it canceled. The seller offered to cancel it if paid $500, and used this language in its letter in reply to the request for cancellation:

"This contract is certainly a liability of the Koehler & Hinrichs Company in case our factory sees fit to enforce it."

Later it wrote that it preferred to furnish the flasks specified in the contract at the contract price, and did not wish to cancel it or release the buyer. No further attempt was made to do away with the contract, but, on the contrary, it was acted upon by the delivery to plaintiff in small lots of another carload of flasks. The conduct of the parties amounted to a practical recognition of the binding effect of the contract in so far as the sale of 12 carloads of flasks was involved, and we decline to hold that it was void for want of mutuality.

The court found that 3 carloads of flasks were delivered, leaving 9 to be delivered if there had been no increase in the quantity definitely specified in the contract. Thirteen carloads more were ordered, but not delivered, and damages were awarded for the failure to make delivery of that quantity, the court giving effect to the option clause in the contract. It is confidently asserted in defendant's behalf that this portion of the contract is unilateral and not supported by any consideration. We have examined the authorities cited to sustain this contention, but think it is unnecessary to go beyond our own decisions in disposing of the question. It has been before the courts on many occasions. There is some diversity of opinion concerning the principles involved and more in their application to specific cases. This court is now definitely committed to the rule that if the party holding an option under a contract has bought his option for value paid or absolutely agreed to be paid, he may enforce it. Staples v. O'Neal, 64 Minn. 27, 65 N. W. 1083; Gregory v. Shapiro, 125 Minn. 81, 145 N. W. 791; Murphy v. Anderson, 128 Minn. 106, 150 N. W. 387; First Nat. Bank v. Corp. Securities Co., 128 Minn. 341, 150 N. W. 1084; Scott v. Stevenson Co., 130 Minn. 151, 153 N. W. 316. The rule has been approved by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit. Conley, etc., Co. v. Multiscope, etc., Co., 216 Fed. 892, 133 C. C. A. 96.

The rule applies to the option given to the buyer in the contract now under consideration. It was bound to take and pay for 12 carloads of flasks. This obligation furnished the consideration not only for the seller's promise to furnish them, but also for its promise to furnish a greater quantity if ordered by the buyer in accordance with the terms of its option. The fact that some of the flasks were to be shipped to Chicago, presumably for resale at a profit in a territory not theretofore covered by plaintiff, is of no importance. The option gave the buyer "the privilege of increasing quantity as much as they may desire * * * during the period covered by this contract." We find nothing in the language employed indicating that it was the purpose of the parties to limit the quantity the buyer might order to the reasonable necessities of its established trade at St. Paul. * * *

RAGUE v. NEW YORK EVENING JOURNAL PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1914. 164 App. Div. 126, 149 N. Y. Supp. 668.)

Action by William J. Rague against the New York Evening Journal Publishing Company. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, he appeals. Reversed, and motion granted.

THOMAS, J. The plaintiff was earning $21 per week from the sale and distribution of the Evening Telegram. The defendant requested him to discontinue the distribution, with an offer to pay him therefor $10.50 per week as long as he abstained from such sale and distribution. The plaintiff, induced thereby, relinquished the same, and has not resumed it. The defendant for several months paid the sum stipulated, and then declined further payment.

The contract by its terms was not within the statute of frauds with reference to its completion within one year. Kent v. Kent, 62 N. Y. 560. It was not without consideration, as the plaintiff abandoned a valuable business. The duration of the contract was not unmeasured, as it would continue until plaintiff did an act, viz., resumed the sale of the Telegram. Harrington v. Kansas City Cable Ry. Co., 60 Mo. App. 223; Carter White Lead Co. v. Kinlin, 47 Neb. 409, 66 N. W. 536; McMullan v. Dickinson Co., 63 Minn. 405, 65 N. W. 661, 663.

But it is urged that the contract failed in mutuality. There was all the mutuality that the nature of defendant's offer permitted. The plaintiff was not asked to promise, but to do an act. He made renunciation of profitable employment and was continuing it. That was exact acceptance of all that was tendered. The plaintiff did not promise, but he did the required thing. Mutuality does not depend on words alone. It is unimportant that the continuance of the renunciation depends upon plaintiff's will. If a master owe, or is claimed to owe, a servant damages for personal injury, and promise him employment in consideration of a release therefor, and the release be given and the employment undertaken, there is mutuality, although the servant may at his will cease working. Carter White Lead Co. v. Kinlin, supra. So when permanent employment is promised upon similar consideration.[59] Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 6 Ind. App. 109, 32 N. E. 802, 51 Am. St. Rep. 289. There was similar decision in Smith v. St. Paul & Duluth R. Co., 60 Minn. 331, 62 N. W. 392; East Line & Red River R. R. Co. v. Scott, 72 Tex. 70, 10 S. W. 99, 13 Am. St. Rep. 758; McMullan v. Dickinson Co., 63 Minn. 405, 65 N. W. 661, 663. If A. offer to pay B. $500 upon the consideration that the latter lay down a business, B. accepts by laying it down. The case does not differ in respect to mutuality if the offer be that B. relinquish the business in consideration of the payment of fixed installments, while the relinquishment continues and B. acts upon it. In either case, the offer, upon B.'s compliance, becomes an obligatory promise, based upon good consideration.

Both upon principle and authority the order should be reversed, with $10 costs and disbursements, and the motion for judgment granted, with $10 costs. All concur.[60]

WOOD v. LUCY, LADY DUFF-GORDON.

CARDOZO, J. The defendant styles herself "a creator of fashions." Her favor helps a sale. Manufacturers of dresses, millinery, and like articles are glad to pay for a certificate of her approval. The things which she designs, fabrics, parasols, and what not, have a new value in the public mind when issued in her name. She employed the plaintiff to help her to turn this vogue into money. He was to have the exclusive right, subject always to her approval, to place her indorsements on the designs of others. He was also to have the exclusive right to place her own designs on sale, or to license others to market them. In return she was to have one-half of "all profits and revenues" derived from any contracts he might make. The exclusive right was to last at least one year from April 1, 1915, and thereafter from year to year unless terminated by notice of 90 days. The plaintiff says that he kept the contract on his part, and that the defendant broke it. She placed her indorsement on fabrics, dresses, and millinery without his knowledge, and withheld the profits. He sues her for the damages, and the case comes here on demurrer.

The agreement of employment is signed by both parties. It has a wealth of recitals. The defendant insists, however, that it lacks the elements of a contract. She says that the plaintiff does not bind himself to anything. It is true that he does not promise in so many words that he will use reasonable efforts to place the defendant's indorsements and market her designs. We think, however, that such a promise is fairly to be implied. The law has outgrown its primitive stage of formalism when the precise word was the sovereign talisman, and every slip was fatal. It takes a broader view to-day. A promise may be lacking, and yet the whole writing may be "instinct with an obligation," imperfectly expressed (Scott, J., in McCall Co. v. Wright, 133 App. Div. 62, 117 N. Y. Supp. 775; Moran v. Standard Oil Co., 211 N. Y. 187, 198, 105 N. E. 217). If that is so, there is a contract.

The implication of a promise here finds support in many circumstances. The defendant gave an exclusive privilege. She was to have no right for at least a year to place her own indorsements or market her own designs except through the agency of the plaintiff. The acceptance of the exclusive agency was an assumption of its duties. Phœnix Hermetic Co. v. Filtrine Mfg. Co., 164 App. Div. 424, 150 N. Y. Supp. 193; W. G. Taylor Co. v. Bannerman, 120 Wis. 189, 97 N. W. 918; Mueller v. Mineral Spring Co., 88 Mich. 390, 50 N. W. 319. We are not to suppose that one party was to be placed at the mercy of the other. Hearn v. Stevens & Bro., 111 App. Div. 101, 106, 97 N. Y. Supp. 566; Russell v. Allerton, 108 N. Y. 288, 15 N. E. 391. Many other terms of the agreement point the same way. We are told at the outset by way of recital that:

"The said Otis F. Wood possesses a business organization adapted to the placing of such indorsements as the said Lucy, Lady Duff-Gordon, has approved."

The implication is that the plaintiff's business organization will be used for the purpose for which it is adapted. But the terms of the defendant's compensation are even more significant. Her sole compensation for the grant of an exclusive agency is to be one-half of all the profits resulting from the plaintiff's efforts. Unless he gave his efforts, she could never get anything. Without an implied promise, the transaction cannot have such business "efficacy, as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have." Bowen, L. J., in The Moorcock, 14 P. D. 64, 68. But the contract does not stop there. The plaintiff goes on to promise that he will account monthly for all moneys received by him, and that he will take out all such patents and copyrights and trade-marks as may in his judgment be necessary to protect the rights and articles affected by the agreement. It is true, of course, as the Appellate Division has said, that if he was under no duty to try to market designs or to place certificates of indorsement, his promise to account for profits or take out copyrights would be valueless. But in determining the intention of the parties the promise has a value. It helps to enforce the conclusion that the plaintiff had some duties. His promise to pay the defendant one-half of the profits and revenues resulting from the exclusive agency and to render accounts monthly was a promise to use reasonable efforts to bring profits and revenues into existence. For this conclusion the authorities are ample. Wilson v. Mechanical Orguinette Co., 170 N. Y. 542, 63 N. E. 550; Phœnix Hermetic Co. v. Filtrine Mfg. Co., supra; Jacquin v. Boutard, 89 Hun, 437, 35 N. Y. Supp. 496; Id., 157 N. Y. 686, 51 N. E. 1091; Moran v. Standard Oil Co., supra; City of N. Y. v. Paoli, 202 N. Y. 18, 94 N. E. 1077; McIntyre v. Belcher, 14 C. B. (N. Co., 1 App. Div. 507, 37 N. Y. Supp. 276.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the order of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in the Appellate Division and in this court.

VICKREY et al. v. MAIER et al.

(Supreme Court of California, 1913. 164 Cal. 384, 129 Pac. 273.)

Action by O. A. Vickrey and another against Simon Maier and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

SHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

The complaint is in three counts upon three contracts of similar form. The first is dated November 14, 1905, and is for the sale of 10 shares of the Maier Packing Company, a corporation, at $5,000. The second and third are dated, respectively, August 20, and November 10, 1906; the second being for 20 shares of said stock at $10,000, and the third for 30 shares at $15,000. A consideration of the first contract will be determinative of all questions presented, except that of the statute of limitations.

On November 14, 1905, plaintiffs subscribed for the 10 shares of stock, and paid $5,000 to said company therefor; that being the par value. The shares were issued to them on February 20, 1906, and they have ever since held and owned the same. Upon the date they subscribed the plaintiffs and defendants executed a written agreement as follows: "This agreement made and entered into this 14th day of November, 1905, by and between Simon Maier and John T. Jones, parties of the first part, and O. A. and B. L. Vickrey, party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas said second party has subscribed for 10 shares of the capital stock of the Maier Packing Co., a corporation, the first parties are desirous of securing the first right to purchase said stock in the event second party may desire to sell the same: Now, therefore, said second party agrees that, before offering said stock for sale, he will first notify first parties and give them the first right to buy the same at the price offered by any bona fide intending purchaser. In consideration of which said first parties agree and obligate themselves to pay or cause to be paid to second party a dividend of six per cent. per annum on said stock, payable quarterly, and that at any time after six months from date hereof, on ninety days' notice, they will purchase said stock at the price paid therefor and six per cent. per annum from date of payment of last dividend, but the party of the second part shall not be obligated to sell said stock at the price paid therefor."

Dividends of 6 per cent. per annum were regularly paid by said company on said stock down to and including the quarterly dividend due on July 3, 1909. In each of the last two counts the date "July 3, 1909," is, by what is obviously a clerical error, written July 3, 1910. We attach no importance to this misprision and disregard it entirely. No other dividends have been paid on the stock. On March 4, 1910, the plaintiffs gave to the defendants the following notice: "Messrs. Simon Maier and John T. Jones—Gentlemen: In accordance with the provisions contained in three certain agreements between yourselves upon the one part and the undersigned upon the other, of date of November 14, 1905, August 20, 1906, and November 10, 1906, respectively, at which times the undersigned purchased from the Maier Packing Company, a corporation, ten (10), twenty (20), and thirty (30) shares of its capital stock, respectively, making a total purchase of sixty (60) shares of the capital stock of the Maier Packing Company for the sum of thirty thousand ($30,000) dollars, we request and demand that you carry out the provisions of said agreements and each thereof by paying or causing to be paid to the undersigned all dividends now in arrears upon said stock at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and we further request and demand that you comply with the provisions of said agreements and each thereof by purchasing on or before ninety (90) days from date hereof said sixty (60) shares of stock and paying us therefor the price paid for the same, to wit, the sum of $30,000, and in addition thereto all said sums now unpaid on account of dividends."

On September 12, 1910, plaintiffs tendered to defendants the said shares of stock, and demanded that the defendants should pay to plaintiffs the price paid by the plaintiffs therefor, to wit, $5,000, and the further sum of $355.67 as interest on the $5,000, from the date of payment of said last paid dividend to the date of the demand. The defendants refused and still refuse to perform said agreement of November 14, 1905, and have not paid said sums or any part thereof. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment for $32,134.01, being the aggregate amount demanded upon the three contracts, including purchase price and dividends unpaid. The action was begun on the day of the tender and immediately thereafter.

The only defenses alleged in the answer are that there was no consideration for the agreements sued on, and that the action is barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing four years as the period of limitation. No evidence was offered in support of either of the defenses, and the plaintiffs offered no evidence to prove a consideration. Upon the foregoing facts the court below gave judgment for the defendants.

The complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The agreement bound the defendants to perform two things: First, to pay, or cause to be paid, quarterly, a dividend on the stock at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; second, to repurchase the stock at the price which the plaintiffs had paid therefor, with interest from the date of the payment of the last dividend. No dividend has been paid for the year beginning July 3, 1909. The dividends for that year on the 10 shares of stock covered by the first contract amounted to $300. The defendants had agreed to pay this sum to plaintiffs, and had failed to do so, although it was past due. It was a direct undertaking for the payment of money, and upon a breach thereof they were immediately liable. The plaintiffs were therefore at least entitled to recover the amounts of the quarterly dividends on all the stock due and remaining unpaid at the time the action was begun.

There is no merit in the claim that the agreement was without consideration. Under the presumption in favor of written agreements, as provided by section 1614 of the Civil Code, in the absence of proof to the contrary, an adequate consideration must be presumed to have passed, and, if necessary, we must assume that it consisted of something of value not mentioned in the agreement itself, unless the terms of the agreement are such as to exclude or forbid such assumption. If the contract had not recited any consideration, the fact that it was in writing would therefore be sufficient evidence thereof. But the agreement, on its face, shows a consideration. It is a well-established rule of the law of contracts that a promise by one party may be a sufficient consideration for the promise of another; that where there are mutual or reciprocal promises in a written agreement each constitutes a consideration for the other, particularly where it is expressly so declared. Gallagher v. Equitable, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 707, 75 Pac. 329; Van Loben Sels v. Bunnell, 120 Cal. 682, 53 Pac. 266; 1 Parsons on Cont. *p. 449; 1 Page on Cont. § 296; 1 Beach on Cont. § 178. Here the plaintiffs agreed that if they chose to sell the stock they would give the defendants a preferred right to buy it over all other purchasers. The defendants deemed this a valuable thing, and in consideration therefor they agreed to pay dividends on the stock, and also to buy the stock at plaintiff's option at any time after 6 months, on 90 days' notice, at a stated price. Under the authorities there was a sufficient consideration.

[The court then proceeded to discuss the application of the statute of limitations, and held that it would not begin to run from the end of the six months period next succeeding the making of the contract, at which time the plaintiff's power of acceptance by giving notice would first exist, but from the time when the defendant refused to perform his duty to pay after the end of the 90-day period and the tender of the stock.]

[62] "Mutuality" of legal duty is not necessary to the validity of a contract. A promise is enforceable, even though the promisee has the option of doing nothing further, provided he has already performed the agreed consideration for the promise. Hills v. Hopp, 287 Ill. 375, 122 N. E. 510 (1919), sale of stock with agreement to buy it back, if buyer should be dissatisfied; Murphy v. Hanna, 37 N. D. 156, 164 N. W. 32, L. R. A. 1918B, 135 (1917), securities delivered in return for promise to lend money as desired; Ziehm v. Frank Steil Brewing Co. of Baltimore City, 131 Md. 582, 102 Atl. 1005 (1917), debt to a third party guaranteed in return for promise to buy beer of promisee only, the latter making no promise to supply beer; Himrod Furnace Co. v. Cleveland & M. R. Co., 22 Ohio St. 451 (1872); Rague v. New York Evening Journal Pub. Co., 164 App. Div. 126, 149 N. Y. Supp. 668 (1914), ante; Western Newspaper Union v. Kitchel, 201 Mich. 121, 166 N. W. 1021 (1918); Underwood Typewriter Co. v. Century Realty Co., 220 Mo. 522, 119 S. W. 400, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1173 (1909), ante; Eldorado Ice & Planing Mill Co. v. Kinard, 96 Ark. 184, 131 S. W. 460 (1910); Nolle v. Mutual Union Brewing Co., 264 Pa. 534, 108 Atl. 23 (1919); and see cases on Acceptance by Act or Forbearance, ante, chap. I, sec. 4.

Further, a promise is not itself insufficient as consideration for a return promise merely because it is conditional even though there may be an option left to the promisor. Scott v. Moragues Lumber Co., 202 Ala. 312, 80 South. 394 (1918), mutual promises to charter a vessel in case defendant should buy one; Golden Cycle Min. Co. v. Rapson Coal Min. Co., 188 Fed. 179, 112 C. C. A. 95 (1911), sale of all the coal that buyer "may use" on its mine; Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218 (1891).

A bilateral contract is not invalidated by the fact that one party retains the power of terminating it by giving a specified notice or by doing some other voluntary act. McMullan v. Dickinson Co., 63 Minn. 405, 65 N. W. 661, 663 (1896); Thomas v. Anthony, 30 Cal. App. 217, 157 Pac. 823 (1916); Pilkington v. Scott, 15 M. & W. 657 (1846); Merchants' Life Ins. Co. v. Griswold (Tex. Civ. App.) 212 S. W. 807 (1919).

A lease for which cash was paid is not invalidated by a provision giving the lessee the "option" of surrendering it at any time. Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine (Okl.) 175 Pac. 533, 3 A. L. R. 344 (1918); Rich v. Doneghey (Okl.) 177 Pac. 86, 3 A. L. R. 352 (1918), where the court said: "The trial court held that the contract granting this present vested interest in the land was 'unilateral and void.' Strictly speaking, a unilateral contract is one in which there is a promise on one side only, the consideration on the other side being executed. Evidently the term was not used in that sense by the trial court, for such contracts are not void, but are equally as valid as bilateral contracts, consisting solely of mutual promises to do some future act, in which the consideration of the promise of one party is a promise on the part of the other. The term 'unilateral' is often used to express absence of mutuality. In the case of contracts made up solely of mutual promises, each the consideration for the other, where the promises of one party are so expressed as not to be absolutely binding on him, but to be performed only if such party so wills, or a promise on but one side and no consideration therefor, the one who makes the absolute promise in the one case, or the sole promise in the other, is not bound to perform. The reason sometimes given is that the contract is unilateral, or void for want of mutuality. The real reason is that there is not a sufficient consideration for the promise. 'Consideration is essential; mutuality of obligation is not, unless the want of mutuality would leave one party without a valid or available consideration for his promise.' "

MURPHY v. HANNA et al.

(Supreme Court of North Dakota. 1917. 37 N. D. 156, 164 N. W. 32, L. R. A. 1918B, 135.)

Action by Michael Murphy, receiver of the Medina State Bank against L. B. Hanna and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

BIRDZELL, J.[63] * * * The complaint alleges an agreement between the Medina State Bank, on the one side, and the defendants, jointly and severally, on the other, whereby the bank should deliver such of its unpaid bills receivable as the defendant should elect to receive as collateral security, in consideration of which and of the promise to repay the defendants would advance to the plaintiff bank sufficient cash to meet all its obligations and enable it to continue its banking business. It is further alleged as the understanding of the parties at the time that the amount needed would be upward of $20,000. While the complaint is replete with allegations setting forth the inducement of the contract, and circumstances which, if proved, might be proper to consider in determining the amount of damages recoverable—allegations in aggravation of damages—the foregoing statement comprises all the allegations touching the terms of the contract entered into. Immediately following the foregoing is an allegation of at least a partial performance of the agreement set forth. It is alleged that in carrying out the terms of the agreement the defendant selected and the plaintiff delivered to them bills receivable of the approximate value of $20,000, for the purpose of furnishing collateral to such advances, which bills made up and constituted the assets of the bank that were of such character as to be readily convertible into cash. A careful examination of the allegations of the contract, construed in the light of the inducing matter, but separate and apart from the allegations as to what was done under it, leads us to conclude that as a wholly executory, bilateral contract it was not enforceable, by reason of a lack of mutuality of obligations. Viewed as an executory contract, it is clear that the State Bank of Medina bound itself to borrow no money from the defendants, either absolutely or conditionally. If the plaintiff bank had, after making the agreement above referred to, found another bank or an individual that would have been willing to advance the necessary cash upon more favorable terms than those alleged, or reasonably implied from those alleged, it could not, with reason, be contended that they would have been in any way liable to the defendants, had they borrowed money from such third party. Austin Real Estate & Abstract Co. v. Bahn, 87 Tex. 582, 29 S. W. 646, 30 S. W. 430; McMannus v. Bark, L. R. 5 Ex. 65. In the Texas case referred to, the creditor agreed to an extension of one week, in consideration of the promise of the debtor to pay within that time, and it was held that the promise of the creditor was without any consideration, for the reason that the debtor was not obliged to retain the money or to pay interest for any period.

The complaint in the case at bar states no fact from which it can reasonably be inferred that the State Bank of Medina became bound to borrow any money from the defendants, and in so far as it sought to hold the defendants liable for the repudiation of an obligation to loan money, resting upon a counter obligation to borrow, we find no such corresponding promise or obligation on the part of the plaintiff; nor is there any allegation from which it can be reasonably inferred that any other detriment was suffered, or consideration furnished by the defendants. In the case of Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218, so much relied upon by appellant in the case at bar, there was a proposal to furnish certain steamers with such coal as would be required for a stated period. The acceptance of the proposal bound the owners to purchase such coal as would be required in the operation of the vessels. Mutuality of obligation was present, in that the purchasers were bound by their acceptance to purchase the coal required from the sellers. The contract thus formed was thus mutually obligatory from the beginning, and while prospectively indefinite as to subject-matter, it nevertheless contained its own measure of definiteness as to quantity. The court applied the maxim "Certum est quod certum reddi potest," and held that damages were recoverable for breach of the contract.

There are many cases in the books in which it is held that damages may be recovered for breach of contract, where the measure of performance is indefinite, in the sense that exact quantities cannot be determined in advance, as where, for instance, the quantity is to be determined by the necessities of a business or the reasonable requirements of a factory. Hickey v. O'Brien, 123 Mich. 611, 82 N. W. 241, 49 L. R. A. 594, 81 Am. St. Rep. 227; Dailey v. Clark, 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761; Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co., 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529. But see Jenkins & Co. v. Anaheim Sugar Co. (D. C.) 237 Fed. 278 [reversed by 247 Fed. 958, 160 C. C. A. 658, L. R. A. 1918E, 293]. But in all such cases upon analysis it will be found that the contracts involved mutuality of obligation, in that both parties had restricted their contractual freedom by binding themselves mutually to the terms of an agreement involving a limitation of legal rights—the purchasers being as much bound to look to the particular source for the goods required as were the vendors to supply them. In this there was consideration and mutuality of obligation. In our opinion there is a clear distinction between a case where a merchant agrees to buy from a certain seller such a quantity of a certain kind of goods as he may require in the operation of his business, and an agreement by a borrower to borrow sufficient money to meet his existing obligations, the whole of which sum he could return at once without sustaining any liability whatsoever. The contract set forth in the complaint is of this character, and it is consequently lacking in the essentials necessary to make it a binding obligation for the loaning and borrowing of money. In so far as the complaint purports to state a cause of action for the breach of a wholly executory contract to loan money, and in so far as special damages are predicated upon the breach of such a contract, the complaint is demurrable, and the special damages are not recoverable.

But the foregoing considerations do not wholly dispose of the questions raised on this appeal. The complaint alleges more than a purely executory contract. It alleges, as hereinbefore stated, the circumstances in which the parties were negotiating, their purposes, and the objects which they had in view, as well as the doing of certain things by way of conforming to those purposes and realizing the objects. These allegations give rise to an additional inquiry to determine whether a cause of action in contract is stated. A contract may fail wholly as an executory agreement, carrying mutual obligations of the parties from the time it is made, and yet result in contractual obligations depending upon what is done in pursuance of it. Says Baron Parke in the case of Kenneway v. Treleavan, 5 M. & W. 498, 151 Eng. Rep. 211:

"But a great number of cases are of contracts not binding on both sides at the time when made, and in which the whole duty to be performed rests with one of the contracting parties. A guaranty falls under that class. When a person says, 'In case you choose to employ this man as your agent for a week, I will be responsible for all such sums as he shall receive during that time, and neglect to pay over to you,' the party indemnified is not therefore bound to employ the person designated by the guaranty; but, if he do employ him, then the guaranty attaches, and becomes binding on the party who gave it."

In the case of Chicago & Great Eastern R. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240, the defendant wrote a letter agreeing to receive and transport not exceeding 600 tons of freight, on account of the Chicago & Great Eastern Railroad Company, the addressee of the letter. The plaintiff railway company promptly answered the letter as follows: "In behalf of this company I assent to your agreement, and will be bound by its terms."

The court held that the word "agree" in the defendant's letter was equivalent to "offer," and that the plaintiff offeree had manifested an unqualified assent to the terms of the offer. No contract resulted, for the reason that the plaintiff had in no way bound itself by its acceptance. The court in speaking of the effect of the purported acceptance, said (page 242): "This amounted to nothing more than the acceptance of an option by the plaintiff for the transportation of such quantity of iron by the defendants as it chose; and had there been a consideration given to the defendants for such option, the defendants would have been bound to transport for the plaintiff such iron as it required within the time and quantity specified, the plaintiff having at its election not to require the transportation of any. * * * There being no consideration for the promise of the defendants, except this acceptance by the plaintiff, and that not binding it to furnish any iron for transportation unless it chose, it follows that there was no consideration for any promise of the defendants, and that the breach of such promise furnishes no foundation for an action."

The court further held that, though the offer and purported acceptance created no contractual obligation, the defendant would have been bound, had the plaintiff accepted defendant's proposition for any specific quantity not beyond that limited.

[The court here discussed Thayer et al. v. Burchard et al., 99 Mass. 508; Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co., supra, 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529; Jones v. In the case at bar it is alleged that the defendants selected and the plaintiff turned over to them bills receivable to the value of about $20,000, and that this was done in pursuance of the agreement whereby the defendants had undertaken to loan money to the plaintiff bank. Even though the defendants' promise was not binding at the time it was made, by reason of a lack of a corresponding obligation on the part of the plaintiff to borrow money, yet they are in the position, as a result of the agreement (using this term in the sense of common understanding, rather than as referring to a legally binding contract) entered into, of offering to loan to the plaintiff money in exchange for collateral to be selected by the defendants and turned over by plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges a full compliance with the terms upon which the defendants were willing and offered to loan money, and it further alleges that the defendants repudiated their agreement and "refused to advance any money to said bank to enable it to continue in business."

We are of the opinion that a contractual relation between the Medina State Bank and the defendants sprang into existence by reason of the selection and acceptance by the defendants of the collateral security. In the absence of any express agreement or understanding, the defendants thereby became obligated to loan to the Medina State Bank such a sum of money as would ordinarily be loaned by one bank or individual to another upon such collateral security, under all the circumstances then existing and contemplated by the parties. It will be competent to show, however, with what mutual understanding, if any, the plaintiff bank parted with the securities which, it is alleged, were turned over to the defendants. It is, of course, self-evident that the defendants could, in no event, be held to have agreed to loan a sum in excess of that for which the $20,000 of collateral selected by them was, under the arrangement alleged, considered by the parties to be adequate security, and the only damages which defendants could be holden for are those shown to have resulted from their failure to loan such amount of money. As this case is before us on a demurrer, we are, of course, wholly in the dark with respect to the actual facts in the case, and must accept the facts stated in the complaint as true, with reasonable inferences in their favor.

It is true that the complaint sets forth no specific promise to loan a definite sum of money; but we are satisfied that, if the evidence should clearly establish the facts alleged with reference to the understanding of the parties at the time, the jury would have a right to infer from such facts an agreement to advance what would be considered a reasonable sum, in view of all the circumstances, including the value of the securities turned over. This matter, however, must depend wholly upon the evidence to be adduced at the trial. It must be borne in mind that the transaction alleged is unusual, that it was made for a special purpose, and that defendants had an apparent interest in the accomplishment of the objects sought to be attained, chief of which was the continued existence of the bank. It is not only alleged that the assets turned over to the defendants were of the value of about $20,000, but it is also alleged that they constituted "the assets of [the] bank that were of the character that could be speedily converted into cash or made available to enable such bank to continue in business."

A contract may be somewhat ambiguous and indefinite, not merely as a result of words employed by the parties, but as a consequence of more or less equivocal acts as well. In such cases it is fundamental that, in measuring the obligation which one assumes by reason of his words or conduct, it is competent to consider the surrounding circumstances, in order that the intention of the parties may be applied and the obligation measured by the standard employed by the parties during their negotiations. Merriam v. United States, 107 U. S. 437, 2 Sup. Ct. 536, 27 L. Ed. 531; 9 Cyc. 587, 588. The allegations quoted above, if established, would, in our judgment, amount to what is termed by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the case of the First National Bank v. Watkins, 154 Mass. 385, 28 N. E. 275, "an ordinary case of a unilateral contract growing out of the offer of one party to do something if the other will do or refrain from doing something else," and where it was held that: "If the party to whom such an offer is made acts upon it in the manner contemplated, either to the advantage of the offerer or to his own disadvantage, such action makes the contract complete." * * *

SECTION 5.—PERFORMANCE OF PRE-EXISTING LEGAL DUTY

(Including Promises of Such Performance)

REYNOLDS v. PINHOWE.

(In the King's Bench, 1595. Cro. Eliz. 429.)

Assumpsit. Whereas the defendant had recovered five pounds against the plaintiff; in consideration of four pounds given him by the plaintiff, that the defendant assumed to acknowledge satisfaction of that judgment before such a day; and that he had not done it. And it was thereupon demurred; for it was moved, that there was not any consideration; for it is no more than to give him part of the money which he owed him, which is not any consideration.—But all THE COURT held it to be well enough; for it is a benefit unto him to have it without suit or charge: and it may be there was error in the record, so as the party might have avoided it. Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.[64]

FOAKES v. BEER.

(In the House of Lords, 1884. L. R. 9 App. Cas. 605.)

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal.

On August 11th, 1875, the respondent recovered judgment against the appellant for £2,077 17s. 2d. for debt and £13 1s. 10d. for costs. On December 21st, 1876, a memorandum of agreement was made and signed by the appellant and respondent in the following terms:

"Whereas the said John Weston Foakes is indebted to the said Julia Beer, and she has obtained a judgment in her Majesty's High Court of Justice, Exchequer Division, for the sum of £2,090 19s. And whereas the said John Weston Foakes has requested the said Julia Beer to give him time in which to pay such judgment, which she has agreed to do on the following conditions. Now this agreement witnesseth that in consideration of the said John Weston Foakes paying to the said Julia Beer on the signing of this agreement the sum of £500, the receipt whereof she doth hereby acknowledge in part satisfaction of the said judgment debt of £2,090 19s., and on condition of his paying to her or her executors, administrators, assigns or nominee the sum of £150 on July 1st and January 1st or within one calendar month after each of the said days respectively in every year until the whole of the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied, the first of such payments to be made on July 1st next, then she the said Julia Beer hereby undertakes and agrees that she, her executors, administrators or assigns, will not take any proceedings whatever on the said judgment."

The respondent having in June, 1882, taken out a summons for leave to proceed on the judgment, an issue was directed to be tried between the respondent as plaintiff and the appellant as defendant whether any and what amount was on July 1st, 1882, due upon the judgment.

At the trial of the issue before Cave, J., it was proved that the whole sum of £2,090 19s. had been paid by instalments, but the respondent claimed interest. The jury under his Lordship's direction found that the appellant had paid all the sums which by the agreement of December 21st, 1876, he undertook to pay and within the times therein specified. Cave, J., was of opinion that whether the judgment was satisfied or not, the respondent was, by reason of the agreement, not entitled to issue execution for any sum on the judgment.

The Queen's Bench Division (Watkin Williams and Mathew, JJ.) discharged an order for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

The Court of Appeal (Brett, M. R., Lindley, and Fry, L. JJ.) reversed that decision and entered judgment for the respondent for the interest due, with costs.[65] * * *

Lord BLACKBURN.[66] My Lords, the first question raised is as to what was the true construction of the memorandum of agreement made on December 21st, 1876. What was it that the parties by that writing agreed to?

The appellants contend that they meant that on payment down of £500, and payment within a month after July 1st and January 1st in each ensuing year of £150, until the sum of £2,090 19s. was paid, the judgment for that sum and interest should be satisfied, for an agreement to take no proceedings on the judgment is equivalent to treating it as satisfied. This construction of the memorandum requires that after the tenth payment of £150 there should be a further payment of £90 19s. made within the next six months. This is the construction which all three Courts below have put upon the memorandum.

The respondent contends that the true construction of the memorandum was that time was to be given on those conditions for five years, the judgment being on default of any one payment enforceable for whatever was still unpaid, with interest from the date the judgment was signed, but that the interest was not intended to be forgiven at all.

[65] 11 Q. B. Div. 221.

[66] The concurring opinions of Selborne, L. C., and of Lords Fitzgerald and Watson are omitted.

If this is the true construction of the agreement the judgment appealed against is right and should be affirmed, whether the reason on which the Court of Appeal founded its judgment was right or not. I am, however, of opinion that the Courts below, who on this point were unanimous, put the true construction on the memorandum. I do not think the question free from difficulty. It would have been easy to have expressed, in unmistakable words, that on payment down of £500, and punctual payment at the rate of £300 a year till £2,090 19s. was paid, the judgment should not be enforced either for principal or interest; or language might have been used which should equally clearly have expressed that, though time was to be given, interest was to be paid in addition to the instalments. The words actually used are such that I think it is quite possible that the two parties put a different construction on the words at the time; but I think the words "till the said sum of £2,090 19s. shall have been fully paid and satisfied" cannot be construed as meaning "till that sum, with interest from the day judgment was signed, shall have been fully paid and satisfied," nor can the promise "not to take any proceedings whatever on the judgment" be cut down to meaning any proceedings except those necessary to enforce payment of interest.

I think, therefore, that it is necessary to consider the ground on which the Court of Appeal did base their judgment, and to say whether the agreement can be enforced. I construe it as accepting and taking £500 in satisfaction of the whole £2,090 19s., subject to the condition that unless the balance of the principal debt was paid by the instalments, the whole might be enforced with interest. If, instead of £500 in money, it had been a horse valued at £500 or a promissory note for £500, the authorities are that it would have been a good satisfaction, but it is said to be otherwise as it was money.

This is a question, I think, of difficulty.

In Coke, Littleton, 212b, Lord Coke says: "Where the condition is for payment of £20, the obligor or feoffor cannot at the time appointed pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater. * * * If the obligor or feoffor pay a lesser sum either before the day or at another place than is limited by the condition, and the obligee or feoffee receiveth it, this is a good satisfaction." For this he cites Pinnel's Case [5 Rep. 117a]. That was an action on a bond for £16, conditioned for the payment of £8 10s. on November 11th, 1600. Plea that defendant, at plaintiff's request, before the said day, to wit, on October 1st, paid to the plaintiff £5 2s. 2d., which the plaintiff accepted in full satisfaction of the £8 10s. The plaintiff had judgment for the insufficient pleading. But though this was so, Lord Coke reports that it was resolved by the whole Court of Common Pleas "that payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction of a greater cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum; but the gift of a horse, hawk, or robe, etc., in satisfaction is good, for it shall be intended that a horse, hawk, or robe, etc., might be more beneficial to the plaintiff than the money, in respect of some circumstance, or otherwise the plaintiff would not have accepted of it in satisfaction.[67] But when the whole sum is due, by no intendment the acceptance of parcel can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff; but in the case at bar it was resolved that the payment and acceptance of parcel before the day in satisfaction of the whole would be a good satisfaction in regard of circumstance of time; for peradventure parcel of it before the day would be more beneficial to him than the whole at the day, and the value of the satisfaction is not material; so if I am bound in £20 to pay you £10 at Westminster, and you request me to pay you £5 at the day at York, and you will accept it in full satisfaction for the whole £10, it is a good satisfaction for the whole, for the expenses to pay it at York is sufficient satisfaction."

There are two things here resolved. First, that where a matter paid and accepted in satisfaction of a debt certain might by any possibility be more beneficial to the creditor than his debt, the Court will not inquire into the adequacy of the consideration. If the creditor, without any fraud, accepted it in satisfaction when it was not a sufficient satisfaction it was his own fault. And that payment before the day might be more beneficial, and consequently that the plea was in substance good, and this must have been decided in the case.

There is a second point stated to have been resolved—viz.: "That payment of a lesser sum on the day cannot be any satisfaction of the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum." This was certainly not necessary for the decision of the case; but though the resolution of the Court of Common Pleas was only a dictum, it seems to me clear that Lord Coke deliberately adopted the dictum, and the great weight of his authority makes it necessary to be cautious before saying that what he deliberately adopted as law was a mistake, and though I cannot find that in any subsequent case this dictum has been made the ground of the decision, except in Fitch v. Sutton [5 East, 230], as to which I shall make some remarks later, and in Down v. Hatcher [10 A. & E. 121], as to which Parke, B., in Cooper v. Parker [15 C. B. 828], said: "Whenever the question may arise as to whether Down v. Hatcher is good law, I should have a great deal to say against it," yet there certainly are cases in which great judges have treated the dictum in Pinnel's Case as good law.

[67] Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164, 26 N. E. 351, 11 L. R. A. 710 (1891), debtor gave promissory notes for part, secured by a chattel mortgage, and the debt was held satisfied.

For instance, in Sibree v. Tripp [15 M. & W. 33, 37], Parke, B., says: "It is clear if the claim be a liquidated and ascertained sum, payment of part cannot be satisfaction of the whole, although it may, under certain circumstances, be evidence of a gift of the remainder." And Alderson, B., in the same case says: "It is undoubtedly true that payment of a portion of a liquidated demand, in the same manner as the whole liquidated demand which ought to be paid, is payment only in part, because it is not one bargain, but two—viz., payment of part, and an agreement without consideration to give up the residue. The Courts might very well have held the contrary, and have left the matter to the agreement of the parties, but undoubtedly the law is so settled." After such strong expressions of opinion, I doubt much whether any judge sitting in a Court of the first instance would be justified in treating the question as open. But as this has very seldom, if at all, been the ground of the decision even in a Court of the first instance, and certainly never been the ground of a decision in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, still less in this House, I did think it open in your Lordships' House to reconsider this question. And, notwithstanding the very high authority of Lord Coke, I think it is not the fact that to accept prompt payment of a part only of a liquidated demand, can never be more beneficial than to insist on payment of the whole. And if it be not the fact, it cannot be apparent to the judges.

I will first examine the authorities. If a defendant pleaded the general issue, the plaintiff could join issue at once, and if the case was not defended get his verdict at the next assizes. But by pleading a special plea, the plaintiff was obliged to reply, and the defendant often caused the plaintiff, merely by the delay occasioned by replying, to lose an assize. If the replication was one to which he could demur he made this sure. Strangely enough it seems long to have been thought that if the defendant kept within reasonable bounds, neither he nor his lawyers were to blame in getting time in this way by a sham plea—that a chattel was given and accepted in satisfaction of the debt. The recognized forms were giving and accepting in satisfaction a beaver hat, Young v. Rudd [5 Mod. 86], or a pipe of wine [3 Chit. Plead. (7th Ed.) 92]. All this is now antiquated. But while it continued to be the practice, the pleas founded on the first part of the resolution in Pinnel's Case were very common, and that law was perfectly trite. No one for a moment supposed that a beaver hat was really given and accepted; but every one knew that the law was that if it was really given and accepted it was a good satisfaction. But special pleas founded on the other resolution in Pinnel's Case, on what I have ventured to call the dictum, were certainly not common. I doubt if a real defence of this sort was ever specially pleaded. When there really was a question as to whether a debt was satisfied by a payment of a smaller sum the defendant pleaded the general issue, and if it was proved to the satisfaction of the jury that a smaller sum had been paid and accepted in satisfaction of a greater, if objection was raised the jury might, perhaps, as suggested by Holroyd, J., in Thomas v. Heathorn [2 B. & C. 482], find that the circumstances were such that the legal effect was to be as if the whole was paid down and a portion thrown back as a god's-penny. This, however, seems to me to be an unsatisfactory and artificial way of avoiding the effect of the dictum, and it could not be applied to such an agreement as that now before this House.

For whatever reason it was, I know of no case in which the question was raised whether a payment of a lesser sum could be satisfaction of a liquidated demand from Pinnel's Case down to Cumber v. Wane, 5 Geo. I [1 Sm. L. C. (8th Ed.) 357], a period of one hundred and fifteen years.

In Adams v. Tapling [4 Mod. 88], where the plea was bad for many other reasons, it is reported to have been said by the Court that: "In covenant where the damages are uncertain, and to be recovered, as in this case, a lesser thing may be done in satisfaction, and there 'accord and satisfaction' is a good plea." No doubt this was one of the cases which Parke, B., would have cited in support of his opinion that Down v. Hatcher [10 A. & E. 121] was not good law. The Court are said to have gone on to recognize the dictum in Pinnel's Case, or at least not to dissent from it, but it was not the ground of their decision. In every other reported case which I have seen the question arose on a demurrer to a replication to what was obviously a sham or dilatory plea.

Some doubt has been made as to what the pleadings in Cumber v. Wane [1 Str. 426] really were. I have obtained the record.[68] The plea is that after the promises aforesaid, and before the issuing of the writ, it was agreed between the said George and Edward Cumber that he, the said George, "daret eidem Edwardo Cumber quandm notam in script vocatam, a promissory note, manu propria ipsius Georgii subscript pr. solucon eidem Edwardo Cumber vel ordiñi quinque librarum," fourteen days after date, in full satisfaction and exoneration of the premises and promises, which said note in writing the said George then gave to the said Edward Cumber, and the said Edward Cumber then and there received from the said George the said note in full satisfaction and discharge of the premises and promises.

The replication is that "the said George did not give to him Edward any note in writing called a promissory note with the hand of him George subscribed for the payment to him Edward or his order of £5, fourteen days after date in full satisfaction and discharge of the premises and promises." To this there is a demurrer and judgment in the Common Pleas for the plaintiff "that the replication was good in law."

The reporter, oddly enough, says there was an immaterial replication. The effect of the replication is to put in issue the substance of the defence—namely, the giving in satisfaction; Young v. Rudd [5 Mod. 86], and certainly that was not immaterial. But for some reason, I do not stop to inquire what, Pratt, C. J., prefers to base the judgment affirming that of the Common Pleas on the supposed badness of the plea rather than on the sufficiency of the replication. It is impossible to doubt that the note, which it is averred in the plea was given as satisfaction, was a negotiable note. And therefore this case is in direct conflict with Sibree v. Tripp [15 M. & W. 23].

Two cases require to be carefully considered. The first is Heathcote v. Crookshanks [2 T. R. 24]. The plea there pleaded would, I think, now be held perfectly good, see Norman v. Thompson [4 Ex. 755]; but Buller, J., seems to have thought otherwise. He says: "Thirdly, it was said that all the creditors were bound by this agreement to forbear, but that is not stated by the plea. It is only alleged that they agreed to take a certain proportion, but that is a nudum pactum, unless they had afterward accepted it. In the case in which Cumber v. Wane was denied to be law, Hardcastle v. Howard (26 Geo. III, B. R.), the party actually accepted. But as the plaintiff in the present case refused to take less than the whole demand, the plea is clearly bad."

That decision goes entirely on the ground that accord without satisfaction is not a plea. I do not think it can be fairly said that Buller, J., meant by saying "that is a nudum pactum, unless they had afterward accepted it," to express an opinion that if the dividend had been accepted it would have been a good satisfaction. But he certainly expresses no opinion the other way.

In Fitch v. Sutton [5 East, 230] not only did the plaintiff not accept the payment of the dividend in satisfaction, but refused to accept it at all, unless the defendant promised to pay him the balance when of ability, and the defendant assented and made the promise required, so that but for the fact that other creditors were parties to the composition there could have been no defence. There was no point of pleading in that case, the whole being open under the general issue. And in Steinman v. Magnus [11 East, 390] it was pretty well admitted by Lord Ellenborough that the decision in Fitch v. Sutton would have been the other way, if they had understood the evidence as the reporter did. But though this misapprehension of the judges as to the facts, and the absence of any acceptance of the dividend, greatly weaken the weight of Fitch v. Sutton, still it remains that Lord Ellenborough, a very great judge indeed, did, however hasty or unnecessary it may have been to express such an opinion, say: "It is impossible to contend that acceptance of £17 10s. is an extinguishment of a debt of £50. There must be some consideration for the relinquishment of the residue; something collateral, to show a possibility of benefit to the party relinquishing his further claim, otherwise the agreement is nudum pactum. But the mere promise to pay the rest when of ability put the plaintiff in no better condition than he was before. It was expressly determined in Cumber v. Wane that acceptance of a security for a lesser sum cannot be pleaded in satisfaction of a similar security for a greater. And though that case was said by me in argument in Heathcote v. Crookshanks [2 T. R. 24] to have been denied to be law, and in confirmation of that Buller, J., afterward referred to a case (stated to be that of Hardcastle v. Howard [H. 26 Geo. III]), yet I cannot find any case of that sort, and none has been now referred to; on the contrary, the decision in Cumber v. Wane is directly supported by the authority of Pinnel's Case, which never appears to have been questioned."

I must observe that, whether Cumber v. Wane was, or was not denied to be law in Hardcastle v. Howard, it certainly was denied to be law in Sibree v. Tripp [15 M. & W. 23], and that, though it is quite true that Pinnel's Case, as far as regards the points actually raised in the case, has not only never been questioned, but is often assented to, I am not aware that in any case before Fitch v. Sutton, unless it be Cumber v. Wane, has that part of it which I venture to call the dictum ever been acted upon; and as I have pointed out, had it not been for the composition with other creditors, there could have been no defence in Fitch v. Sutton, whether the dictum in Pinnel's Case was right or wrong.

Still this is an authority, and I have no doubt that it was on the ground of this authority and the adhesion of Bayley, J., to it in Thomas v. Heathorn [2 B. & C. 477], that Barons Parke and Alderson expressed themselves as they did in the passages I have cited from Sibree v. Tripp. And I think that their expressions justify Mr. John William Smith in laying it down as he does in his note to Cumber v. Wane, in the second edition of his Leading Cases, that "a liquidated and undisputed money demand, of which the day of payment is passed (not founded upon a bill of exchange or promissory note), cannot even with the consent of the creditor be discharged by mere payment by the debtor of a smaller amount in money in the same manner as he was bound to pay the whole." I am inclined to think that this was settled in a Court of the first instance. I think, however, that it was originally a mistake.

What principally weighs with me in thinking that Lord Coke made a mistake of fact is my conviction that all men of business, whether merchants or tradesmen, do every day recognize and act on the ground that prompt payment of a part of their demand may be more beneficial to them than it would be to insist on their rights and enforce payment of the whole. Even where the debtor is perfectly solvent, and sure to pay at last, this often is so. Where the credit of the debtor is doubtful it must be more so. I had persuaded myself that there was no such long-continued action on this dictum as to render it improper in this House to reconsider the question. I had written my reasons for so thinking; but as they were not satisfactory to the other noble and learned Lords who heard the case, I do not now repeat them nor persist in them.

I assent to the judgment proposed, though it is not that which I had originally thought proper.

NASSOIY v. TOMLINSON.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1896. 148 N. Y. 326, 42 N. E. 715, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695.)

VANN, J. On the sixth of April, 1887, the plaintiff sold the property of the defendants, under an agreement that he was to receive compensation for his services in making the sale, but there was a difference between them as to the amount. The sale was not completed until about June 20th, 1887, on which day Mr. Chauncey, who represented the defendants in all their dealings with the plaintiff, wrote to him as follows: "I heard to-day from Mr. Griffith that the sale to Weston was completed on Saturday. I send you a check for three hundred dollars (1 per cent. on $30,000), your commission on the sale. Please sign and return the enclosed voucher." There was a check for $300

A composition agreement between a debtor and two or more of his creditors, providing for a discharge upon payment of a lesser sum, is universally supported. A consideration may be found in the mutual promises of the creditors or in the debtor's surrender of his privilege of preferring one creditor over another. See Norman v. Thompson, 4 Ex. (W. H. & G.) 755 (1850); Good v. Cheesman, 2 B. & Ad. 328 (1831), and note, post, p. 984.

enclosed, payable to the order of the plaintiff, and also an unsigned receipt in these words: "Suspension Bridge, New York, June, 1887. Received of the Tomlinson Estate three hundred dollars, in full for commissions for sale to J. A. Weston of 66 acre lot, $300." Under date of June 23d, 1887, the plaintiff wrote to Mr. Chauncey, saying: "I don't know what you mean by sending me a check for $300. I want my five per cent. commission on the $30,000." No reply was made to this letter, although one was requested, and during the latter part of July or the first of August following, the plaintiff, who had in the meantime retained both check and voucher, called on Mr. Chauncey in the city of New York, and, as he testified on the trial, asked him what he meant by sending a check for $300 commission for selling the farm. I said that I wanted my five per cent. commission, as the understanding was between us. He said he wouldn't give one cent more, and I left him. * * * I knew there was a dispute between us, I claiming $1500 and he claiming that I was only entitled to three hundred dollars, and that his check paid that, and with the knowledge of that condition of affairs I kept the check from July, 1887, to January, 1888, and then endorsed it and drew the money, and sent him a receipt on account." The plaintiff never returned the blank voucher sent to him with the check, but in January, 1888, he endorsed the check and drew the money on it, and then, under date of January 19th, 1888, wrote to Mr. Chauncey stating that he enclosed a receipt for $300, as part payment for his services, and that he still claimed he was entitled to five per cent. commission and insisted on being paid at that rate. The receipt enclosed was for $300, "in part payment for commission." On January 24th, 1888, Mr. Chauncey wrote to the plaintiff acknowledging receipt of the letter and voucher, and stating that he should "consider this payment in full for all commissions." The plaintiff did not return or offer to return the money so paid him. When the plaintiff rested, as well as at the close of the evidence, the defendants asked the Court to direct a verdict in their favor on the ground that, upon the foregoing facts, which were not disputed, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, but the motions were denied and the defendants excepted.

Two questions of fact were submitted to the jury: 1. Whether there was an agreement to pay plaintiff at the rate of five per cent. 2. Whether the plaintiff agreed to accept the $300 "in place of his claim for five per cent. commission." The jury were instructed to find for the plaintiff if they thought that the agreement to pay at that rate was made, and that the agreement to accept was not made, otherwise for the defendants. They rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,200. The judgment entered on the verdict was affirmed by the General Term upon its opinion written on a formal appeal, but then the record did not contain the proposed receipt in full. Nassoiy v. Tomlinson, 65 Hun, 491–493, 20 N. Y. Supp. 384.

The question presented by this appeal is whether the undisputed evidence so conclusively established an accord and satisfaction as to leave no question of fact for the jury upon that subject. An accord and satisfaction requires a new agreement and the performance thereof. Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164, 26 N. E. 351, 11 L. R. A. 710. It must be an executed contract founded upon a new consideration, although an agreement to accept an independent executory contract has been held sufficient. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 31 Am. Rep. 491; Morehouse v. Second National Bank, 98 N. Y. 503; 2 Parsons on Contracts (7th Ed.) 817, 820. If the claim is liquidated, the mere acceptance of a part, with the promise to discharge the whole, is not enough, for there is no new consideration. Ryan v. Ward, 48 N. Y. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 539. If the claim is unliquidated, the acceptance of a part and an agreement to cancel the entire debt, furnishes a new consideration which is found in the compromise. A demand is not liquidated even if it appears that something is due, unless it appears how much is due, and when it is admitted that one of two specific sums is due, but there is a genuine dispute as to which is the proper amount, the demand is regarded as unliquidated, within the meaning of that term as applied to the subject of accord and satisfaction. Such is the case before us, as appears from the testimony of the plaintiff, already quoted. He claimed that the defendants owed him the sum of $1,500, under an agreement to pay him at one rate, while the defendants claimed that they owed him but $300, under an agreement to pay him at another rate. The verdict of the jury upon this issue neither removed from the case the fact that a dispute had existed, nor affected its force, as otherwise the compromise of a disputed claim could never be made the basis of a valid settlement. We come, therefore, to the question whether there was an acceptance by the plaintiff of an offer by the defendants to pay the sum they conceded to be due in full satisfaction of the sum he claimed to be due. In order to determine this question, the letter of June 20th, 1887, with the check and receipt enclosed therewith, should be construed together, so as to see whether the offer was made upon a specified condition. When thus construed, we find the defendant saying to the plaintiff, in substance: "Here is a check for $300 to pay your commission on the sale; sign and return the enclosed voucher, in full of your commissions." As reflecting the intention of the parties, it is the same in effect as if the check had been written "in full," as was the case of Reynolds v. Empire Lumber Co., 85 Hun, 470, 33 N. Y. Supp. 111. The plaintiff understood the condition as his testimony shows, and he never signed or returned the voucher and did not use the check for nearly seven months. In the meantime he had an interview with the agent of the defendants and learned that they still adhered to their position of refusing to pay any more than the check sent "in full." After hesitating for five months longer, he used the check and sent the defendants a receipt on account, writing them that he claimed a balance. This declaration was ex post facto and could have no effect unless acquiesced in by the defendants, but they promptly disclaimed and insisted that their debt was paid. We think that the undisputed evidence shows conclusively that the offer was made in settlement of the claim and that the plaintiff so understood it, when, by using the check he accepted the offer. The written evidence, the personal interview and the acts of the plaintiff permit no other conclusion. The circumstances do not admit of different inferences or present any question of fact, for the letter and receipt can have but one interpretation.

The plaintiff cannot be permitted to assert that he did not understand that a sum of money, offered "in full," was not, when accepted, a payment in full. As was said in Hills v. Sommer, 53 Hun, 392, 394, 6 N. Y. Supp. 469, he was "bound either to reject" the check "or, by accepting it, to accede to the defendants' terms." The money tendered belonged to them, and they had the right to say on what condition it should be received. "Always the manner of the tender and of the payment shall be directed by him that maketh the tender or payment and not by him that accepteth it." Pinnel's Case, 5 Co. 117. The plaintiff could only accept the money as it was offered, which was in satisfaction of his demand. He could not accept the benefit and reject the condition, for if he accepted at all it was cum onere. When he endorsed and collected the check, referred to in the letter asking him to sign the enclosed receipt in full, it was the same in legal effect, as if he had signed and returned the receipt, because acceptance of the check was a conclusive election to be bound by the condition upon which the check was offered. The use of the check was ipso facto an acceptance of the condition. The minds of the parties then met so as to constitute an accord, and, as was said by this Court in Fuller v. Kemp, 138 N. Y. 231, 33 N. E. 1034, 20 L. R. A. 785, "the acceptance of the money involved the acceptance of the condition and the law will not permit any other inference from the transaction." We cannot distinguish the case in hand from the case last cited, where a check for $400 was mailed with a letter stating that it was sent as payment in full of an unliquidated demand for $670. The creditor accepted the check and used it, but "again sent his bill to the defendant, charging $670 for his services and crediting upon it $400 received by check." The debtor answered, calling attention to the condition upon which he had sent the check, and requesting the creditor "either to keep the money upon the condition named, or return it to him by first mail," but no reply was made, and the money was not returned. Upon these facts the Court held that "when a debtor offers a certain sum of money in full satisfaction of an unliquidated demand, and the creditor accepts and retains the money, his claim is cancelled, and no protest, declaration or denial on his part, so long as the condition is insisted upon by the debtor, can vary the result."

The principle that controlled that case must also control this, and the judgment appealed from should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

HAY v. FORTIER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1917. 116 Me. 455, 102 Atl. 294.)

Action by George G. Hay against Mary A. Fortier. Case reserved. Judgment for plaintiff.

KING, J. The case made by the agreed statement is this: The defendant became a surety on a 15-day bond given by one Henry H. Sawyer to the plaintiff. The conditions of the bond were not complied with, and the defendant was notified of her liability under the bond and requested to make payment thereof. On February 4, 1915, the defendant's attorney wrote the attorney of the plaintiff as follows:

"I have seen Mrs. Fortier, who says it will be a great hardship to pay this entire amount at the present time as the other signers are worthless. She suggests * * * that she will pay you $100 next week, if the papers are regular, and settle the balance by payments, the whole bill to be paid before your April term of court. * * *"

To that the plaintiff, through his attorney, replied sending copies of the papers and saying:

"I am willing to accept $100 on account, providing you send same

Where a claim is unliquidated and uncertain in amount, no definite sum being admitted as due, the payment and acceptance of a less sum than that claimed operates as a satisfaction, if so agreed. Payment by a third person of a lesser sum is valid consideration for a discharge of a liquidated debt, even though (it seems) the money paid is supplied by the debtor. Sigler v. to me immediately and the balance on or before the first Tuesday of April. * * *"

The defendant paid the $100 forthwith, but no more. The plaintiff waited till long after the first Tuesday of April, and on June 1, 1915, brought an action of debt on the bond against the principal and all the sureties. Mrs. Fortier answered to that action at the return term thereof, and at a subsequent term, on November 3, 1915, by agreement, that action was "discontinued without costs and without prejudice," the counsel of the respective parties signing the docket entry to that effect. Why that action was thus discontinued does not appear in this case. On the following day, November 4, 1915, this action was brought against Mrs. Fortier, based upon a breach of her alleged special promise to pay the balance due under the bond before the April term of court, as stated in the correspondence referred to. The declaration is not made a part of the case, but the parties stipulate that it "is in due form." The defense is that the alleged promise on which the action is based was without a legal consideration and is therefore nonenforceable.

We think the agreed statement justifies the conclusion, that the defendant promised to pay at once $100, and the balance due under the bond before the April term of court, provided the plaintiff would forbear action on the bond, and that the plaintiff on his part, in consideration of such part payment at once, and the promise to pay the balance on or before the time specified, agreed to forbear, and did in fact forbear, action on the bond until after the time specified. And a promise to forbear and give time for the payment of a debt followed by actual forbearance for the time specified or for a reasonable time when no definite time is named, is certainly a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay the debt. Moore v. McKenney, 83 Me. 80, 90, 21 Atl. 749, 23 Am. St. Rep. 753.

On the other hand, it is obvious that the defendant by her special promise did not agree to do anything that she was not then legally bound to do. Her liability under the bond was then due and payable. She might then have been required to pay it all forthwith. And it is a well-recognized principle that the payment, or promise of payment, of money which is then due and payable by virtue of an existing valid contract of the promisor, is not in contemplation of law a sufficient consideration for any new contract. Wescott v. Mitchell, 95 Me. 377, 383, 50 Atl. 21; Dunn v. Collins, 70 Me. 230; Wimer v. Worth Township Poor Overseers, 104 Pa. 317; Mathewson v. Strafford Bank, 45 N. H. 104; Parmelee v. Thompson, 45 N. Y. 58, 6 Am. Rep. 33; Bedford's Ex'r v. Chandler, 81 Vt. 270, 273, 69 Atl. 874, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1239, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1057; 6 R. C. L. 664. The defendant therefore contends that the plaintiff's promise to forbear action on the bond was without a legal consideration and not binding on him; in other words, that he could have brought action on the bond immediately after the part payment was made, in total disregard of his promise to wait until the April term of court. We think that contention is sound, and well supported by authorities. In Warren v. Hodge, 121 Mass. 106, the court said:

"It is too well settled to require discussion or reference to authorities that an agreement to forbear to sue upon a debt already due and payable, for no other consideration than a payment of a part of the debt, is without legal consideration, and cannot be availed of by the debtor, either by way of contract or of estoppel."

But it does not follow, as the defendant claims, that this action against her is not maintainable, simply because the plaintiff's promise to forbear action on the bond could not have been enforced against him during the specified period of forbearance.

"If a contract, although not originally binding for want of mutuality, is nevertheless executed by the party not originally bound, so that the party asserting the invalidity of the contract has actually received the benefit contracted for, the latter will be estopped from refusing performance on his part on the ground that the contract was not originally binding on the other, who has performed." 6 R. C. L. 690.

Granting that the parties, through the correspondence referred to, entered into a bilateral contract, and that there was want of mutuality in that contract because the plaintiff was not bound to perform his part of it, nevertheless, he did fully perform the contract on his part, and the defendant received the full benefit contracted for. Having enjoyed the forbearance of the plaintiff from bringing action against her on the bond for the full period agreed upon, the defendant is now estopped from refusing performance on her part on the ground that the contract was not originally binding on the plaintiff, who did, nevertheless, perform it and she received the benefit thereof.

It is therefore the opinion of the court that this action is maintainable, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant for $175.60 and costs, with interest from the date of the writ.

So ordered.

MORTON v. BURN & VAUX.

(In the King's Bench, 1837. 7 Adol. & El. 19.)

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that, whereas, before and at the time of making the promise, etc., to-wit, 12th April, 1834, the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in £728. 2s. 6d., and interest thereon from 1st February, 1834, under and by virtue of a bond dated 14th July, 1832, and a certain indenture and deed of assignment thereof, dated 19th October, 1833; and that, according to the condition of the said bond, £228. 2s. 6d., part of the said sum of £728. 2s. 6d., ought to have been paid on the 1st February then last past; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and also in consideration that plaintiff would accept and receive payment of the said sums of money on the days and times after-mentioned, and, in the meantime, give time to defendants for payment, the defendants undertook, etc., that the whole of the said £228. 2s. 6d., with interest from 1st February, 1834, should be paid to plaintiff on or before 1st of June then next, or, in default thereof, that defendants would sign a warrant of attorney to plaintiff to enter up judgment against them forthwith for the same; and that defendants would pay to plaintiff £50 quarterly, on 1st September, etc., in every year, until the further sum of £500 (residue of the said £728. 2s. 6d.), with interest at £5 per cent. per annum, should be fully paid and satisfied; and, in default of paying any of the last-mentioned instalments, defendants would execute a warrant of attorney to plaintiff forthwith to enter up judgment against them for the whole £500 and interest, or so much thereof as might then remain due; averment that plaintiff did forbear and give time to defendants for the payment of the said £728. 2s. 6d., and interest, until and upon the respective days and times mentioned for payment thereof in the said promise and undertaking of the defendants; and, although defendants paid plaintiff the said £228. 2s. 6d. and interest thereon, yet they did not nor would pay plaintiff £50 quarterly, on the days and times above mentioned in that behalf, but therein wholly made default; and a large sum of money of the said instalments, viz., £250, for five several sums of £50, respectively due on 1st September, 1835, etc., now is wholly due and in arrear, etc.; and, although defendants made default in payment of the respective sums on the days and times aforesaid, according to the tenor and effect, etc., of their said promise and undertaking, yet defendants did not nor would execute a warrant of attorney to enable plaintiff forthwith to enter up judgment against them for so much of the £500 and interest as then remained due, etc. There was a second count on an account stated, and for interest.

Pleas: 1. Non assumpsit. 2. To the first count, that there was not any good or valuable consideration for the promises in the first count mentioned; conclusion to the country. Issues on both pleas.

On the trial before Coleridge, J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1836, a verdict was found for the plaintiff. In Hilary Term last, F. Edwards obtained a rule nisi for arresting the judgment.

Cresswell and W. H. Watson now showed cause.

F. Edwards, contra. A detriment to the plaintiff or a benefit to the defendant is a good consideration; but here the agreement to forbear was not binding on the plaintiff; he therefore gave up nothing, and the defendant gained nothing. After the assignment the plaintiff might have sued in equity in his own name, or at law in the name of the obligee. And, again, the plaintiff's right is not strengthened by the parol agreement: the defendant was not less liable to these suits before the agreement than after; therefore he merely promised what he was before liable to do, which was no consideration for a promise on the part of the plaintiff; Harris v. Watson (Peake N. P. C. 72). Now, if the plaintiff was not bound to perform his part of the agreement, the defendant could not be liable.

[PATTESON, J. That proposition seems too broad. Suppose I say, if you will furnish goods to a third person, I will guarantee the payment: there you are not bound to furnish them; yet, if you do furnish them in pursuance of the contract, you may sue me on my guaranty.] Here the contract could only be supported by a consideration perfect and definite at the time of the contract, and such that the party from whom it moved was, at the time, made incapable of retracting. This is the only principle upon which the mutual promises can constitute a consideration. * * * Again, if this were a good contract, the defendant would be liable to two actions on the same instrument; for there is nothing to prevent the original obligee, or an assignee of the present plaintiff, from suing the defendant on the bond at any time. [LITTLEDALE, J. That would be an action for a different cause from this: that would be on the bond; this is on the parol contract.]

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD DENMAN, C. J., in this term (June 12th) delivered the judgment of the court.

This is a motion in arrest of judgment. The question is, whether forbearance for a given time on the part of the assignee of a bond to sue the obligors, is a good consideration for a promise by the obligors to pay the assignee at the expiration of that time, or give him a warrant of attorney for the amount.

It was objected that there is no mutuality in the agreement; for that, if the plaintiff had sued the defendants in the obligee's name, the promise to forbear would be no answer. Again, that this is a mere nudum pactum, being only a promise to do that which the defendants were already bound to do by their bond. And, further, that, if this promise be binding, it amounts to varying a deed by parol contract, which is contrary to the rule of law. We do not think any of these objections sufficient to arrest the judgment.

As to the first, there is sufficient mutuality; for although the agreement to forbear would not be pleadable to an action in the name of the obligee, yet, unless the plaintiff did forbear according to his agreement, he would not be able to sue on the defendant's promise. He is obliged to aver, as he does in the present declaration, that he has forborne, which is a condition precedent to his suing.

As to the second objection, this is not a mere nudum pactum, for the defendants promise to pay the plaintiff, a third person, whom they were not bound to pay by their bond; and they promise, in consideration of a detriment sustained by the plaintiff at their request, namely, a forbearance to enforce his right in the name of the obligee.

As to the third objection the bond is in no respect varied by this agreement. The new contract entered into by the defendants with the plaintiff leaves the bond just as it was before: it was forfeited before the agreement, and so it remains; and the agreement would be no answer to an action on it.

The cases on this subject are collected in Mr. Serjeant Williams' notes to Forth v. Stanton (1 Wms. Saund. 210), and to Barber v. Fox (2 Wms. Saund. 137), to which may be added Yard v. Eland (1 Ld. Raym. 368), and other cases collected in Comyns's Digest, Action on the Case upon Assumpsit, Consideration (B). They are all in favor of the action lying, with the exception of Potter v. Turnor (Palm. 185), which we think inconsistent, not only with the current of authorities, but with established principles.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the rule to arrest the judgment in this case must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

GORING v. GORING.

(In the King's Bench, 1602. Yelv. 11.)

H. Goring was indebted to Smith in £205 upon simple contract; Smith made J. Goring his executor and died; J. Goring the executor agreed, and was contented to take of H. Goring for the £205, £150 and also agreed to take the £150 by £20 per annum, in consideration whereof H. Goring undertook, and promised to pay the said J. Goring the said £150 by £20 per annum, and for nonperformance of the promise J. Goring brought assumpsit against H. Goring; and upon non assumpsit pleaded, 'twas found against H. Goring. And Hide moved in arrest of judgment, that the consideration to take £150 for £205 is not sufficient, because for anything that appears, H. Goring remains still charged with the £205, and subject to the plaintiff's action for the £205 and therefore he ought to have shewn that he had discharg'd the defendant of the £205. But non allocat'; for the £205 being due to the plaintiff as executor of Smith, the action for it ought to be in the detinet; but now, by this agreement to take £150 of the defendant, and the defendant's promise to pay it, 'tis made the plaintiff's proper debt, and the action for it maintainable in his own name, without being named executor, and altho' (by YELVERTON, Justice) £150 is not any satisfaction of £205 because they are both of one nature, and it's otherwise of things collateral to the debt, as an horse, a cup, &c. yet in respect that the nature of the action is changed, it proves the nature of the debt to be changed; and therefore a good consideration: for if the executor is indebted to J. S. in £100 and J. S. comes to demand the money, in this case, as the debt now is, the executor is chargeable only in respect of the assets, and not otherwise; but if he promises to pay it at a day to come, 'tis now made his own debt, and to be satisfied by his own goods. And (PER CURIAM) the consideration alleged is sufficient for another reason; for although the plaintiff has not shewn that he has discharged the defendant of the £205 yet if the defendant should be afterwards charged with it, he might have assumpsit against the plaintiff; for the plaintiff agreeing to take £150 for £205 is a promise on his part, and so one promise against another.

MELROY et al. v. KEMMERER.

Action by Emma E. M. Melroy and Thomas B. Bachman against Charles R. Kemmerer. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

At the trial the defendant testified that on December 6, 1920, he had paid the plaintiff 30 per cent. of the amount claimed, and that this was a good accord and satisfaction of the whole claim, because, at the time payment was made, palintiffs had dissuaded him from going into bankruptcy. The court gave binding instructions for plaintiffs. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs for $2,217.32.

MITCHELL, C. J. It was said in Ebert v. Johns, 206 Pa. 395, 55 Atl. 1064, that the rule that the acceptance of a smaller sum for a debt presently due, though agreed and expressed to be payment in full, is not a good accord and satisfaction, was a deduction of scholastic logic, and was always regarded as more logical than just, and hence any circumstance of variation is sufficient to take a case out of the rule. As illustrations of such circumstances of variation, it has been held that payment a day, or even an hour, before the debt is due, or at a different place, or of a certainty in amount where the amount of the debt is uncertain, or payment of even a part by a third person, or additional security of any kind, such as the indorsement of a note by a third person, or payment in chattels or anything other than money, will be a good discharge of the whole by way of accord and satisfaction. Note to Cumber v. Wane, 1 Smith, Lead. Case. *357. And see a full collection of the more recent cases in the note to Fuller v. Kemp (138 N. Y. 231, 33 N. E. 1034) in 20 L. R. A. 785. The rule itself is founded on the want of consideration for the agreement. As a part can never be equal to the whole, payment of a part of a debt presently due gives the creditor nothing that he was not entitled to and deprives the debtor of nothing he was not bound to part with before, and therefore there is no consideration. The logic is unimpeachable, but it fails to take into consideration the practical importance of the difference between the right to a thing and the actual possession of it. As said in Ebert v. Johns, 206 Pa. 395, 55 Atl. 1064, "to a merchant with a note coming due $5,000 before 3 o'clock today, which will save his commercial credit, may well be worth more than $20,000 to-morrow, after his note has gone to protest." If the debt is not due till to-morrow, the payment of the lesser sum under all the cases will be a good accord and satisfaction; but if the debt was due yesterday, but the debtor can only pay part to-day, the benefit to the creditor of getting that part now, rather than the whole when it is too late, is just as great, and, whatever conclusion the scholastic logic and theoretical reasoning may lead to, the importance of the practical result is a matter for the creditor to decide for himself, and, having so decided and got the benefit of it, justice and common honesty ought to hold him to his agreement. For this reason, the force of which is universally accepted, the courts, so far as they could without sacrifice of the maxim of stare decisis, have brought the law into closer accord with modern business principles.

In the present case the debtor, being in failing circumstances and contemplating bankruptcy, offered the plaintiffs 30 per cent. of his debt as a settlement in full. The plaintiffs dissuaded him from going into bankruptcy, accepted his alternative offer, received the money, and closed the account. They have now brought this suit for the balance. In the absence of any express decision in this state on this point, the learned judge below did not feel at liberty to depart from the general rule. We have no such hesitation. The exact point is whether the debtor's relinquishment of his intention to seek a discharge in bankruptcy, and his payment of 30 per cent. instead, constitute a sufficient consideration to bind the creditor to the agreement. On that point we have no doubt. A valuable consideration may consist in some right, interest, or benefit to one party, or some loss, detriment, or responsibility resulting actually or potentially to the other. Bouvier's Law Dict. "If there is any advantage to the creditor, the law will not weigh the adequacy of the consideration." Fowler v. Smith, 153 Pa. 639, 25 Atl. 744. The accord in this case was good on both branches. By it the creditors got a sum certain, instead of the chances of an uncertain dividend in bankruptcy. On the other hand, the debtor accepted the responsibility of paying a sum certain, whether his assets were sufficient or not, and gave up his right to a release of his future assets, and to a discharge from his whole debt, without regard to the sufficiency of his present assets.

The decisions on this exact point in other states are not numerous, but the general trend is uniform to the result we have reached. In Hinckley v. Arey, 27 Me. 362, it was said by Tenney, J.: "In this case the plaintiff was informed that the defendant contemplated taking the benefit of the bankrupt act, which was then in force. If this intention had been carried out, the plaintiff would lose the whole debt, beyond what he might receive as a dividend; and the latter, judging from his letter, he did not consider as very valuable. To save himself from a greater loss under the law, he agreed upon the terms of composition offered. The defendant, upon the agreement and payment to Hubbard, took no further steps to obtain relief under the bankrupt law." It was accordingly held that the accord and satisfaction were good. The same ruling was made in Dawson v. Beall, 68 Ga. 328.

And in Curtiss v. Martin, 20 Ill. 557, 578, Engbretson v. Seiberling, 122 Iowa, 522, 98 N. W. 319, 64 L. R. A. 75, 101 Am. St. Rep. 279, and Rice v. London, etc., Mortgage Co., 70 Minn. 77, 72 N. W. 826, the courts went still farther and held the satisfaction valid where the debtor was insolvent or in failing circumstances, though there was no express intention to seek a discharge in bankruptcy. In the last-named case it was held that an agreement on behalf of the estate of a debtor supposed to be insolvent was good, though it turned out in fact that it was solvent. And in Pettigrew Co. v. Harmon, 45 Ark. 290, the principle that part payment by a third person makes the accord valid was held to govern, where the third person was one to whom the debtor had assigned his assets for the payment of his debts. On principle and on authority, therefore, the agreement in the present case was binding, and, there being no dispute on the material facts, the defendant's sixth point, asking for binding instructions, should have been affirmed.

McCOMB v. KITTRIDGE.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1846. 14 Ohio, 348.)

The note upon which suit is brought, was given by Moses Kimball, John Miller, Picket Latimer and the defendant Kittridge to James Gilruth, for $2,000, dated September 1st, 1836, payable November 26th, 1836, endorsed by said Gilruth to Hamlin and Ward, and by them to plaintiff.

The defence set up and relied upon in the special plea is, that Kittridge executed this note, as surety for Kimball, which fact was known to Gilruth at the execution and delivery of said note; that Gilruth, after the same fell due, to wit, on the 9th of February, 1837, contracted to give further time, and delay the payment of the same until the first of May, thereafter, in consideration of said Kimball executing to him a note for $34.44, payable on said 1st of May. That said note for $34.44 was executed, and a greater part thereof paid. That the time specified was actually given, and that said agreement was entered into without the knowledge or consent of the defendant.

The replication denies the making of any such agreement.

READ, J. The pleadings admit, and the proof shows, beyond doubt, that Kittridge was surety. Gilruth swears that the note was given for money loaned; that the whole negotiation was with Kimball, with whom he always dealt in relation to the demand—that the note continued his property until 18th of September, 1837. This was long after it was due, about ten months.

[71] Under similar circumstances a contract between a landlord and an insolvent tenant, decreasing the rent, was held valid in Sherman, Clay & Co. v. Buffum & Pendleton, 91 Or. 352, 179 Pac. 241 (1919).

The part of Gilruth's testimony upon which the defence mainly relies, is as follows: "On the 9th of February, 1837, the witness was at Norwalk when the note was given, and called upon Kimball for pay, who excused himself, and wanted delay; and it was proposed to pay him ten per cent. as a consideration for it.' The witness says: "I, have consented to take the proposed interest, it being expressly agreed that the notes should remain just as they were, instead of being renewed. I agreed to wait until the first of May following." "Kimball then calculated the extra four per cent. interest on the $2,000 till the first of May, and gave me his note for it, part of which was traded out in his store the third of August following." He further says, that the note of $34.44, of February 9, 1837, and due 12th of May, 1837, upon which he received from Kimball, August 3d, 1837, $24.63, he afterwards sold, with the payments credited to Latimer.

Now, the question arising upon the above state of facts, is, was here such an agreement to give further time upon a valid and binding consideration as will discharge the surety? It is an undoubted principle of law that, if the creditor, by agreement with the principal debtor, or by any other act, precludes himself at law from proceeding against the principal debtor, the surety is discharged. It is not questioned but that a binding agreement upon a valid consideration to give further time to the principal debtor, will discharge the surety. But it is considered in this case, that there was no valid consideration for the agreement to extend the time of payment of this note, from the 9th of February, 1837, to the 1st of May following; because the $34.44 note, the consideration of such agreement, was for a rate of interest larger than our statute allows to be collected. It is just as competent for the principals to a note to extend the time of payment for a specified period, as it was to fix the time of payment originally. If the lender of money, secured by a note, after the same becomes due, contracts with the borrower that the time of paying the same shall be extended for one year, or for any other period, upon consideration that the borrower shall pay the legal or less rate of interest, why is not that a binding contract? The lender, by this contract, secures to himself the interest on his money for the year—and the borrower precludes himself from getting rid of the payment of the interest, by discharging the principal. It is a valuable right to have money placed at interest, and it is a valuable right to have the privilege,[72] at any time, of getting rid of the payment of interest, by discharging the principal. By this contract, the right to interest is secured for a given period, and the right to pay off the principal, and get rid of paying the interest, is also relinquished for such period. Here, then, are all the elements of a binding contract.

But it is said there is no consideration for the extension of time, [72] That is, the power to terminate the duty to pay interest is a valuable power.

because the law gives six per cent. after the note is due. But the law does not secure the payment of this interest for any given period—or prevent the discharge of the principal at any moment. There is precisely the same consideration for the extension of the time, as there was for the original loan. The consideration of the loan, on the part of the borrower, is the payment of interest. If there was no law limiting the amount of interest, the parties might contract for any rate they pleased. A contract to forbear the collection of a debt for a specified period, in consideration of the payment of a rate of interest beyond what the law allows, is founded upon a valid consideration. This would never have been doubted at all, if the law had not fixed the rate for which collection could be had. But, by limiting the rate of interest, the law does not declare that such rate is not a valuable consideration, but on the contrary declares that such rate is so fully valuable, that it will not permit a higher rate for the use of money or forbearance. The law would permit any amount to be paid for forbearance, if it were not for the fact that this would break down the whole policy of the law limiting the rate of interest; and that forbearance amounts to nothing more than a mere loan. The only doubt which has arisen from the fact in this case is, that, in countries where the law declares usurious contracts void, a contract to pay usurious interest is void; and hence, such a contract to pay, would form no consideration for an agreement to give time, or forbear the collection of a debt for a specified period. Such a contract with us is not wholly void, but the statute steps in and pares it down to the legal rate, and permits that to be collected. Hence, this $34.44 note is a good and valid contract for the payment of six per cent. interest—and hence, a good consideration to support the agreement to extend the time of payment of the $2,000, to the time contracted for; and the original parties, without the knowledge of the surety, having, by valid agreement, extended the time, the surety is discharged.

This view carries out the spirit of the statute respecting interest, secures it from the opportunity of violation, harmonizes with the decisions had under it, and rests, in our opinion, upon a solid foundation.[78]

STILK v. MYRICK.

*(In the Court of Common Pleas, 1810. 2 Camp. 317.)

This was an action for seaman's wages, on a voyage from London to the Baltic and back.

By the ship's articles, executed before the commencement of the voyage, the plaintiff was to be paid at the rate of £5 a month; and the principal question in the cause was, whether he was entitled to a higher rate of wages. In the course of the voyage two of the seamen deserted, and the captain, having in vain attempted to supply their places at Cronstadt, there entered into an agreement with the rest of the crew, that they should have the wages of the two who had deserted equally divided among them if he could not procure two other hands at Gottenburgh. This was found impossible, and the ship was worked back to London by the plaintiff and eight more of the original crew, with whom the agreement had been made at Cronstadt.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH. I think Harris v. Watson (Peak, 72) was rightly decided; but I doubt whether the ground of public policy, upon which Lord Kenyon is stated to have proceeded, be the true principle on which the decision is to be supported. Here, I say, the agreement is void for want of consideration. There was no consideration for the ulterior pay promised to the mariners who remained with the ship. Before they sailed from London they had undertaken to do all they could under all the emergencies of the voyage. They had sold all their services till the voyage should be completed. If they had been at liberty to quit the vessel at Cronstadt, the case would have been quite different; or if the captain had capriciously discharged the two men who were wanting, the others might not have been compelled to take the whole duty upon themselves, and their agreeing to do so might have been a sufficient consideration for the promise of an advance of wages. But the desertion of a part of the crew is to be considered an emergency of the voyage as much as their death, and those who remain are bound by the terms of their original contract to exert themselves to the utmost to bring the ship in safety to her destined port. Therefore, without looking to the policy of this agreement, I think it is void for want of consideration, and that the plaintiff can only recover at the rate of £5 a month.

Verdict accordingly.[74]

DAVIS & CO. v. MORGAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1903. 117 Ga. 504, 43 S. E. 732, 61 L. R. A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171.)

Action by A. M. Morgan against C. H. Davis & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

LAMAR, J. Davis & Co. employed Morgan for one year at $40 per month. After the contract had been in force for some time, Morgan received an offer of $65 per month from a company in Florida, and mentioned the fact to Davis, saying that of course he would not go without consent. Davis insists that he then said, if Morgan would stay out the balance of the term, and work satisfactorily, he would give him $120 at the end of the year. Morgan says that Davis stated, "I will add $10 a month from the time you began, and owe you $120 when your time is up." Davis & Co. discharged Morgan two or three weeks before the end of the term, because the latter had gone to Florida for several days without their consent. Morgan insists that he told Davis that he was going, and the latter made no objection. He claimed that he was discharged without proper cause, and brought suit for the extra compensation promised. The jury found a verdict in his favor, and, the court having refused to grant a new trial, Davis & Co. excepted.

If the promise contemplated that Davis & Co. were to pay Morgan $10 per month for that part of the year which had already passed, and as to which there had been a settlement, it was manifestly nudum pactum; for a past transaction, the obligation of which has been fully satisfied, will not sustain a new promise. Gay v. Mott, 43 Ga. 254. And the result is practically the same whether Morgan or Davis was correct in the statement of the conversation. Both proved a promise to give more than was due, and to pay extra for what one was already legally bound to perform. The employer, therefore, received no consideration for his promise to give the additional money at the end of the year. Morgan had agreed to work for 12 months at the price promised, and if during the term he had agreed to receive less, the employer would still have been liable to pay him the full $40 per month.[75] On the other hand, the employer could not be forced to pay more than the contract price. He got no more services that he had already contracted to receive, and according to an almost unbroken line of decisions the agreement to give more than was due was a nudum pactum, and void, as having no consideration to support the promise. The case is something like that of Bush v. Rawlins, 89 Ga. 117, 14 S. E. 886, where the landlord agreed to give the tenant certain property if he would pay his rent promptly; and it was held that such a promise was a gratuity, and void, as without consideration to support it. And see Tatum v. Morgan, 108 Ga. 336, 33 S. E. 940(2); Civ. Code 1895, § 3735. It is also within the principle of Stilk v. Myrick, 2 Campbell, 317, where Lord Ellenborough held that an agreement to pay seamen extra for what they were bound by their articles to do was void. And so in Bartlett v. Wyman, 14 Johns. 260, a similar ruling was made in a case where a master agreed to give more wages if the seamen would not abandon the ship. See, also, Ayres v. C. R. I. Ry. Co., 52 Iowa, 478, 3 N. W. 522. There are cases holding that a new promise is binding where one of the parties to a contract refuses to perform, and, to save a loss, the innocent party agrees to pay more than the original contract price, if the actor will perform as originally agreed. Goebel v. Linn, 47 Mich. 489, 11 N. W. 284, 41 Am. Rep. 723. But even if that line of cases should not be disregarded as tending to encourage a breach of contract, they do not affect the rights of Morgan here, because he does not bring himself within their ruling. Had there been a rescission or formal cancellation (Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 402) of the old contract by mutual consent, and if a new contract with new terms had been made; or if there had been any change in the hours, services, or character of work, or other consideration to support the promise to pay the increased wages it would have been enforceable. But, as it was, Morgan proved that Davis promised to pay more for the performance of the old contract than he had originally agreed. Such a promise was not binding.[76] * * *

MUNROE v. PERKINS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1830. 9 Pick. 298, 20 Am. Dec. 475.)

Indebitatus assumpsit for work done, materials found, money paid, &c. brought against the defendant jointly with William Payne, who died after the action was commenced.

At the trial before the chief justice it appeared, that in 1821 the plaintiff was employed by Perkins and Payne to build a hotel at Nahant, which was begun in that year and finished in 1823.

The general defence was that, there was a special contract, and that the work had been paid for according to the terms of that contract.

For the purposes of this case it was admitted, that the amount of expenditures made and incurred by the plaintiff in and about the work, exceeded the amount of the payments made to him.

It appeared that in 1821, a number of persons associated themselves for the purpose of erecting a hotel at Nahant, and subscribed certain sums of money therefor; that Perkins and Payne were subscribers and were the agents of the association, which was to be incorporated as soon as possible, and which was incorporated accordingly in February, 1822.

The defendant offered in evidence an agreement under seal, dated October 24, 1821, wherein the plaintiff engages to build the hotel according to a certain drawing and description, and the defendant and Payne, in behalf of their associates, agree to pay the plaintiff therefor $14,500 as the work advances.

T. W. Sumner, a witness called by the defendant, testified that the work was executed upon the basis of the drawing and description referred to in the sealed contract; that there were some deviations, consisting of additional work; that this was considered as extra work, not included in the contract, and was paid for separately according to its full cost and value.

To prove a waiver of the special contract, the plaintiff introduced several witnesses. J. Alley testified, that in 1825 he said to the defendant, it was a pity Munroe had undertaken to build the hotel; to which the defendant replied, that Munroe would not lose any thing by it, and that they had agreed to pay him for every minute's work and for all he had purchased. J. Mudge testified, that in the spring of 1823 the plaintiff was indebted to the Lynn bank on a note for $1,100, which he wished to have renewed, but that the directors were not satisfied of his solvency; that in April of that year, the plaintiff came to the bank with Payne, who said he was the agent who attended to the business of the Nahant hotel in the absence of Perkins, who had gone to Europe; that he wanted to get from the bank some indulgence towards the plaintiff; that the corporation would leave the plaintiff as good as they found him; they would pay Munroe for all he should lay out; that Munroe should not stop for want of funds; that he (Payne) knew Perkins's mind upon the subject; that the bills would be paid, and the plaintiff should not suffer. W. Johnson testified, that on the strength of this representation of Payne, the bank renewed the plaintiff's paper. W. Babb testified, that in May, 1822, the defendant asked the plaintiff how he got on; that the plaintiff said poorly enough; that the defendant told him he must persevere; the plaintiff said he could not without means; and the defendant repeated, you must persevere, and added, you shall not suffer, we shall leave you as we found you.

The defendant objected to this evidence, that it was insufficient in law to set aside the special contract; that it did not amount to a waiver of the original contract, but so far as it proved any thing, it was evidence of a new express promise, which was without consideration and from which no implied assumpsit could be raised. Also, that the conversation with Perkins at one time and with Payne at another, were not joint promises and created no joint cause of action, but that the liability, if there was any, was several.

A verdict was taken by consent, subject to the opinion of the court, for plaintiff.

Per Curiam. The verdict of the jury has established the fact, if the evidence was legally sufficient, that the defendant, together with Payne, made the promise declared on. The defence set up was, that the work was done and the materials were furnished on a special contract under seal, made by the defendant and Payne on behalf of themselves and other subscribers to the hotel; and such a contract was produced in evidence. The main question is, whether, there being this contract under seal, for a stipulated sum, an action lies on a general assumpsit for the amount which the building actually cost; which is more than the sum specified in the contract. It is said on the part of the plaintiff, that having made a losing bargain and being unwilling and unable to go on with the work, Perkins and Payne assured him that he should not suffer; and that the work was carried on and finished upon their engagement and promise that he should have a reasonable compensation without regard to the special contract. This engagement is to be considered as proved, if by law it was admissible to show a waiver of a special contract.

It is objected, that as the evidence was parol, it is insufficient in law to defeat or avoid the special contract; and many authorities have been cited, to show that a sealed contract cannot be avoided or waived but by an instrument of a like nature; or generally, that a contract under seal cannot be avoided or altered or explained by parol evidence. That this is the general doctrine of the law cannot be disputed. It seems to have emanated from the common maxim, "Unumquodque dissolvitur eo ligamine quo ligatur." But like other maxims, this has received qualifications, and indeed was never true to the letter, for at all times, a bond, covenant or other sealed instrument might be defeated by parol evidence of payment, accord and satisfaction, &c.

It is a general principle, that where there is an agreement in writing, it merges all previous conversations and parol agreements; but there are many cases in which a new parol contract has been admitted to be proved. And though when the suit is upon the written contract itself, it has been held that parol evidence should not be received, yet when the suit has been brought on the ground of a new subsequent agreement not in writing, parol evidence has been admitted.

In Ratcliff v. Pemberton, 1 Esp. 35, Lord Kenyon decided, that to an action of covenant on a charter-party, for the demurrage which was stipulated in it, the defendant might plead that the covenantee, who was the master and owner of the ship, verbally permitted the delay, and agreed not to exact any demurrage, but waived all claim to it. He laid down a similar rule in Thresh v. Rake, Id., 53; where however the contract does not appear to have been under seal.

In 2 Term R. 483, there were articles of partnership, containing a covenant to account at certain times; and upon a balance being struck, the defendant promised to pay the amount of the balance; it was held that assumpsit would lie upon this promise.

The case of Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 330, comes nearer the case at bar. There the plaintiffs had agreed to perform certain work for a stipulated sum of money, under a penalty. After they had entered upon the performance of it, they determined to leave off, and the defendant, by parol, released them from their covenant, and promised them, if they would complete the work, that he would pay them by the day. The court held, that if the plaintiffs chose to incur the penalty, they had a right to do so, and that the new contract was binding on the defendant.

In Dearborn v. Cross, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 48, it is held, that a bond or other specialty may be discharged or released by a parol agreement between the parties, especially where the parol agreement is executed; and the case of Lattimore v. Harsen is there cited and relied on.

There are other decisions of like nature in the same court; as Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 528; Keating v. Price, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 22, 1 Am. Dec. 92; Erwin v. Saunders, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 250, 13 Am. Dec. 520. In Ballard v. Walker, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 64, it was held that the lapse of time between the making of the contract and the attempt to enforce it, was a waiver; which is going further than is necessary in the case before us, for here there is an express waiver.

In Le Fevre v. Le Fevre, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 241, 8 Am. Dec. 696, parol evidence was admitted to prove an alteration of the course of an aqueduct established by deed. In regard to the objection, that this evidence was in direct contradiction to the deed, Duncan, J. remarks, that "the evidence was not offered for that purpose, but to show a substitution of another spot. If this had not been carried into effect, the evidence would not have been admissible; but where the situation of the parties is altered, by acting upon the new agreement, the evidence is proper; for a party may be admitted to prove by parol evidence, that after signing a written agreement, the parties made a verbal agreement, varying the former, provided their variations have been acted upon, and the original agreement can no longer be enforced without a fraud on one party."

The distinction taken in the argument, between contracts in writing merely and contracts under seal, appears by these authorities not to be important as it respects the point under consideration, and justice required in the present case, that the parol evidence should be received.

It was said that the promise of Payne cannot affect Perkins, and vice versa. But as they were joint actors, and as when one acted in the absence of the other, it was always with a joint view to the same object, they cannot be separated, but must be considered as joint promisors.

The parol promise, it is contended, was without consideration. This depends entirely on the question, whether the first contract was waived. The plaintiff having refused to perform that contract, as he might do, subjecting himself to such damages as the other parties might show they were entitled to recover, he afterward went on upon the faith of the new promise and finished the work. This was a sufficient consideration. If Payne and Perkins were willing to accept his relinquishment of the old contract and proceed on a new agreement, the law, we think, would not prevent it.

Perkins, said: "While it is well established in Massachusetts, the doctrine should not be extended beyond the cases to which it is applicable upon the recognized reasons that have been given for it;" and it was held to be inapplicable where there had been no threat of breach by the plaintiff and no agreement of rescission by the defendant. Action by Albinus Schuck against John Linz. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

BOYD, J.[79] The appellee sued the appellant on the common counts for a balance claimed to be due for work done and materials provided, etc., under the following circumstances: The appellant owned a house known as "No. 3038 Elliott street," at the corner of Canton street in Baltimore City, which was built without a cellar, was not plastered or partitioned off on the second story, and the rear was arranged for a stable. The appellee entered into a contract in writing with the appellant which states: "Cellar to be dug under the entire store to the partition wall between kitchen and store to a depth of 7 feet, and walls to be underpinned with good hard brick laid in cement, * * * cellar to be connected with sewer and cemented" and provides for work to be done in the kitchen, the second story of the house, and a number of other things not necessary to mention. It concludes, "I will do the work and furnish material for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500)." The paper was drawn in the shape of an estimate or bid, but was accepted by the appellant, and the appellee identified it as his contract.

The appellee began the work in April, 1903. He gave the contract to build the cellar to a subcontractor who started to excavate. The appellee thus described the conditions of the ground: "The house stood on a hard crust about three feet thick, and the foundation of that house didn't extend through that hard crust. It was built on that crust, and the more we got through that the more we got into a swamp like—the bottom of an old creek, black muddy stuff and soft and they tried to dig and dig and it all ran into this place and finally a big lump would cave off and fall in every now and then, and they continued on that way to get a trench dug to connect the cellar with the sewer so we thought we could drain the place a little." His foreman notified him that the house was cracking, and he then got lumber and drove "lagging" in to hold the ground. He testified that he notified Mr. Preston, the building inspector of the city, who went there with one of his assistants, that they "took sticks and shoved them down in the ground about 14 feet deep, and that Mr. Linz was present upon this occasion." He also said that Mr. Preston told him no cellar could be made, and he should fill in what he had taken out, and he stopped the work. He further testified that the appellant called on him "off and on," and wanted to see "whether we couldn't make a cellar there; wouldn't it be possible in some way to overcome it even if a small cellar." They finally thought they "could make a little cellar to get some cellar there," and he said: "Let the thing lay, and we will drain the ground into the sewer, and maybe we can overcome it, provided you pay the additional cost and stand the consequences." He demanded a writing from the appellant, and he said "his word was as good as mine, and if I put a cellar there he would see I got pay for it; that he would pay for the additional work I was compelled to do to make a cellar." In another place he stated: "He says if I was able to get a cellar under there he would reimburse or pay me the additional cost, whatever it was to get a cellar there; that the house was no good to him without a cellar." In October we went to work again, dug out eight feet, then drove poles down eight feet long, used "concrete and cement in there to form our footing," and went to great expense and trouble to make the cellar, under the new arrangement.

The appellant introduced evidence which tended to show that some of the trouble about the cellar was owing to the negligent way in which the appellee's men did the work, and that the bad condition of the soil did not extend as deep as the appellee said it was, but there can be no doubt that the conditions were altogether different from what appeared upon the surface or what was anticipated. The appellee also testified that before he made the offer he "wanted to know how the ground was, and defendant took plaintiff in the cellar of his building" (which was on the opposite side of the street), "and he showed me he had a cellar dug there and it went all right, and the soil was nice and sound there on the other corner, and when I started I wouldn't have any trouble, and I made my figures on his say so." After the work was begun the owner of the adjoining property sued the appellant and the appellee for damages to her house sustained by reason of the excavation, and the suit was compromised by the appellant buying the house, and the appellee agreeing to put it in proper condition. That was No. 3036 Elliott street.

The principal question in the case is whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the additional costs and expenses incurred, by reason of those conditions, on the promise of the appellant to pay him for them. The precise question for our consideration is presented by the plaintiff's fifth prayer, which was granted. After referring to the written contract made in April or May, 1903, and the refusal of the plaintiff in June, 1903, to perform and complete said contract the prayer further submitted to the jury to find whether "said refusal on the part of the plaintiff was induced by substantial and unforeseen difficulties in the performance, which would cast upon the plaintiff additional burden not anticipated by the parties when the contract was made, and if they further find that after said refusal by the plaintiff the defendant, to induce the plaintiff to resume the work thus abandoned, promised him to see him through and to stand the consequences, and that, relying upon said promise, the plaintiff completed the work then their verdict may be for the plaintiff," etc. That prayer seems to have followed quite closely the language used in King v. Duluth, M. & N. Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 487, 63 N. W. 1105, which case, notwithstanding unfavorable criticisms by some writers, in our opinion, announces a principle which is not only just and equitable, but is easily reconcilable with the general rule that a promise to do, or actually doing, that which a party to a contract is already under legal obligation to do, is not a valid consideration to support the promise of the other party to the contract to pay additional compensation for such performance. In King v. Duluth, after stating that general rule, it is added: "In other words, a promise by one party to a subsisting contract to the opposite party to prevent a breach of the contract on his part is without consideration." The court then cited Ayers v. Railroad Co., 52 Iowa, 478, 3 N. W. 522, Lingenfelder v. Brewing Co., 103 Mo. 578, 15 S. W. 844, Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392, and other cases, most of which are among those relied on by the appellant as sustaining and illustrating the general rule which the Supreme Court of Minnesota unhesitatingly and emphatically approved of. Indeed the court said that the doctrine of Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 305; Goebel v. Linn, 47 Mich. 489, 11 N. W. 284, 41 Am. Rep. 723; Rogers v. Rogers, 139 Mass. 440, 1 N. E. 122; Byrant v. Lord, 19 Minn. 396 (Gil. 342), and Moore v. Locomotive Works, 14 Mich. 266, as it is frequently applied, did not commend itself to their judgment or sense of justice.

Those are some of a number of cases which have sustained actions for additional compensation on various theories—some on the ground of waiver, others on the ground that the party for whom the work was done had the election of suing the other party for damages for breach of contract or to make a new contract, and others that it was a modification of the original contract, etc. Chief Justice Start of the Minnesota court, in the course of the opinion, said: "It is entirely competent for the parties to a contract to modify or waive their rights under it and ingraft new terms upon it, and in such a case the promise of one party is the consideration for that of the other; but, where the promise to the one is simply a repetition of a subsisting legal promise, there can be no consideration for the promise of the other party, and there is no warrant for inferring that the parties have voluntarily rescinded or modified their contract. But, where the party refusing to complete his contract does so by reason of some unforeseen and substantial difficulties in the performance of the contract, which were not known or anticipated by the parties when the contract was entered into, and which cast upon him an additional burden not contemplated by the parties, and the opposite party promises him extra pay or benefits if he will complete his contract, and he so promises, the promise to pay is supported by a valid consideration. In such a case the natural inference arising from the transaction, if unmodified by any equitable considerations, is rebutted, and the presumption arises that by the voluntary and mutual promises of the parties their respective rights and obligations under the original contract are waived, and those of the new or modified contract substituted for them. Cases of this character form an exception to the general rule," etc. The opinion then goes on to say that on the other hand, when there are no unforeseen additional burdens which make the refusal to perform, unless promised further pay, equitable, and such refusal and promise of extra pay are one transaction the promise is without consideration and the case is within the general rule. It then holds that what unforeseen difficulties and burdens will make the refusal to perform equitable, so as to bring it within the exception to the general rule, must depend upon the facts of each particular case.

We have thus referred to, and quoted from, that case at unusual length, because the principles therein announced seem to us to be, not only well and clearly stated, but just, and founded on reasons that any court of justice should hesitate to reject, unless they conflict with some binding authority or established rule of law, which, in our judgment, they do not. When two parties make a contract, based on supposed facts which they afterwards ascertain to be incorrect, and which would not have been entered into by the one party if he had known the actual conditions which the contract required him to meet, not only courts of justice but all right thinking people must believe the fair course for the other party to the contract to pursue is either to relieve the contractor of going on with his contract or to pay him additional compensation. If the difficulties be unforeseen, and such as neither party contemplated, or could have from the appearance of the thing to be dealt with anticipated, it would be an extremely harsh rule of law to hold that there was no legal way of binding the owner of property to fulfill a promise made by him to pay the contractor such additional sum as such unforeseen difficulties cost him. But we do not understand the authorities to sustain such a rule. On the contrary they hold that the parties can rescind the original contract, and then enter into a new one, by which a larger consideration for the same work and materials that were to be done and furnished under the first contract can be validly agreed upon. * * *

We are, however, of the opinion that this prayer can be sustained on the ground stated in King v. Duluth, etc., Ry. Co., supra, and other cases, which is, as expressed in that case, that "by the voluntary and mutual promises of the parties their respective rights and obligations under the original contract are waived, and those of the new or modified contract substituted for them." When there is such a strong moral obligation as there was in this case to give the appellee relief, it would be making an exceedingly technical distinction to hold that the promise would have been binding if the original contract would have been expressly rescinded, but that it is not binding because there was no express or actual rescission, although the facts show that it was undoubtedly intended by the parties that neither should be held to the terms of the original contract. Of course it will be borne in mind that the court in King v. Duluth, etc., Ry. Co., only applied the principle announced to cases where the refusal to perform was equitable and fair, and the difficulties were substantial, unforeseen, and not within the contemplation of the parties when the original contract was made. The opinion also excluded from the application of the principle mere "inadequacy of the contract price which is the result of an error of judgment, and not of some excusable mistake of fact." * * *

SCHWARTZREICH v. BAUMAN-BASCH, Inc.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Term, 1918. 105 Misc. Rep. 214, 172 N. Y. Supp. 683.)

Appeal by plaintiff from an order and judgment of the City Court of the City of New York respectively setting aside the verdict of a jury and dismissing the complaint.

BIJUR, J. Plaintiff, an employee, sued his employer, the defendant, for breach of a written contract of employment, made October 17, 1917, to continue for twelve months, beginning November 22, under which plaintiff was to receive a salary of $100 per week. It appeared on the trial that on August 31, 1917, a written contract in all respects identical with the one sued upon had been made between the parties. except that the weekly salary was therein fixed at $90.

The trial was conducted with great care and exactness by both court and counsel, and the court in charging the jury repeatedly impressed upon it that "the test question is whether by word or by act, either prior to or at the time of the signing of the $100 contract, these parties mutually agreed that the old contract from that instant should be null and void."

The jury having brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the court, upon a motion of the defendant to set the verdict aside, "particularly on the ground that there is no evidence in the case of mutual consent or agreement to cancel the first contract at the time or prior to the execution of the second contract," ultimately granted the motion and dismissed the complaint under a reservation of power made at the trial, saying "that there was not sufficient evidence that the first 80 In accord: King v. Duluth, M. & N. Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 482, 63 N. W. 1105 (1895); Osborne v. O'Reilly, 42 N. J. Eq. 467, 9 Atl. 209 (1887).

Where there is unexpected difficulty or expense, due to the conduct of the defendant himself, or where the work done by the plaintiff was changed in its character, location, or amount by the defendant, there is ample consideration for the new promise to pay increased compensation. United Steel Co. v. Casey (C. C. A.) 262 Fed. 889 (1920). There the court further said: "Where a contract must be performed under burdensome conditions not anticipated, and not within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made, and the promisee measures up to the right standard of honesty and fair dealing, and [the promisor] agrees, in view of the changed conditions, to pay what is then reasonable, just, and fair, such new contract is not without consideration within the meaning of that term, either in law or in equity."

contract was canceled upon the making of the second one to warrant the jury's finding."

The contending parties agree fairly well on the substantive law applicable to the case. It is conceded that "a promise by one party to do that which he is already under a legal obligation to perform is insufficient as a consideration to support a contract." Carpenter v. Taylor, 164 N. Y. 171, 177, 58 N. E. 53; Robinson v. Jewett, 116 N. Y. 40, 22 N. E. 224; Seybolt v. N. Y., L. E. & W. R. R., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392. It is true that appellant urges that the mere making of a subsequent agreement covering the same subject matter necessarily supersedes a prior agreement to the same effect (citing Housekeeper Pub. Co. v. Swift, 97 Fed. 290, 38 C. C. A. 187, and McCabe Const. Co. v. Utah Const. Co. [D. C.] 199 Fed. 976), but I cannot find in the opinions in those cases that the question whether under such circumstances there is any consideration for the second contract was raised or suggested. The principle itself is too well established to be questioned. It has been applied to a case of an increase of salary similar to the one under consideration in Cosgray v. N. E. Piano Co., 10 App. Div. 351, 41 N. Y. Supp. 886.

On the other hand, in a leading case in this state (Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, supra, 91 N. Y. 392), it is said on page 402: "It would doubtless be competent for parties to cancel an existing contract and make a new one to complete the same work at a different rate of compensation, but it seems that it would be essential to its validity that there should be a valid cancellation of the original contract. Such was the case of Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 John. 330." To the same effect is Stewart v. Keteltas, 36 N. Y. 388; Hart v. Lauman, 29 Barb. 410, 415, 416. And the question whether the earlier agreement had been canceled was expressly submitted to the jury and answered in the negative in Harris v. Carter, 3 El. & Bl. 559.

It is not necessary, as I view it, in the instant case to determine whether in order to sustain the second agreement the cancellation of the first must have taken place before the second was physically signed. My own opinion is that the time of signing the second contract is in this connection immaterial. A written agreement in order to become effective must be "delivered." The delivery may be informal and inartificial, provided the intent is sufficiently demonstrated. Dietz v. Farish, 79 N. Y. 520; Sarasohn v. Kamaiky, 193 N. Y. 203, 215, 86 N. E. 20. Similarly, the cancellation or, as it is sometimes called, the "rescission," of an agreement may be evidenced by implication quite as effectively as by express words. Hart v. Lauman, supra. And whether it has taken place may be determined by all the circumstances in evidence which affect it. Matter of Chamberlain, 146 App. Div. 583, 131 N. Y. Supp. 245, affirmed 204 N. Y. 665, 97 N. E. 1103.

It seems to me, therefore, that if after the second agreement had actually been signed the parties had canceled the earlier one, and the circumstances indicated the intent to redeliver or make effective the second agreement, there is no reason why that result might not validly be achieved. This nice question, however, need not be decided in the instant case, for, as I read the record, there was evidence upon which the jury might properly have based its finding that it was the intention of the parties to and that they actually did cancel the first contract before the execution of the second agreement.

Plaintiff testified that he delivered the earlier contract to defendant's president Bauman, at the time of the signing of the later one, and Bauman said to him, "You do not want this contract any more because the new one takes its place." Bauman testified that the first contract was not handed to him at the signing of the second contract, but that plaintiff tore off the signatures to the old contract in his presence, to which he made no objection, and that this was done "after I gave him the new contract; he tore the signatures off." As defendant-respondent interprets this testimony: "According to the plaintiff's version, after the second contract was signed plaintiff offered to Mr. Bauman his copy of the first contract, and Mr. Bauman refused to accept it. According to defendant's version, after the contract was signed plaintiff offered Mr. Bauman his copy of the first contract; he refused to accept it, and thereupon plaintiff tore off the signatures at the bottom of his copy. Upon neither version of this occurrence can an agreement binding on the defendant be spelled out to cancel and rescind the first contract."

There might be some force in this contention if it could be successfully maintained that the only way to cancel an agreement was to return to the respective signatories the duplicates thereof, or to tear off the signatures, or even if such cancellation could be evidenced by those circumstances alone. The mere statement of the proposition, however, suffices for its own refutation. The question submitted to the jury was, "Did the parties prior to the signing of the second agreement cancel the first?" It is conceded that the second agreement was drawn up by the defendant's president in the plaintiff's presence and was thereupon signed by both parties. Bauman testified:

"Q. And was it your understanding at the time that you signed the paper and gave him one copy of it that you were giving him a contract for the year ending November, 1918 (the same term as was covered by the prior agreement)? A. That is right. Q. Did you receive any other paper at that time? A. No, sir. Q. Now, are you positive about that? A. Positive. Q. Didn't you say to Mr. Schwartzreich (plaintiff) at that time that he should give you a paper that you had signed before? A. I did. Q. Did he give it to you? A. Not at that time * * * Later he gave it to me.

"The Court: Q. Was that contract of August?

"Plaintiff's Counsel: A. That was the contract of August."

The testimony of Bauman that at the time of execution of the second contract he demanded from plaintiff the surrender of plaintiff's copy of the old agreement is not explained upon, and cannot be reconciled with any other theory than that Bauman understood that the parties had previously agreed that the first contract be canceled. I am, indeed, inclined to believe that this evidence is well nigh conclusive to that effect, but in any event it furnished, together with the balance of the testimony, ample ground for the finding of the jury, which I also think was correct.

The order setting aside the verdict and the judgment dismissing the complaint should be reversed and the verdict and judgment reinstated, with costs to appellant.

MULLAN, J. (dissenting). Of course it goes without saying that the parties could have canceled the old contract and subsequently have made a new one. It is equally plain that they observed the formalities usual in making a contract, that is to say, they performed all the necessary gestures and gave promise for promise, and made what would have been, except for the rule of law under discussion, the clearest example of a good contract. But were the parties capable, at the time, of making that particular contract? The answer to that question depends upon the answer to the primary question, whether, when the second contract was made, the first contract was at an end.

A true cancellation of a contract leaves the parties to it in statu quo ante; that is, it leaves them in the same situation in respect of the subject-matter of the canceled contract as if they had never seen or heard of each other. An agreement to cancel a contract is itself just as truly a contract as the contract it terminates, and its effect is to put an end to the contract not merely that the contractors may thereby be enabled to enter into a new contract with each other, but to leave them in perfect freedom to refuse to enter into any further contractual relationship with each other. Now, it may be theoretically possible for parties to a contract genuinely to terminate it by agreement, thereby intending to be free to refuse to deal with each other again, and then immediately and genuinely to change their minds and remake the contract that was canceled, with a change of terms in favor of one party only. It is more reasonable, however, to assume that at least some few moments must elapse between the time when two given minds shall agree to cancel an existing contract and the time when those same two minds shall decide to reinstate it or again make one very like it. In the world of the realities lightning fast changes of the kind that must have taken place to make the second contract good do not occur, and I feel quite safe in saying dogmatically that no such sudden revulsion occurred here; nor indeed do I understand that such an absurdity is claimed. Can it be seriously urged that the defendant was willing that the plaintiff should have any moment of freedom from the old contract—such freedom I mean as to give the plaintiff the right to seek employment from some one other than the defendant? I think it is very clear that the parties never intended to be free from each other, and that the new contract was a mere substitution for the old one, and that is precisely what the rule that refuses validity to a promise to pay more for what the promisee has already obligated to do was intended to prevent.

There is nothing in this case that distinguishes it from the many cases in the books in which the ancient rule of law referred to was applied. The tearing up of one writing and the delivery of another writing in its stead are unimportant evidentiary details. Whenever the question of the rule's applicability has arisen one contract has been in legal effect destroyed and another contract, valid but for the rule, has been substituted for it. Quite obviously, the physical tearing of a piece of paper accomplishes nothing more than does an oral agreement to cancel; and I see no importance in the particular chronological order in which the various physical gestures occurred. Indeed, it seems to me that the entire argument of the appellant amounts to nothing more than a mere magnification of the value of immaterial details and misses the real meaning and purpose of the doctrine we are dealing with. That the courts have shown no disposition to authorize any departure from the rule is shown in a comparatively recent case (Weed v. Spears, 193 N. Y. 289, 86 N. E. 10), where it was said:

"Thus the only question presented in this case is whether a new promise by a party to do less than he has already agreed to do is a sufficient consideration for the promise of another party to do more than he is obliged to do. It seems to me that the negative answer to that question is so plain that there is no opportunity for doubt.

"Brief reference will be made to some of the arguments advanced in behalf of the respondents in favor of a different answer.

"It is said that mutual promises are a consideration for an executory agreement, and that the respondents having performed their executory agreement it will be a perversion of the rules of law to permit the defendant now to escape performance on his part. Of course there is no doubt that under ordinary circumstances mutual promises are a consideration one for the other, and such was undoubtedly the effect and value of the mutual promises of these parties contained in the original written agreement.

"The trouble with the last mutual promises relied on by the respondent is that they afford no consideration to the appellant when measured by the obligations already resting upon the parties."

The view I take makes it unprofitable to discuss any of the cases cited by my learned brother except Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330 and Harris v. Carter, 3 El. & Bl., 559. In the Lattimore case the new contract that was held valid entirely changed the obligations of both parties, and so, of course, the rule in question had no applicability. It is true that in the English case the trial judge before making his decision asked for a special verdict from the jury, but just what he expected them to pass upon I cannot conceive, for there, as here, there was no hiatus between the two engagements, only one party was advantaged by the change, and there was nothing to decide but a question of law. For the reasons stated I vote to affirm.

Judgment and order reversed, with costs to appellant.

EVANS v. OREGON & W. R. CO. et al.

Action by J. S. Evans against the Oregon & Washington Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendants M. W. Dibble and another, they appeal. Affirmed.

Gose, J. Prior to August 12, 1907, the appellants entered into a contract with the respondent Oregon & Washington Railroad Company for grading a part of its roadbed in Lewis county. On that date the appellants entered into a written contract with the respondent, Evans, by which they sublet to him a portion of the work. The respondent, Evans, commenced work under his contract, but, finding that the compensation agreed upon was inadequate, abandoned the work. The following day, at the instance of the division engineer of the railroad company, a Mr. Abbott, Evans and Abbott went to see the appellant Dibble, and informed him that Evans was dissatisfied, and had quit work. Evans then complained of the refusal of the appellants to pay a certain bill, and further said to them that he did not want to resume work because he had struck gumbo, and could not make anything. Abbott insisted that he should go on with the work, and stated in the presence of the appellant Dibble that, if he would continue and complete the work, "we will see that the bills are paid and you get a reasonable wage." Dibble was present, but said nothing further than to discuss the bill. The respondent Evans then resumed and completed the work, and, upon the refusal of the parties to pay a portion of the bills and his wages, brought this suit against his corespondent and the appellants to enforce the oral contract. At the close of his testimony, a motion for a nonsuit was granted as to the railroad company and denied as to the appellants. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the respondent Evans against the appellants, and they have appealed.[81]

The first point suggested by the appellants is that the oral contract, if made, was without consideration, and not enforceable. It is insisted that neither the promise to do, nor the doing of that which the promissor is by law or subsisting contract bound to do, is a sufficient consideration to support a contract in his favor. We cannot assent to this view of the law. We think the better rule is that, where a party has breached his contract and refused to perform it, it is optional with the adverse party to sue him for damages or waive the breach, treat the contract as abrogated, and enter into a new contract with the delinquent party. It would seem to be elementary that parties competent to contract can abrogate or rescind the contract and enter into a new contract touching the same subject-matter to be performed, in the same or a different way, upon a different consideration. In the case at bar the appellants had contracted to do certain work, and it was important to them that the work that Evans had agreed to perform should go forward. When he abandoned the work, they had the election to hold him answerable in damages or to make a new contract with him. They chose the latter course, and cannot now be heard to say that the contract was nudum pactum.

This position has abundant support in the authorities. "Where the contractor refuses to perform his contract, and the builder promises to pay him additional compensation in consideration of the continued performance of the contract, the authorities are not in accord on the question whether the promise for additional compensation is supported by a sufficient consideration. The prevailing rule seems to be, however, that such a promise is valid as an abandonment of the original contract and the creation of a new contract." 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 1197. * * * It must be conceded, however, that the courts are not agreed upon this question, and judges of the highest ability have announced the view urged by the appellants. The view we have taken will permit greater freedom in contracting, and is, we think, more in harmony with the fundamental conception of contracts. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

SHERWOOD v. WOODWARD.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1599. Cro. Eliz. 700.)

Assumpsit. Whereas he sold to the defendant's son certain weights of cheese; the defendant, in consideration the plaintiff would deliver the said cheese to his said son, assumed, that if the son did not pay for them, then he would; and for non-payment the action was brought. Upon non assumpsit pleaded, and found for the plaintiff, it was moved by Godfrey in arrest of judgment, that this was not any consideration; for it is no more than what the law appoints, to deliver that which he sold, the property whereof is in the son by the sale.—But GAWDY and FENNER held it to be a good consideration; for it is an ease to the bargainee to have them without suit, which peradventure otherwise he could not have had. And although the bargainee may take them in this case, the bargainor is not bound to deliver them; and there is a new act done by him upon this agreement, and it is an ease to the vendee; and 12 Hen. VII is, that to deliver the goods of the party himself at another place, is a good accord. Wherefore, cæteris justitiariis absentibus, they adjudged it for the plaintiff.

BAGGE v. SLADE.

In a writ of error to reverse a judgment given against him in an action upon the case for a promise. In the town Court of Yevell, in commitatu Sommerset. The error assigned and insisted upon was this, because there wanted a good consideration to raise the promise, and so no cause of action.

COKE, C. J. The case was this, two men were bound in a bond for the debt of a third man; the obligation being forfeited, so that they both of them were liable to pay this. The plaintiff here in this writ of error said to the other, "Pay you all the debt, and I will pay you the moiety of this again," the which he paid accordingly, and so made his request to have a repayment made to him of the moiety according to his promise, which to do he refused. Upon this he brought his action upon the case against the plaintiff upon his promise, and upon non assumpsit pleaded, he had a verdict and judgment, and upon this judgment a writ of error was brought. In this case and in the declaration there is a good consideration set forth, the party's own contract here shall bind him, he hath no remedy for the money paid, but when this is paid, here is good assumpsit grounded upon a good consideration for repayment of the moiety by the plaintiff.

HAUGHTON, J. Notwithstanding this contract he is still least in danger of the first bond.

COKE. I have never seen it otherwise, but when one draws money from another that this should be a good consideration to raise a promise.

DODDERIDGE, J. If the consideration puts the other to charge, though it be no ways at all profitable to him who made the promise, yet this shall be a good consideration to raise a promise.

COKE agreed with him herein, also if a man be bound to another by a bill in £1,000 and he pays unto him £500 in discharge of this bill, the which he accepts of accordingly, and doth upon this assume and promise to deliver up unto him his said bill of £1,000, this £500 is no satisfaction of the £1,000, but yet this is good and sufficient to make a good promise, and upon a good consideration, because he had paid money, £500, and he had no remedy for this again.

Another matter was moved, that the entry of the judgment was not good, the same being in this manner, Ideo consideratum fuit, adtunc, and ibidem hic ad eandem Curiam, quod prædictus querens recuperet.

The whole Court agreed this judgment to be well entered, and that the consideration here is good, and sufficient to raise the promise, and accordingly the rule of the Court was quod judicium affirmetur.

Judgment affirmed per curiam.

SHADWELL v. SHADWELL.

(In the Court of Common Pleas, 1860. 30 L. J. C. P. 145.)

The declaration stated that the testator, in his lifetime (in consideration that the plaintiff would marry Ellen Nicholl), agreed with and promised the plaintiff, who was then unmarried, in the terms contained in a writing in the form of a letter, addressed by the said testator to the plaintiff, which writing was and is in the words, letters, and figures following—that is to say:

Gray's Inn, August 11, 1838.

"My Dear Lancey: I am glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl; and, as I promised to assist you at starting, I am happy to tell you that I will pay to you £150 yearly during my life, and until your annual income derived from your profession of a Chancery barrister shall amount to 600 guineas, of which your own admission will be the only evidence that I shall receive or require.

"Your ever affectionate uncle, Charles Shadwell."

Averment that the plaintiff did all things necessary, and all things necessary happened, to entitle him to have the said testator pay to him eighteen of the said yearly sums of £150 each respectively, and that the time for the payment of each of the said eighteen yearly sums elapsed after he married the said Ellen Nicholl, and in the lifetime of the said testator, and that the plaintiff's annual income derived from his profession of a Chancery barrister never amounted to 600 guineas, which he was always ready and willing to admit and state to the said testator, and the said testator paid to the plaintiff twelve of the said eighteen yearly sums which first became payable, and part, to wit, £12 of the thirteenth; yet the said testator made default in paying the residue of the said thirteenth yearly sum, which residue is still in arrear and unpaid, and in paying the five of the said eighteen yearly sums which last became payable, and the said five sums are still in arrear and unpaid.

Fourth plea, that before and at the time of the making of the supposed agreement and promise in the declaration mentioned, the said marriage had been and was without any request by or on the part of the testator touching the said intended marriage, but at the request of the plaintiff, intended and agreed upon between the plaintiff and the said Ellen Nicholl, of which the testator before and at the time of making the supposed agreement and promise also had notice, and the said marriage was after the making of the supposed agreement and promise duly had and solemnized as in the declaration mentioned, at the request of the plaintiff, and without the request of the testator. And the defendants further say, that save and except as expressed and contained in the writing set forth in the declaration, there never was any consideration for the supposed agreement and promise in the declaration mentioned, or for the performance thereof.

Fifth plea, to part of the claim of the plaintiff, to wit, to so much thereof as accrued due in and after the year 1855, the defendants say that although the supposed agreement and promise in the declaration mentioned were made upon the terms then agreed on by the plaintiff and the testator, that the plaintiff should continue in practice and carry on the profession of such Chancery barrister as aforesaid, and should not abandon the same; yet that after the making of the said agreement and promise, and before the accruing of the supposed causes by this plea pleaded to and in the declaration mentioned, or any part thereof, the plaintiff voluntarily, and without the leave or license of the testator, relinquished and gave up and abandoned the practice of the said profession of a Chancery barrister, which before and at the time of the said making of the said supposed agreement and promise, he had so carried on as aforesaid; and although the plaintiff could and might, during the time in this plea and in the declaration mentioned, have continued to practice and carry on that profession as aforesaid, yet the plaintiff, after such abandonment thereof, never was ready and willing to practise the same as aforesaid, but practised only as a revising barrister—that is to say, as a barrister appointed yearly to revise the list of voters for the year, for the county of Middlesex, according to the provisions of the statutes in that behalf, by holding open courts for such revision at the times and places in that behalf provided by the said statutes.

Second replication to the fourth plea, that the said agreement declared on was made in writing, signed by the said testator, and was and is in the words, letters, and figures following, and in none other—that is to say [setting out the letter as in the declaration above]. Averment that the plaintiff afterward married the said Ellen Nicholl, relying on the said promise of the said testator, which at the time of the said marriage was in full force, not in any way vacated or revoked and that he so married while his annual income derived from his profession of a Chancery barrister did not amount, and was not by him admitted to amount, to 600 guineas.

Second replication to the fifth plea, that the said agreement declared on was in writing, signed by the testator, and was and is in the words, letters, and figures set out in the next preceding replication, and in none other, and that the terms upon which it is in the fifth plea alleged that the said agreement and promise were made were no part of the agreement and promise declared on, and the performance of them by the plaintiff was not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to be paid the said annuity.

Demurrers to the replications to the fourth and fifth pleas. Joinder in demurrer.

Erle, C. J., now delivered the judgment of himself and Keating, J. The question raised by the demurrer to the replication to the fourth plea is, whether there was a consideration to support the action on the promise to pay an annuity of £150 per annum. If there be such a consideration it is a marriage; therefore the promise is within the Statute of Frauds, and the consideration must appear in the writing containing the promise—that is, in the letter of August 11th, 1838—and in the surrounding circumstances to be gathered therefrom, together with the averments on the record. The circumstances are that the plaintiff had made an engagement to marry Ellen Nicholl, his uncle promising him to assist him at starting, by which, as I understand the words, he meant on commencing his married life. Then the letter containing the promise declared on is said to specify what the assistance would be—namely, £150 per annum during the uncle's life, and until the plaintiff's professional income should be acknowledged by him to exceed 600 guineas; and a further averment, that the plaintiff, relying upon his promise, without any revocation on the part of the uncle, did marry Ellen Nicholl. Then, do these facts show that the promise was in consideration, either of the loss to be sustained by the plaintiff, or the benefit to be derived from the plaintiff to the uncle at his, the uncle's request? My answer is in the affirmative. First, do these facts show a loss sustained by the plaintiff at the uncle's request? When I answer this in the affirmative, I am aware that a man's marriage with the woman of his choice is in one sense a boon, and in that sense the reverse of a loss; yet, as between the plaintiff and the party promising an income to support the marriage, it may be a loss. The plaintiff may have made the most material changes in his position, and have induced the object of his affections to do the same, and have incurred pecuniary liabilities resulting in embarrassments, which would be in every sense a loss if the income which had been promised should be withheld; and if the promise was made in order to induce the parties to marry, the promise so made would be, in legal effect, a request to marry. Secondly, do these facts show a benefit derived from the plaintiff to the uncle at his request? In answering again in the affirmative, I am at liberty to consider the relation in which the parties stood, and the interest in the status of the nephew which the uncle declares. The marriage primarily affects the parties thereto; but in the second degree it may be an object of interest with a near relative, and in that sense a benefit to him. This benefit is also derived from the plaintiff at the uncle's request, if the promise of the annuity was intended as an inducement to the marriage; and the averment that the plaintiff, relying on the promise, married, is an averment that the promise was one inducement to the marriage. This is a consideration averred in the declaration, and it appears to me to be expressed in the letter, construed with the surrounding circumstances. No case bearing a strong analogy to the present was cited, but the importance of enforcing promises which have been made to induce parties to marry has been often recognized, and the cases of Montefiori v. Montefiori and Bold v. Hutchinson are examples. I do not feel it necessary to add anything about the numerous authorities referred to in the learned arguments addressed to us, because the decision turns on a question of fact, whether the consideration for the promise is proved as pleaded. I think it is, and therefore my judgment on the first demurrer is for the plaintiff. The second demurrer raises the question, whether the plaintiff's continuing at the bar was made a condition precedent to the right to the annuity. I think not. The uncle promises to continue the annuity until the professional income exceeds the sum mentioned, and I find no stipulation that the annuity shall cease if the professional diligence ceases. My judgment on this demurrer is also for the plaintiff, and I should state that this is the judgment of my Brother KEATING and myself, my Brother BYLES differing with us.

BYLES, J. I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the Court on the demurrer to the second replication to the fourth plea. It is alleged by the fourth plea that the defendant's testator never requested the plaintiff to enter into the engagement to marry, or to marry, and that there never was any consideration for the testator's promise, except what may be collected from the letter itself set out in the declaration. The inquiry, therefore, narrows itself to this question, Does the letter itself disclose any consideration for the promise? The consideration relied on by the plaintiff's counsel being the subsequent marriage of the plaintiff, I think the letter discloses no consideration. It is in these words [his Lordship read it]. It is by no means clear that the words "at starting" mean "on marriage with Ellen Nicholl," or with any one else. The more natural meaning seems to me to be "at starting in the profession," for it will be observed that these words are used by the testator in reciting a prior promise, made when the testator had not heard of the proposed marriage with Ellen Nicholl, or, so far as appears, heard of any proposed marriage. This construction is fortified by the consideration that the annuity is not, in terms, made to begin from the marriage, but, as it should seem, from the date of the letter. Neither is it in terms made defeasible if Ellen Nicholl should die before marriage.

But even on the assumption that the words "at starting" mean "on marriage," I still think that no consideration appears sufficient to sustain the promise. The promise is one which, by law, must be in writing; and the fourth plea shows that no consideration or request, dehors the letter, existed, and, therefore, that no such consideration or request can be alluded to by the letter. Marriage of the plaintiff at the testator's express request would be, no doubt, an ample consideration, but marriage of the plaintiff without the testator's request is no consideration to the testator. It is true that marriage is, or may be a detriment to the plaintiff; but detriment to the plaintiff is not enough, unless it either be a benefit to the testator or be treated by the testator as such, by having been suffered at his request. Suppose a defendant to promise a plaintiff, "I will give you £500 if you break your leg," would that detriment to the plaintiff, should it happen, be any consideration? If it be said that such an accident is an involuntary mischief, would it have been a binding promise if the testator had said, "I will give you £100 a year while you continue in your present chambers" ? I conceive that the promise would not be binding for want of a previous request by the testator.

Now, the testator in the case before the court derived, so far as appears, no personal benefit from the marriage. The question, therefore, is still further narrowed to this point, Was the marriage at the testator's request? Express request there was none. Can any request be implied? The only words from which it can be contended that it is to be implied are the words, "I am glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl." But it appears from the fourth plea that that marriage had already been agreed on, and that the testator knew it. These words, therefore, seem to me to import no more than the satisfaction of the testator at the engagement as an accomplished fact. No request can, as it seems to me, be inferred from them.

And, further, how does it appear that the testator's implied request, if it could be implied, or his promise, if that promise alone would suffice or both together, were intended to cause the marriage, or did cause it, so that the marriage can be said to have taken place at the testator's request, or, in other words, in consequence of that request? It seems to me, not only that this does not appear, but that the contrary appears; for the plaintiff before the letter had already bound himself to marry by placing himself not only under a moral, but under a legal obligation to marry, and the testator knew it. The well-known cases which have been cited at the bar in support of the position that a promise, based on the consideration of doing that which a man is already bound to do, is invalid, apply to this case; and it is not necessary, in order to invalidate the consideration, that the plaintiff's prior obligation to afford that consideration should have been an obligation to the defendant. It may have been an obligation to a third person. See Herring v. Dorell [8 Dowl. P. C. 604] and Atkinson v. Settree [Willes, 482]. The reason why the doing what a man is already bound to do is no consideration, is not only because such a consideration is in judgment of law of no value, but because a man can hardly be allowed to say that the prior legal obligation was not his determining motive.

But whether he can be allowed to say so or not, the plaintiff does not say so here. He does, indeed, make an attempt to meet this difficulty by alleging, in the replication to the fourth plea, that he married relying on the testator's promise; but he shrinks from alleging that though he had promised to marry before the testator's promise to him, nevertheless, he would have broken his engagement, and would not have married without the testator's promise. A man may rely on encouragements to the performance to his duty who yet is prepared to do his duty without those encouragements. At the utmost, the allegation that he relied on the testator's promise seems to me to import no more than that he believed the testator would be as good as his word. It appears to me, for these reasons, that this letter is no more than a letter of kindness, creating no legal obligation. In their judgment on the other portions of the record I agree with the rest of the Court.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

VANDERBILT v. SCHREYER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1883. 91 N. Y. 392.)

RUGER, C. J.[82] This was an action to foreclose a mortgage for $5,000 given September 5th, 1873, by one James Dunseith and wife to John Schreyer, and by him assigned to the plaintiff on May 5th, 1874.

Schreyer was made a party defendant, and it was sought to charge him with the payment of any deficiency that might arise upon a sale of the mortgaged premises, upon the ground that he had guaranteed the payment of the mortgage debt.

Schreyer answered, and after admitting the assignment and the guaranty of payment alleged by way of defence, that on February 2d, 1874, the plaintiff entered into a contract with George Gebhardt and Matthew L. Ritchie for the erection by him of certain buildings for them upon certain lots in the city of New York, for which he was to receive $8,175, to be paid as follows: "When the said houses are topped out, a payment of $5,000 by assignment of a bond and mortgage held by John Schreyer on the property of Anna Maria Schreyer, No. 350 West Forty-Second Street, New York City," and the balance, amounting to $3,175, when the houses should be fully completed. Vanderbilt commenced performance of his contract and continued until he became entitled to the assignment of the $5,000 mortgage. Schreyer thereupon offered to assign it to the plaintiff, but the latter refused to accept an assignment unless Schreyer would also guarantee payment. The defendant refused to do this, and Vanderbilt then suspended work upon the buildings for about two months. The defendant then under protest, and believing, as he alleges, that he was acting under compulsion, executed the assignment with the guaranty in question. The plaintiff then completed his contract and received the balance of the consideration. The answer further states "that it was neither under said contract or otherwise made a condition of the plaintiff's accepting the assignment of said mortgage that this defendant or any other person should guarantee the payment thereof," and further "that no consideration ever passed to him or his principals for such guaranty, and the same was and is null and void."

Upon the trial of the action at Special Term the plaintiff produced and proved the mortgage in question, and also an assignment from defendant to plaintiff in the usual form, but containing the following clause: "And I hereby guarantee the payment of said bond and mortgage for $5,000 and interest from May 5, 1874, by due foreclosure and sale." The assignment and guaranty were sealed and executed in the presence of a subscribing witness. The plaintiff thereupon rested, and the defendant offered to prove in substance the facts alleged in his answer, which offer was objected to and excluded upon the ground that such answer did not set up facts constituting a defense. The defendant excepted to such ruling. The court thereupon held that said guaranty was absolute and ordered judgment against Schreyer for the deficiency which had previously been ascertained by a sale of the premises. An appeal was taken to the General Term, which reversed the judgment and directed a dismissal of the complaint upon the ground that Schreyer was improperly made a defendant, because the guaranty in question was in effect a guaranty of collection only, and that no right of action arose thereon until after the amount of the deficiency had been ascertained by a judicial sale of the mortgaged premises.

We differ in our conclusion from that reached by both of the courts below.[83] * * *

A more serious question however arises under the exception taken to the rulings of the special term excluding the evidence offered by the defendant to prove the facts stated in his answer, showing that the guaranty was without consideration.

In considering this question the allegations in the answer must be assumed to be true, and that the defendant would have proved them if he had not been precluded by the rulings of the court from doing so. The answer, while perhaps inartificially drawn, certainly alleged all of the facts necessary to show that neither Gebhardt and Ritchie, nor the plaintiff, had received any consideration for the guaranty in question. This he should have been allowed to prove. The production of the assignment in evidence, purporting to be executed "for value received," and being under seal was prima facie evidence only of a valuable consideration. It was not conclusive and could be disproved if it was in the defendant's power to do so. 3 Rev. St. (6th Ed.) 672, § 124; Bookstaver v. Jayne, 60 N. Y. 146; Anthony v. Harrison, 14 Hun, 198, affirmed in this court, 74 N. Y. 613.

The incorporation of this guaranty into the assignment for which there was a consideration does not affect the question. It was not essential to the assignment and was, so far as its legal effect was concerned, a separate instrument, and must be supported upon a sufficient consideration or treated as nudum pactum.

It is quite clear that the plaintiff had no right to demand this guaranty by the terms of his original contract with Gebhardt and Ritchie. That was satisfied by a mere naked transfer of his interest in the mortgage.

[83] The court here held that the promise was a conditional guaranty of collection, but that under the procedural statutes the guarantor was properly joined in the foreclosure suit.

It was held in Van Eps v. Schenectady, 12 Johns. 436, 7 Am. Dec. 330, that an agreement to execute a deed of lands was satisfied by the execution of a deed, without warranty or covenants. So it has been held that a party has no right to impose any conditions to the performance of a contract, except those contained in the contract itself. Furnace Co. v. French, 34 How. Prac. 94. It being clear that Vanderbilt had no legal right to require, as a condition to the fulfillment of his contract, the performance of an act not required by the contract, it is difficult to see what benefit he has bestowed or what inconvenience he has suffered in return for the undertaking assumed by the defendant. He promises to do only that which he was before legally bound to perform. Even though it lay in his power to refuse to perform his contract, he could do this only upon paying the other party the damages occasioned by his nonperformance, and that in contemplation of law would be equivalent to performance. He had no legal or moral right to refuse to perform the obligation of the contract into which he had upon a good consideration voluntarily entered.

There is no evidence in support of a claim that this guaranty was given as a compromise of any dispute arising with reference to the obligations of the plaintiff under his contract with Gebhardt and Ritchie. The case is not, therefore, brought within the cases in which a promise has been upheld on the theory that it was made in settlement of a controversy over disputed claims. The authorities seem quite uniformly to show the inadequacy of the consideration alleged for the guaranty in question. In Geer v. Archer, 2 Barb. 420, the defendant visited the plaintiff to pay her an installment upon a mortgage given by him a few weeks before on a purchase of land. She complained that she had not received the fair value of her land upon such purchase. The defendant offered to give her his note for $200 to satisfy her complaints. She replied that she would be satisfied with that, whereupon the note in question was given. It was held that this note was void for want of consideration. So where land was sold and described in the deed as containing a certain quantity, and a deficiency was afterward discovered, it was held that there was no obligation on the grantor to compensate the grantee for such deficiency, and a promise to pay the same was without consideration. Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. 257; Ehle v. Judson, 24 Wend. 97.

Pollock states the rule as follows: That "neither the promise to do a thing, nor the actual doing of it, will be a good consideration if it is a thing which the party is bound to do by the general law, or by a subsisting contract with the other party." Pol. Cont. 161; Crosby v. Wood, 6 N. Y. 369; Deacon v. Gridley, 15 C. B. 295. "Nor is the performance of that which the party was under a previous valid, legal obligation to do a sufficient consideration for a new contract." 2 Pars. Cont. 437. * * * A promise to pay an attorney additional compensation to attend as a witness, after he has been duly subpœnaed, is without consideration. The attorney did nothing except what he was legally bound to do. Smithett v. Blythe, 1 Barn. & Adol. 514.[84]

It would doubtless be competent for parties to cancel an existing contract and make a new one to complete the same work at a different rate of compensation, but it seems that it would be essential to its validity that there should be a valid cancellation of the original contract. Such was the case of Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330.

It necessarily follows from these authorities that the plaintiff had no right to impose, as a condition to the performance of his contract, that the payment of said mortgage should be guaranteed. Although the defendant was not a party to the original contract and the consideration and contract between him, Gebhardt and Ritchie does not appear, yet we must assume that he acted at the request of Gebhardt and Ritchie, and was required only by such contract to execute such an assignment as Gebhardt and Ritchie had contracted to give. The answer, at all events, sets up that he received no consideration from any one for the guaranty sued upon.

The answer also alleges that the sole consideration received for this guaranty was the performance by the plaintiff of his contract with Gebhardt and Ritchie.

We think this answer sets forth a defense to the action, and inasmuch as the defendant has been erroneously deprived of the opportunity of proving it, if in his power to do so, that a new trial should be ordered.

The judgment therefore of the general term dismissing the complaint should be reversed, and its order reversing the judgment ordered against the defendant at circuit affirmed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur, except ANDREWS and DANFORTH, JJ., not voting.

Judgment accordingly.

McDEVITT v. STOKES.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1917. 174 Ky. 515, 192 S. W. 681, L. R. A. 1917D, 1100.)

Action by Mike McDevitt against W. E. D. Stokes. Defendant's demurrer to complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SETTLE, C. J.[85] In this action instituted by the appellant Mike McDevitt, in the court below he sought to recover of the appellee, W. E. D. Stokes, the sum of $800 alleged to be the balance due him of a $1,000 claim which appellee agreed to pay him in the event he won with a mare called "Grace," to be driven by him, the celebrated Kentucky Futurity race of the Kentucky Trotting Horse Breeders' Association at Lexington in October, 1910. In the opinion of the circuit court the facts alleged in the petition did not show a sufficient consideration to support the agreement on the part of appellee to pay the $1,000, for which reason the general demurrer filed by the latter to the petition was sustained. The appellant declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed, and from the judgment entered in conformity to these rulings he prosecutes this appeal.

The facts constituting appellant's cause of action, fully set forth in the petition, are substantially as follows: At the trotting meeting of the Kentucky Trotting Horse Breeders' Association, held at the city of Lexington in October, 1910, the mare Grace, owned by one Shaw, was entered in the Kentucky Futurity race to be driven by the appellant, McDevitt, a driver of great skill and experience, who was then in Shaw's employ. The Kentucky Futurity race is one of the most noted races among trotting horsemen in the United States, and the winning of it greatly increases the value of the winning horse and also the value of the sire, dam, and brothers and sisters of the winner. The purse offered in the race in question was $14,000, to be divided as follows: To the winner $10,000; to the second horse $2,000; to the third horse $1,000; to the fourth horse $500; to the owner of the dam of the winner $300; to the owner of the dam of the second horse $100; to the owner of the dam of the third horse $75; to the owner of the dam of the fourth horse $25. At the time this race occurred, and for some years prior thereto, the appellee, Stokes, controlled and managed a large stock farm near Lexington, together with a number of valuable race horses, bred and reared thereon, and had formed for operating the business a corporation known as the "Patchen Wilkes Stock Farm," of which he owns practically all the stock and is the president and manager. Among the horses then owned by this corporation was Peter the Great, the sire of the mare Grace, Orianna, her dam, Vladimir, a yearling, and Kilpatrick, a colt, her full-brothers. As appellee named the mare Orianna as the dam of Grace, entered to win the Kentucky Futurity race, he, or the corporation of which he is president, was entitled, in the event of the latter's winning it, to receive $300 out of the purse of $14,000, going to the winner. In addition, the value of each of the four horses, Peter the Great, Orianna, Vladimir and Kilpatrick, owned by the corporation of which he is president, would be greatly increased by Grace winning the race. It is alleged in the petition that, influenced by the foregoing considerations, appellee agreed to pay appellant the sum of $1,000 if he would drive and win the Kentucky Futurity with the mare Grace, to which the latter agreed; drove the mare and won the race; that by reason thereof appellee, or the corporation of which he is president, received, of the $14,000 purse won $300, as owner of Orianna, the dam of Grace, and the value of Peter the Great, the sire of Grace, was increased $10,000, that of Orianna, her dam, $5,000, and that of Vladimir and Kilpatrick, her brothers, $5,000 each.

It is insisted for appellant that the above-enumerated benefits received by appellee from the winning of the trotting race by the mare Grace, which resulted in large measure from his skill in driving her, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the promise and undertaking of appellee to pay him the $1,000. This contention ignores consideration of another element of the alleged contract between the parties which, in our minds, is conclusive of its invalidity, viz. that appellant, because of his employment by Shaw, the owner of the mare Grace, was already both morally and legally bound to perform the service required of him by the alleged contract he made with appellee; hence its performance, as legally required by his contract with Shaw, would inevitably have resulted in the benefits received by appellee, in the absence of the alleged contract made by the latter to pay therefor. To hold that appellant would not have won the race with Grace but for the agreement of appellee to pay him the $1,000 if he would do so would be to say that he would have been recreant to the obligation arising out his employment by Shaw, an inference not justified by anything appearing in the petition.

We find no fault with the argument of appellant's counsel that a consideration which is either of benefit to the promisor or detriment to the promisee will be regarded sufficient to uphold the contract between the parties; nor are we inclined to depart from any principle announced in the cases of Talbott v. Stemmons, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 33, Ryan v. Tribble, 60 S. W. 633, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1447, Moayon v. Moayon, 114 Ky. 864, 72 S. W. 33, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1641, 60 L. R. A. 415, 102 Am. St. Rep. 303, Van Winkle v. King, 145 Ky. 693, 141 S. W. 46, First State Bank, etc., v. Morton, 146 Ky. 293, 142 S. W. 694, and Shadwick v. Smith, 147 Ky. 160, 143 S. W. 1027, relied on in the brief of counsel. The contracts discussed and passed on in those cases rest upon no such facts as are presented by the contract in the instant case, nor do they, or any of them, conflict with the conclusions at which we have arrived.

It will be found from an examination of those cases that the benefit resulting to the promisor, constituting the consideration of the contract, was some legal right acquired of the promisee to which he would not otherwise have been entitled, or that the detriment resulting to the promisee, constituting the consideration of the contract, was the waiver or loss of some legal right in return for the promise he would otherwise have availed himself of. Our meaning will be better explained by the following excerpt from Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 274, in which the author, in discussing the meaning of the words "valuable consideration," says:

"The use of 'benefit' and 'detriment' in this connection needs explanation. While correct if properly understood, it is liable to misconstruction. 'Benefit' does not refer to any pecuniary gain arising out of the transaction, nor 'detriment' to any pecuniary loss. It is not possible to wait until the transaction is concluded and the books balanced to see whether the consideration existed originally. 'Benefit' as used in this rule means that the promisor has, in return for a promise, acquired some legal right to which he would not otherwise have been entitled; 'detriment' means that the promisee has, in return for the promise, forborne some legal right which he would otherwise have been entitled to exercise." * * *

In 9 Cyc. at page 347, it is said:

"A promise to do what the promisor is already bound to do cannot be a consideration, for if a person gets nothing in return for his promise but that to which he is already legally entitled, the consideration is unreal. This legal obligation may arise from (1) the law independent of contract, or it may arise from (2) a subsisting contract. * * * Where a party is under duty created or imposed by law to do what he does, or promises to do, his act or promise is clearly of no value and is not a sufficient consideration for a promise given in return."

Obviously the rule stated must also obtain where the promise is made by a third party to induce the promisee to carry out an existing contract which he has with another. Indeed, this was declared to be the law by this court as far back as 1822 in Ford v. Crenshaw, 1 Litt. 68, doubtless the first case involving the question decided in this jurisdiction. Instead of reciting the voluminous facts or commenting upon the opinion, we here give the conclusions reached by the court, which are correctly and with admirable clearness expressed in the first paragraph of the syllabus, as follows:

"Where a man has, by his own contract, become morally and legally bound to do an act, he cannot maintain an action on the promise of a third person, afterwards made, to pay him for doing it." * * *

It is apparent from the facts alleged in the petition and the application to them of the principle announced by the authorities, supra, that the petition fails to state a cause of action against appellee. The latter was, it is true, benefited by the winning of the Kentucky Futurity purse by the mare Grace, driven by appellant, but the benefit was purely incidental and one to which he was entitled regardless of appellant's undertaking with him to win the race or of his, appellee's, promise to pay him the $1,000 if he would do so. As appellant under his contract with his employer, Shaw, was in duty bound to do what he claims appellee agreed to pay him to perform, it is evident that he neither assumed any added responsibility nor sustained any loss by reason of his undertaking with appellee that he would cause the mare Grace to win the race; and no liability was legally imposed upon appellee by his promise to pay him for the service rendered.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to decide whether the contract was contrary to public policy; hence that question is not passed on. It follows from what has been said that the action of the circuit court in sustaining the demurrer was not error. Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.[86]

ABBOTT v. DOANE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1895. 163 Mass. 433, 40 N. E. 197, 34 L. R. A. 33, 47 Am. St. Rep. 465.)

Contract upon a promissory note for $500, dated December 27th, 1892, payable in three months after date to the order of the plaintiff, and signed by the defendant. The answer set up want of consideration. At the trial in the Superior Court, before Bond, J., the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions. The facts appear in the opinion.

ALLEN, J.[87] The plaintiff had given his accommodation note to a corporation, which had had it discounted at a bank, and left it unpaid at its maturity. The defendant, being a stockholder, director, and creditor of the corporation, wishing to have the note paid at once for his own advantage, entered into an agreement with the plaintiff whereby he was to give to the plaintiff his own note for the amount, and the plaintiff was to furnish money to enable the defendant to take up the note at the bank. This agreement was carried out, and the defendant now contends that his note to the plaintiff was without consideration, because the plaintiff was already bound in law to take up the note at the bank.

It is possible that, for one reason or another, both the bank and the plaintiff may have been willing to wait a while, but that the defendant's interests were imperilled by a delay, and indeed required that the note should be paid at once, and that the corporation, whose duty it was primarily to pay it, was without present means to do so. Since the defendant was sane, sui juris, was not imposed upon nor under duress, knew what he was about, and probably acted for his own advantage, it would certainly be unfortunate if the rules of law required

If under a contract one has an alternative or option and gives this up for a new promise, there is a sufficient consideration. Thomson v. Way, 172 Mass. 423, 52 N. E. 525 (1899).

[87] Part of the opinion is omitted.

us to hold his note invalid for want of a sufficient consideration, when he has had all the benefit that he expected to get from it.

In this Commonwealth it was long ago decided that, even between the original parties to a building contract, if after having done a part of the work the builder refused to proceed, but afterward, on being promised more pay by the owner, went on and finished the building, he might recover the whole sum so promised. * * *

But when one who is unwilling or hesitating to go on and perform a contract which proves a hard one for him is requested to do so by a third person who is interested in such performance, though having no legal way of compelling it, or of recovering damages for a breach, and who accordingly makes an independent promise to pay a sum of money for such performance, the reasons for holding him bound to such payment are stronger than where an additional sum is promised by the party to the original contract.

Take an illustration. A. enters into a contract with B. to do something. It may be to pay money, to render service, or to sell land or goods for a price. The contract may be not especially for the benefit of B., but rather for the benefit of others; as, e. g., to erect a monument, an archway, a memorial of some kind, or to paint a picture to be placed where it can be seen by the public. The consideration moving from B. may be executed or executory; it may be money, or anything else in law deemed valuable; it may be of slight value as compared with what A. has contracted to do. Now A. is legally bound only to B., and if he breaks his contract nobody but B. can recover damages, and those damages may be slight. They may even be already liquidated at a small sum by the terms of the contract itself. Though A. is legally bound, the motive to perform the contract may be slight. If after A. has refused to go on with his undertaking, or while he is hesitating whether to perform it or submit to such damages as B. may be entitled to recover, other persons interested in having the contract performed intervene. and enter into a new agreement with A., by which A. agrees to do that which he was already bound by his contract with B. to do, and they agree jointly or severally to pay him a certain sum of money, and give their note or notes therefor, and A. accordingly does what he had before agreed to do, but what perhaps he might not otherwise have done, no good reason is perceived why they should not be held to fulfill their promise. They have got what they bargained for, and A. has done what otherwise he might not have done, and what they could not have compelled him to do. * * *

Without dwelling further on the reasons for the doctrine, it seems to us better to hold, as a general rule, that if A. has refused or hesitated to perform an agreement with B., and is requested to do so by C., who will derive a benefit from such performance, and who promises to pay him a certain sum therefor, and A. thereupon undertakes to do it, the performance by A. of his agreement in consequence of such request and promise by C. is a good consideration to support C.'s promise.

DE CICCO v. SCHWEIZER et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1917. 221 N. Y. 431, 117 N. E. 807, L. R. A. 1918E, 1004, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 816.)

Action by Attilio De Cicco against Joseph Schweizer and others. From a judgment of the Appellate Division, First Department (166 App. Div. 919, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1106), modifying and affirming a judgment of the trial term in favor of plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

CARDOZO, J.[89] On January 16, 1902, "articles of agreement" were executed by the defendant Joseph Schweizer, his wife, Ernestine, and Count Oberto Gulinelli. The agreement is in Italian. We quote from a translation the part essential to the decision of this controversy:

"Whereas, Miss Blanche Josephine Schweizer, daughter of said Mr. Joseph Schweizer and of said Mrs. Ernestine Teresa Schweizer, is now affianced to and is to be married to the above said Count Oberto Giacomo Giovanni Francesco Maria Gulinelli: Now in consideration of all that is herein set forth the said Mr. Joseph Schweizer promises and expressly agrees by the present contract to pay annually to his said daughter Blanche, during his own life and to send her, during her lifetime, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, or the equivalent of said sum in francs, the first payment of said amount to be made on the 20th day of January, 1902."

Later articles provided that "for the same reason heretofore set forth," Mr. Schweizer will not change the provision made in his will for the benefit of his daughter and her issue, if any. The yearly payments in the event of his death are to be continued by his wife.

On January 20, 1902, the marriage occurred. On the same day, the defendant made the first payment to his daughter. He continued the payments annually till 1912. This action is brought to recover the installment of that year. The plaintiff holds an assignment executed by the daughter, in which her husband joined. The question is whether there is any consideration for the promised annuity. That marriage may be a sufficient consideration is not disputed. The argument for the defendant is, however, that Count Gulinelli was already affianced to Miss Schweizer, and that the marriage was merely the fulfillment of an existing legal duty. For this reason, it is insisted, consideration was lacking. The argument leads us to the discussion of a vexed problem of the law which has been debated by courts and writers with much subtlety of reasoning and little harmony of results. There is general acceptance of the proposition that where A. is under a contract with B., a promise made by one to the other to induce performance is void. The trouble comes when the promise to induce performance is made by C., a stranger. Distinctions are then drawn between bilateral and unilateral contracts; between a promise by C. in return for a new promise by A., and a promise by C. in return for performance by A. Some jurists hold that there is consideration in both classes of cases. Ames, Two Theories of Consideration, 12 Harv. L. Rev. 515; 13 Harv. L. Rev. 29, 35; Langdell, Mutual Promises as a Consideration, 14 Harv. L. Rev. 496; Leake, Contracts, p. 622. Others hold that there is consideration where the promise is made for a new promise, but not where it is made for performance. Beale, Notes on Consideration, 17 Harv. L. Rev. 71; 2 Street, Foundations of Legal Liability, pp. 114, 116; Pollock, Contracts (8th Ed.) 199; Pollock, Afterthoughts on Consideration, 17 Law Quarterly Review, 415; 7 Halsbury, Laws of England, Contracts, p. 385; Abbott v. The storm center about which this controversy has raged is the case of Shadwell v. Shadwell, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 159; 99 E. C. L. 158, which arose out of a situation similar in many features to the one before us. Nearly everything that has been written on the subject has been a commentary on that decision. There an uncle promised to pay his nephew after marriage an annuity of £150. At the time of the promise the nephew was already engaged. The case was heard before Erle, Ch. J., and Keating and Byles, JJ. The first two judges held the promise to be enforceable. Byles, J., dissented. His view was that the nephew, being already affianced, had incurred no detriment upon the faith of the promise, and hence that consideration was lacking. Neither of the two opinions in Shadwell v. Shadwell can rule the case at bar. There are elements of difference in the two cases which raise new problems. But the earlier case, with the literature which it has engendered, gives us a point of departure and a method of approach.

The courts of this state are committed to the view that a promise by A. to B. to induce him not to break his contract with C. is void. Arend v. Smith, 151 N. Y. 502, 45 N. E. 872; Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392; Seybolt v. N. Y., L. E. & W. R. R. Co., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; Robinson v. Jewett, 116 N. Y. 40, 22 N. E. 224. If that is the true nature of this promise, there was no consideration. We have never held, however, that a like infirmity attaches to a promise by A., not merely to B., but to B. and C. jointly, to induce them not to rescind or modify a contract which they are free to abandon. To determine whether that is in substance the promise before us, there is need of closer analysis.

The defendant's contract, if it be one, is not bilateral. It is unilateral. Miller v. McKenzie, 95 N. Y. 575, 47 Am. Rep. 85. The consideration exacted is not a promise, but an act. The count did not promise anything. In effect the defendant said to him: If you and my daughter marry, I will pay her an annuity for life. Until marriage occurred, the defendant was not bound. It would not have been enough that the count remained willing to marry. The plain import of the contract is that his bride also should be willing, and that marriage should follow. The promise was intended to affect the conduct, not of one only, but of both. This becomes the more evident when we recall that though the promise ran to the count, it was intended for the benefit of the daughter. Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49. When it came to her knowledge, she had the right to adopt and enforce it. Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 22 N. E. 756, 6 L. R. A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508; Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 52 N. E. 724, 44 L. R. A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268. In doing so, she made herself a party to the contract. Gifford v. Corrigan, supra. If the contract had been bilateral, her position might have been different. Since, however, it was unilateral, the consideration being performance (Miller v. McKenzie, supra), action on the faith of it put her in the same position as if she had been in form the promisee. That she learned of the promise before the marriage is a legitimate inference from the relation of the parties and from other attendant circumstances. The writing was signed by her parents; it was delivered to her intended husband; it was made four days before the marriage; it called for a payment on the day of the marriage; and on that day payment was made, and made to her. From all these circumstances, we may infer that at the time of the marriage the promise was known to the bride as well as the husband, and that both acted upon the faith of it.

The situation, therefore, is the same in substance as if the promise had run to husband and wife alike, and had been intended to induce performance by both. They were free by common consent to terminate their engagement or to postpone the marriage. If they forbore from exercising that right and assumed the responsibilities of marriage in reliance on the defendant's promise, he may not now retract it. The distinction between a promise by A. to B. to induce him not to break his contract with C., and a like promise to induce him not to join with C. in a voluntary rescission, is not a new one. It has been suggested in cases where the new promise ran to B. solely, and not to B. and C. jointly. Pollock, Contracts (8th Ed.) p. 199; Williston, 8 Harv.

L. Rev. 36. The criticism has been made that in such circumstances there ought to be some evidence that C. was ready to withdraw. Williston, supra, pp. 36, 37. Whether that is true of contracts to marry is not certain. Many elements foreign to the ordinary business contract enter into such engagements. It does not seem a far-fetched assumption in such cases that one will release where the other has repented. We shall assume, however, that the criticism is valid where the promise is intended as an inducement to only one of the two parties to the contract. It may then be sheer speculation to say that the other party could have been persuaded to rescind. But where the promise is held out as an inducement to both parties alike, there are new and different implications. One does not commonly apply pressure to coerce the will and action of those who are anxious to proceed. The attempt to sway their conduct by new inducements is an implied admission that both may waver; that one equally with the other must be strengthened and persuaded; and that rescission or at least delay is something to be averted, and something, therefore, within the range of not unreasonable expectation. If pressure, applied to both, and holding both to their course, is not the purpose of the promise, it is at least the natural tendency and the probable result.

The defendant knew that a man and a woman were assuming the responsibilities of wedlock in the belief that adequate provision had been made for the woman and for future offspring. He offered this inducement to both while they were free to retract or to delay. That they neither retracted nor delayed is certain. It is not to be expected that they should lay bare all the motives and promptings, some avowed and conscious, others perhaps half-conscious and inarticulate, which swayed their conduct. It is enough that the natural consequence of the defendant's promise was to induce them to put the thought of rescission or delay aside. From that moment, there was no longer a real alternative. There was no longer what philosophers call a "living" option. This in itself permits the inference of detriment. Smith v. Chadwick, 9 App. Cas. 187, 196; Smith v. Land & House Corp., 28 Ch. D. 7, 16; Voorhis v. Olmstead, 66 N. Y. 113, 118; Fottler v. Moseley, 179 Mass. 295, 60 N. E. 788. "If it is proved that the defendants with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement." Blackburn, L. J., in Smith v. Chadwick, supra. The same inference follows, not so inevitably, but still legitimately, where the statement is made to induce the preservation of a contract. It will not do to divert the minds of others from a given line of conduct, and then to urge that because of the diversion the opportunity has gone by to say how their minds would otherwise have acted. If the tendency of the promise is to induce them to persevere, reliance and detriment may be inferred from the mere fact of performance. The springs of conduct are subtle and varied. One who meddles with them must not insist upon too nice a measure of proof that the spring which he released was effective to the exclusion of all others.

One other line of argument must be considered. The suggestion is made that the defendant's promise was not made animo contrahendi. It was not designed, we are told, to sway the conduct of any one; it was merely the offer of a gift which found its motive in the engagement of the daughter to the count. Undoubtedly, the prospective marriage is not to be deemed a consideration for the promise "unless the parties have dealt with it on that footing." Holmes, Common Law, p. 292; Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 564, 579, 12 Sup. Ct. 84 (35 L. Ed. 860). "Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties." Philpot v. Gruninger, 14 Wall. 570, 577 (20 L. Ed. 743); Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Wickham, supra. But here the very formality of the agreement suggests a purpose to effect the legal relations of the signers. One does not commonly pledge one's self to generosity in the language of a covenant. That the parties believed there was a consideration is certain. The document recites the engagement and the coming marriage. It states that these are the "consideration" for the promise. The failure to marry would have made the promise ineffective. In these circumstances we cannot say that the promise was not intended to control the conduct of those whom it was designed to benefit. Certainly we cannot draw that inference as one of law. Both sides moved for the direction of a verdict, and the trial judge became by consent the trier of the facts. If conflicting inferences were possible, he chose those favorable to the plaintiff.

The conclusion to which we are thus led is reinforced by those considerations of public policy which cluster about contracts that touch the marriage relation. The law favors marriage settlements, and seeks to uphold them. It puts them for many purposes in a class by themselves. Phalen v. U. S. Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 178, 181, 78 N. E. 943, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 734, 9 Ann. Cas. 595. It has enforced them at times where consideration, if present at all, has been dependent upon doubtful inference. McNutt v. McNutt, 116 Ind. 545, 19 N. E. 115, 2 L. R. A. 372; Appleby v. Appleby, 100 Minn. 408, 111 N. W. 305, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 590, 117 Am. St. Rep. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 563. It strains, if need be, to the uttermost the interpretation of equivocal words and conduct in the effort to hold men to the honorable fulfillment of engagements designed to influence in their deepest relations the lives of others.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

BRIDGE v. CAGE.

(In the Common Pleas, 1605. Cro. Jac. 103.)

Action on the case in an assumpsit. Whereas an executor sued execution by an elegit, the defendant, ut amicus executoris, in consideration that the sheriff would execute the writ, and of sixpence given to him by the plaintiff, being under-sheriff of Cambridgeshire, promised to give the plaintiff sixty pounds; and alledges in fact, that he executed the writ; and thereupon brought the action.

After verdict for the plaintiff, it was moved, that it was not any consideration to maintain the action; for the sheriff by his duty and oath ought to execute the writ; and therefore to have a promise of consideration for executing it is not lawful; and it is quasi extortion, and therefore ill and unlawful. And although it was alledged that this sum promised him is no more than what the statute of 29 Eliz. c. 4. allows him to take for his fees, yet that will not help the case; for that statute only excuseth him for his taking fees, if it be no more than what the statute permits; whereas the common law did not permit him to take any thing for the executing writs.

WARBERTON said, although the statute tolerates it, that it is not punishable (as the usury of ten pounds per one hundred pounds is tolerated); yet it hath been oftentimes adjudged, that for such fees he hath not any remedy by an action.

GAWDY said, it is not reasonable, that for the executing of a writ by elegit (where peradventure the land is not worth forty shillings) he should have sixpence for every pound of the debt; and here the giving of sixpence is no sufficient consideration, being joined with the other which is unlawful.—Wherefore it was adjudged for the defendant.

GRAY v. MARTINO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1918. 91 N. J. Law, 462, 103 Atl. 24.)

Action by Stephen Gray against Theresa D. Martino. Judgment for plaintiff on trial without a jury, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

MINTURN, J. The plaintiff occupied the position of a special police officer in Atlantic City, and incidentally was identified with the work of the prosecutor of the pleas of the county. He possessed knowledge concerning the theft of certain diamonds and jewelry from the possession of the defendant, who had advertised a reward for the recovery of the property. In this situation he claims to have entered into a verbal contract with defendant whereby she agreed to pay him $500 if he could procure for her the names and addresses of the thieves. As a result of his mediation with the police authorities the diamonds and jewelry were recovered, and plaintiff brought this suit to recover the promised reward. The district court, sitting without a jury, awarded plaintiff a judgment for the amount of the reward, and hence this appeal.

Various points are discussed in the briefs, but to us the dominant and conspicuous inquiry in the case is, Was the plaintiff during the period of this transaction a public officer, charged with the enforcement of the law? The testimony makes it manifest that he was a special police officer to some extent identified with the work of the prosecutor's office, and that position upon well-settled grounds of public policy required him to assist at least, in the prosecution of offenders against the law.

The services he rendered in this instance must be presumed to have been rendered in pursuance of that public duty, and for its performance he was not entitled to receive a special quid pro quo.

The cases on the subject are collected in a footnote to Somerset Bank v. Edmund, 10 Ann. Cas. p. 726 (76 Ohio St. 396, 81 N. E. 641, 11 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1170), the headnote to which reads:

"Public policy and sound morals alike forbid that a public officer should demand or receive, for services performed by him in the discharge of official duty, any other or further remuneration or reward than that prescribed and allowed by law."

This rule of public policy has been relaxed only in those instances where the Legislature for sufficient public reason has seen fit by statute to extend the stimulus of a reward to the public without distinction, as in the case of United States v. Mathews, 173 U. S. 381, 19 Sup. Ct. 413, 43 L. Ed. 738, where the Attorney General, under an act for "the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States," made a public offer of reward sufficiently liberal and generic, to comprehend the services of a federal deputy marshal. Exceptions of that character upon familiar principles serve to emphasize the correctness of the rule, as one based upon sound public policy.

The judgment below for that reason must be reversed.[90]

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1908. 134 Wis. 431, 114 N. W. 820, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 491, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1025.)

Proceedings by Edward Ryan to establish a claim against the estate of Eliza Ryan, deceased, contested by Patrick Dockery, administrator. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, claimant appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant, Edward Ryan, filed a claim in the county court against the estate of his deceased wife, Eliza Ryan, for care, support, and nursing of said wife from the time of their marriage, August 4, 1900, up to the time of her death, February 28, 1905. The complaint as filed in county court was substantially upon quantum meruit, and the claim was allowed in that court at the sum of $1,000. The administrator appealed, and in the circuit court an amendment to the complaint was allowed, by which it was alleged that just prior to the marriage of the parties, and on the same day, the deceased agreed with the claimant that, in consideration of his services in caring for, supporting, and nursing her, she would leave him all her property upon her death, should he survive her; and that she failed to perform such promise, to the claimant's damage in the sum of $1,750. It appeared on the trial that Eliza Ryan was a widow with a small property and living alone at the time of the alleged promise, and was blind, and consequently in need of some one to care for her. The jury by special verdict found (1) that before the marriage a contract was made between the parties by which the claimant agreed to take care of, support, nurse, and see to the comfort of deceased during her life, and the deceased agreed to pay therefor by giving him what property she might leave at her death for his use during his life; (2) that said agreement was not made as part of their contract to marry or as a consideration for the marriage; (3) that the support, nursing, and care were not such as the parties contemplated should result from the marriage relation; and (4) that claimant fully performed the contract on his part. Upon motion the court held that the negative answer to the second question was wholly unsupported by the testimony, and that said question should be answered in the affirmative, but allowed the answer to the third question to stand. The court further held that as a part of the consideration was Ryan's promise to marry the deceased, which was void because not in writing, the entire contract was void; but that it would serve to rebut the presumption that the services rendered were to be gratuitous. Hence the court concluded that there might be a recovery for the reasonable value of the services, but, there being no proof as to what the services were worth, the claimant could recover only nominal damages and costs. Judgment in accordance with this conclusion was rendered, and the claimant appeals.

WINSLOW, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). We think that the court was entirely right in changing the answer to the second question of the verdict; but, as a verdict for the defendant should have been directed upon the undisputed evidence, neither this question nor the other detail errors claimed by the plaintiff are important.

One consideration alone disposes of the plaintiff's claim adversely to him. The law requires a husband to support, care for, and provide comforts for his wife in sickness, as well as in health. This requirement is grounded upon principles of public policy. The husband cannot shirk it, even by contract with his wife, because the public welfare requires that society be thus protected so far as possible from the burden of supporting those of its members who are not ordinarily expected to be wage earners, but may still be performing some of the most important duties pertaining to the social order. Husband and wife may contract with each other before marriage as to their mutual property rights, but they cannot vary the personal duties and obligations to each other which result from the marriage contract itself. Schouler, Domestic Relations (5th Ed.) § 171; 21 Cyc. 1242. It results from this that, when the plaintiff promised to care for, nurse, and support the deceased after marriage, he promised only to do that which the law required him to do in any event and neither the doing of what one is in law bound to do nor the promising so to do is any consideration for another's promise. I Page on Contracts, § 311; Post v. Campbell, 110 Wis. 378, 85 N. W. 1035. The alleged promise of the deceased was therefore nudum pactum. The plaintiff simply performed duties required of him by law as a husband which he could not avoid or contract away, and there can be no recovery either upon express contract, nor will the law imply a contract.

Judgment affirmed.[91]

HARTLEY v. INHABITANTS OF GRANVILLE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1913. 216 Mass. 38, 102 N. E. 942, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 392, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 725.)

Action by Harry S. Hartley against the Inhabitants of Granville. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

RUGG, C. J. This is an action to recover the amount of a reward which the selectmen of the defendant in 1909 offered "to any person furnishing evidence that will convict the person or persons who" had set recent fires in that town. The plaintiff was duly elected and qualified as a constable of the defendant town for that year. There was no evidence tending to show that any regular compensation was paid to the plaintiff as constable, or that he had any special arrangement with the defendant for pay, or that his duties were any other than such as by the common and statute law of the commonwealth are incumbent upon constables.

The general duties of such an officer are to be vigilant to preserve the peace, to prevent the commission of crime, and to arrest all offenders in his town who might be arrested without warrant, and to procure warrants in other instances of crime committed. The quaint description of his duties given in early definitions is "to keep the king's peace." To keep the peace in its broad sense means to quell riots and disturbances of every nature, to prevent the commission of crime and to see that offenders in their several districts are arrested and prosecuted. They possess somewhat extensive powers. See 1 Blackstone's Com. 356. But in our country communities constables as such are not expected nor required to devote a considerable portion of their time to the work of their office. In this regard they stand on a basis quite different from the members of an organized police force. It is matter of common knowledge that the country constable in this commonwealth is elected oftentimes from among those who labor regularly to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families, but whose character, courage or reputation for physical prowess are such as to make them efficient conservators of the public peace. The theory on which the office now is based (apart from the functions of serving papers) is that a number of competent men scattered through the territory of each of the country towns, charged with such duties, is an important factor in making them safe for residence by law-abiding people.

The office of constable is an ancient one, but its duties have been modified from time to time by custom and statute. The constable is a public officer. Any person elected to the office is liable to a forfeit of money if he refuses to serve. R. L. c. 25, § 97. He is not entitled to compensation for services rendered to the town in the performance of general duties as peace officer, at all events in the absence of special contract. Riopel v. Worcester, 213 Mass. 15, 99 N. E. 478. The theory of the law is that those chosen to such office by their fellow citizens will accept and execute the office either from a sense of public duty or under the compulsion arising from the pecuniary forfeit entailed by a refusal, and not from hope of money gain. Farnsworth v. Melrose, 122 Mass. 268. These considerations reinforce the conclusion that the obligation is not incumbent upon the constable to give up his ordinary occupation and spend substantial time in search for evidence which may or may not lead to the detection of criminals, nor perform the work commonly done by detectives. The general rule with reference to peace officers is well settled that a promise or reward for additional compensation to a public officer for services rendered in the performance of his duty cannot be enforced, either as being without consideration or contrary to public policy. Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219; Dunham v. Stockbrige, 133 Mass. 233; Davies v. Burns, 5 Allen, 349; Brophy v. Marble, 118 Mass. 548. This rule is based upon sound considerations and ought not to be narrowed in any respect. But it is also true that a contract to pay a public officer for services rendered outside and not inconsistent with his official duty is valid and may be enforced. A reward offered for such service is also enforceable. Studley v. Ballard, 169 Mass. 295, 296, 47 N. E. 1000, 61 Am. St. Rep. 286, and cases there cited. Neville v. Kelly, 12 C. B. N. S. 740; Russell v. Stewart, 44 Vt. 173; Kasling v. Morris, 71 Tex. 584, 9 S. W. 739, 10 Am. St. Rep. 797; Bronnenberg v. Coburn, 110 Ind. 169, 11 N. E. 29; Smith v. Vernon County, 188 Mo. 501, 87 S. W. 949, 70 L. R. A. 59, 107 Am. St. Rep. 324; Kinn v. First Nat. Bank, 118 Wis. 537, 546, 95 N. W. 969, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1012; Burkee v. Matson, 114 Minn. 233, 130 N. W. 1025, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.)

924.[92] The many cases cited and relied on by the defendant are not in conflict with this principle. Most of them follow either the authority or reasoning of Pool v. Boston, ubi supra, and relate to facts which bring them within its rule.

There was evidence in the case at bar that the plaintiff spent substantial time in the performance of purely detective work in the investigation and collection of evidence in consequence of the offer of reward outside the service rendered in serving the warrant and doing in other respects what the law required him to do by virtue of his office as constable. The case on its facts is rather close to the line, but it cannot be said that the finding of fact made by the judge was not warranted. This being so, no error was made in the ruling of law.

Exceptions overruled.[93]

TOLHURST et al. v. POWERS.

FINCH, J.[94] We agree with the prevailing opinion of the General Term that there was no consideration to support the promise of Powers to pay Ball's debt to the plaintiffs. The latter originally constructed a dynamo, for which Ball became indebted to them, and after all payments he remained so indebted when the machine was ready for delivery. The builders, of course, had a lien upon it for the unpaid balance, but waived and lost their lien by a delivery to Ball without payment. He, being then the owner and holding the title free from any incumbrance, sold the dynamo to Crane on a contract apparently contingent upon the successful working of the machine. It did not work successfully, and was sent back to plaintiffs to be altered with a view of correcting its imperfections. At this point occurred the first intervention of the defendant Powers. He had not then obtained, so far as the case shows, any interest in the machine, and the complete title was either in Crane or Ball or in both; but when the plaintiffs hesitated about entering upon the new work until their charges for it should be made secure, Powers agreed to pay them. The true character of that promise is immaterial, for when the work was done Powers did pay according to his contract. Thereafter Ball and Powers requiring a delivery of the dynamo, the plaintiffs undertook or threatened to retain the possession till the original debt should be paid. That they had no right to do. Their primary lien was lost by the delivery, and they acquired no new one by reason of the repairs which were paid for. Such refusal to surrender the possession was an absolute wrong without any color of right about it. After demand their refusal was a trespass, and according to their own evidence the sole consideration for the promise which they claim that Powers made to pay the old debt of Ball was their surrender of possession. To that they were already bound, and parted with nothing by the surrender. They gave up no right which they had against any one, but extorted the promise by a threat of what would have been, if executed, a wrongful conversion. Doing what they were already bound to do furnished no consideration for the promise.[95] * * *

SECTION 6.—PAST CONSIDERATION

(Must the Promise be the Inducing Cause of the Consideration?)

MOORE v. WILLIAMS.

(In the King's Bench, 1586. Moore, K. B. 220.)

Between Moore and Williams the case was that Williams, being the lessee for years the reversion belonging to Moore, was sued in ejectment [by a third person] and in defense of his title had spent a large sum of money, and therefore he came to Moore and told him that he had spent much money and asked contribution or other payment. Moore replied that in consideration of this he should have another certain lease after the expiration of his term, as he requested. The term expired and Williams asked for a new lease. Moore would not execute a new lease, and Williams brought an action on the case in assumpsit. It was held not maintainable because the consideration was executed before the promise was made.[96] * * *

HARFORD AND GARDINER'S CASE.

(In the King's Bench, 1588. 2 Leon. 30.)

In an action upon the case, the plaintiff declared, that the defendant in consideration that the father of the plaintiff had employed his service about the business of the testator of the defendant, to the great profit of the testator; and in consideration of love and affec-

If the plaintiff declares, that the defendant in consideration that he was indebted unto the plaintiff in divers sums of money, and promised to pay him £100 it is not good for the incertainty; also the consideration here, was past and executed before the promise made, and nothing is done by the son. And afterwards judgment was given against the plaintiff.[97]

BABINGTON v. LAMBERT.

(In the King's Bench, 1617. Moore, K. B. 854.)

In an action on the case on assumpsit in consideration that the defendant had received £24 from divers persons to the use of the plaintiff he promised to pay this to the plaintiff on a certain day. Verdict was for the plaintiff. It was moved in arrest of judgment that the declaration was not good because it did not state from what particular persons the money had been received. But the whole court was against this, because the consideration is executed, and so not traversable. Judgment for plaintiff.[98]

JANSON v. COLOMORE.

(In the King's Bench, 1617. 1 Rolle, 396.)

Janson brought an action on the case against Colomore and alleged that the defendant being indebted to him on an account was found to be in arrears a certain amount, and in consideration thereof promised to pay the said amount at a certain future day, and for breach of this promise action was brought. After verdict for the plaintiff it was moved in arrest of judgment that an action on the case does not lie, for the reason that the contract was prior to the promise sued upon and was executed, and this promise to pay at a future day cannot turn it into an executory contract.

HAUGHTON said that the action lies, because when the defendant was found to be in arrears he then and there promised, so that at the instant the arrears were determined the debt became definite and certain, and upon this the express assumpsit made at the same time is good. This was conceded to be correct by CROKE and DODDERIDGE and the latter said that Slade's case established the rule that every executory debt includes an assumpsit.[99] (The discussion of another point is omitted.)

SIDENHAM AND WORLINGTON'S CASE.

(In the Common Pleas, 1585. 2 Leon. 224.)[1]

In an action upon the case upon a promise, the plaintiff declared, that he at the request of the defendant, was surety and bail for J. S. who was arrested in the King's Bench, upon an action of £30 and that afterwards, for the default of J. S. he was constrained to pay the £30 after which, the defendant meeting with the plaintiff, promised him for the same consideration, that he would repay the £30 which he did not pay, upon which the plaintiff brought the action; the defendant pleaded, non assumpsit, upon which issue was joyned, which was found for the plaintiff. Walmsley, Serjeant, for the defendant, moved the Court, that this consideration will not maintain the action, because the consideration and promise did not concur and go together; for the consideration was long before executed, so as now it cannot be intended that the promise was for the same consideration, as if one giveth me a horse, and a month after, I promise him £10 for the said horse, he shall never have debt for the £10 nor assumpsit upon that promise; for there is neither contract, nor consideration, because the same is executed.

[99] In accord: Hodge v. Vavisor, 1 Rolle's Rep. 413 (1616); Howlet's Case, Latch, 150 (1626); Barton v. Shurley, 1 Rolle's Abr. 12, pl. 16 (1639). Cf. Hopkins v. Logan, 5 M. & W. 241 (1839).

The account stated is sufficient consideration without alleging out of what facts the account grew. Bard v. Bard, Cro. Jac. 602 (1620); Egles v. Vale, Cro. Jac. 69 (1603); Homes v. Savill, Cro. Car. 116 (1628).

In Slade's Case, 4 Coke, 92b. Yelv. 21, Moore, K. B. 433, 667 (1602), it was held after a tremendous struggle that where a legal debt existed the form of action known as assumpsit would lie, and that even if no promise had been made in terms the law would "imply" a promise. The effect of this decision, and probably its purpose also, was to deprive debtors of the ancient defense known as "wager of law," a defense available in the action of debt, but not in assumpsit, a defense that had come to be used dishonestly. If assumpsit would lie to collect a past debt in the absence of an express promise, a fortiori it would lie if such a promise is made.

"No case can be found in which a man's own debt has been ruled to be an insufficient consideration between him and his creditor, for a mortgage or other security received by the latter from his debtor." Turner v. McFee, 61 Ala. 468, 472 (1878): Paine v. Benton, 32 Wis. 491 (1873); Duncan v. Miller, 64 Iowa, 223, 20 N. W. 161 (1884): Williams v. Silliman, 74 Tex. 626, 12 S. W. 534 (1889).

Of course, the existing debt of A. is not a consideration for the promise of B. to pay it. Ward v. Barrows, 86 Me. 147, 29 Atl. 922 (1893). Nor is it a consideration for the promise of the debtor himself to pay part of it in advance of the due date. Young v. Ward, 33 Me. 359 (1851).

[1] Also reported in Godbolt, 31; Cro. Eliz. 42.

ANDERSON, This action will not lie; for it is but a bare agreement, & nudum pactum, because the contract was determined, and not in esse at the time of the promise; but he said, it is otherwise upon a consideration of marriage of one of his cosins; for marriage is always a present consideration. WINDHAM agreed with ANDERSON, and he put the case in 3 H. VII. If one selleth a horse unto another, and at another day he will warrant him to be sound of limb and member, it is a void warrant, for that such warranty ought to have been made or given at such time as the horse was sold.

PERIAM, Justice, conceived, that the action did well lie; and he said, that this case is not like unto the cases which have been put of the other side; for there is a great difference betwixt contracts and this case; for in contracts upon sale, the consideration, and the promise, and the sale, ought to meet together, for a contract is derived from con and trahere, which is a drawing together, so as in contracts every thing which is requisite, ought to concur and meet together, viz. the consideration of the one side and the sale or the promise on the other side; but to maintain an action upon an assumpsit, the same is not requisit, for it is sufficient, if there be a moving cause or consideration precedent; for which cause or consideration the promise was made; and such is the common practice at this day: for in an action upon the case, upon a promise, the declaration is laid, that the defendant, for, and in consideration of £20 to him paid, (postea scil.) that is to say, at a day after super se assumpsit, and that is good; and yet there the consideration is laid to be executed; and he said, that the case in Dyer, 10 Eliz. 272, would prove the case: for there the case was, that the apprentice of one Hunt, was arrested when his master Hunt was in the country, and one Baker, one of the neighbours of Hunt, to keep the said apprentice out of prison, became his bail, and paid the debt; afterwards Hunt the master, returning out of the country, thanked Baker for his neighbourly kindness to his apprentice, and promised him, that he would repay him the sum which he had paid for his servant and apprentice: and afterwards upon that promise, Baker brought an action upon the case against Hunt, and it was adjudged in that case, that the action would not lie, because the consideration was precedent to the promise, because it was executed and determined long before. But in that case, it was holden by all the justices, that if Hunt had requested Baker to have been surety or bail, and afterwards Hunt had made the promise for the same consideration, the same had been good, for that the consideration did precede, and was at the instance and request of the defendant.

RHODES, Justice, agreed with PERIAM; and he said, that if one serve me for a year, and hath nothing for his service, and afterwards, at the end of the year, I promise him £20 for his good and faithful service ended, he may have and maintain an action upon the case upon the same promise, for it is made upon a good consideration; but if a servant hath wages given him, and his master, ex abundanti, doth promise him £10 more after his service ended, he shall not maintain an action for that £10 upon the said promise; for there is not any new cause or consideration preceding the promise; which difference was agreed by all the justices, and afterwards, upon good and long advice, and consideration had of the principal case, judgment was given for the plaintiff, and they much relied upon the case of Hunt and Baker, 10 Eliz. Dyer, 272. See the case there.[2]

(In the Common Pleas, 1600. Cro. Eliz. 715.)

Assumpsit. Whereas he was seised in fee of the advowson of Beckingham in the county of Lincoln; in consideration that he, at the defendant's request, by his deed, dedisset et concessisset to the defendant the first and next avoidance of the said church, the defendant, 22 August, 37 Eliz. assumed to pay to the plaintiff £100, &c. Upon non assumpsit pleaded, it was found for the plaintiff, and damages assessed to £100. And, after verdict, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that this consideration is past, and therefore not sufficient to ground an assumpsit; for there is not any time of the grant alleged; and it might have been divers years before the assumpsit made: and being a thing executed and past, no assumpsit afterwards can be good: and in proof thereof, Dyer, 272. Hunt v. Bates was cited.—But all THE COURT resolved to the contrary; for the grant being made at his request, it is a sufficient consideration, although it were divers years before; especially being to the defendant himself, the consideration shall be taken to continue. But if the grant had been to a stranger, and not at the defendant's request, it had peradventure been otherwise. * * *

BOSDEN v. SIR JOHN THINNE.

(In the King's Bench, 1603. Yelv. 40.)

The plaintiff declar'd, quod cum ad specialem instantiam of the defendant, he had procur'd credit for one Flud for two pipes of wine amounting to £51 and Flud super credentiam & per medium of the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant emisset of one Roberts two pipes of wine for £51 and superinde the plaintiff with Flud enter'd into bond of £100 to Roberts for payment of the said £51 at a day to come, which was not paid at the day; And thereupon Roberts sued the plaintiff upon the bond, and recover'd, and had a capias against him, whereby he fuit coactus to pay Roberts £67 de solutione of which £67 causa præallegata he notified to the defendant, who in consideratione præmissorum promised to pay the plaintiff the £67 at Michaelmas; and shewed the failure of payment of the £67 at the day, &c. And upon non assumpsit pleaded, it was found against the defendant. And Yelverton moved in arrest of judgment, that the action, upon the matter shewn, does not lie, because the consideration was past, and executed before the promise, and the defendant had no profit by it, but all the benefit was to Flud a stranger; like the case 10 Eliz. Dy. 272, where J. S. was bail for the servant upon an arrest, and signified all to the master after the bail enter'd into, who promised to save him harmless; and although the bail was condemn'd yet no assumpsit lay against the master, because the consideration was past before the promise: and it seems that upon the first request only to give credit to Flud for two pipes of wine, no assumpsit lies; for a bare request does not imply any promise: as if I say to a merchant, I pray trust J. S. with £100 and he does so, this is of his own head, and he shall not charge me, unless I say, I will see you paid, or the like. And it seems likewise, that the promise shall not have relation to the first request of giving credit to Flud; because the entreaty for the credit was but for two pipes of wine amounting to £51 and the promise is for £67 and so they differ in the sums; as if I request J. S. to enter into bond for J. D. for £10 and I will see him paid; now if J. S. enters into bond of £20 for the payment of £10 for J. D. which £20 is recover'd against him, he shall not charge me on my promise but with £10. But non allocatur per FENNER, GAWDY and POPHAM; for altho' upon the first request only assumpsit does not lie, yet the promise coming after shall have reference to the first request; and although the request was but for two pipes of wine amounting to £51 that Flud might have credit for that; yet when Roberts, who sold the wine, would not take (as appears) security but by bond of £100 for payment of £51 and all this matter is signified afterwards to the defendant, who agrees to it, and promises to pay the £67 this shall charge him; because it has its essence and commencement from the first request made by the defendant. As (per GAWDY) if I request one to marry my cousin, who does so, and afterwards tells me of it, and thereupon I promise him £100 this is a good promise to charge me, altho' the marriage was past, which is the consideration; because now the promise shall have reference to the request, which was before the marriage. Vide this case, Dy. 272. b. The same law (by him) if I entreat one to be bail for my servant, and he thereupon becomes bail, and is condemn'd, and afterwards tells me of it, and I promise him to save him harmless, it is good, and he shall recover his damage in toto; wherefore judgment was given for the plaintiff. But YELVERTON, Justice, was contra clearly.

[2] Service rendered by the plaintiff at the request of a third person is no consideration for a subsequent promise by the defendant to pay therefor. Thorner v. Field, 1 Bulst. 120 (1612); Dearborn v. Bowman, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 155 (1841), service at request of Democratic committee in a campaign in which defendant was candidate; Royer v. Kelly, 174 Cal. 70, 161 Pac. 1148 (1916).

LAMPLEIGH v. BRAITHWAIT.

(In the Common Bench, 1616. Moore, K. B. 866.)[4]

In assumpsit it was alleged that Braithwait having killed a man requested the plaintiff to endeavour to obtain a pardon, by reason whereof the plaintiff went to Royston to the King to obtain the pardon, and in consideration that he had made this endeavour the defendant promised him £100. This declaration was demurred to because the consideration was executed before the promise was made. NICHOLS, WINCH, and HOBART held that the action was well brought, because there is alleged a request before the acts were performed, and where there is such a precedent request an assumpsit made after the execution of the consideration is binding. * * *

EASTWOOD v. KENYON.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1840. 11 Adol. & El. 438.)

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that one John Sutcliffe made his will, and appointed plaintiff executor thereof, and thereby bequeathed certain property in manner therein mentioned; that he afterwards died without altering his will, leaving one Sarah Sutcliffe, an infant, his daughter and only child and heiress at law surviving; that after making the will John Sutcliffe sold the property mentioned therein, and purchased a piece of land upon which he erected certain cottages, but the same were not completed at the time of his death; which piece of land and cottages were at the time of his death, mortgaged by him; that he died intestate in respect of the same, whereupon the equity of redemption descended to the said infant as heiress at law; that after the death of John Sutcliffe, plaintiff duly proved the will and administered to the estate of the deceased; that from

There were many cases in accord during this period, and a few contra. American cases in accord are Stuht v. Sweesy, 48 Neb. 767, 67 N. W. 748 (1896); Pool v. Gorrell, 105 Wis. 636, 81 N. W. 1009 (1900).

In Bradford v. Roulston, 8 Irish C. L. Rep. 468 (1858), the court said: "It is clearly established that, where a past consideration, that is, a thing previously done by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, is one from which the law implies a promise, an express promise different from, or in addition to, that which the law implies, is nudum pactum, on the ground that the whole consideration is exhausted by the promise which the law implies. [See, also, Trask v. Weeks, post; Hopkins v. Logan, 5 M. & W. 241 (1839).] * * * But it has also been held, in a long series of decided cases, that where there is a past consideration, consisting of a previous act done at the request of the defendant, it will support a subsequent promise; the promise being treated as coupled with the previous request."

and after the death of John Sutcliffe until the said Sarah Sutcliffe came of full age, plaintiff, executor as aforesaid, "acted as the guardian and agent" of the said infant, and in that capacity expended large sums of money in and about her maintenance and education, and in and about the completion, management, and necessary improvement of the said cottages and premises in which the said Sarah Sutcliffe was so interested, and in paying the interest of the mortgage money chargeable thereon and otherwise relative thereto, the said expenditure having been made in a prudent and useful manner, and having been beneficial to the interest of the said Sarah Sutcliffe to the full amount thereof; that the estate of John Sutcliffe deceased having been insufficient to allow plaintiff to make the said payments out of it, plaintiff was obliged to advance out of his own monies, and did advance, a large sum, to wit £140, for the purpose of the said expenditure; and, in order to reimburse himself, was obliged to borrow, and did borrow, the said sum of one A. Blackburn, and, as a security, made his promissory note for payment thereof to the said A. Blackburn or his order on demand with interest; which sum, so secured by the said promissory note, was at the time of the making thereof and still is wholly due and unpaid to the said A. Blackburn; that the said sum was expended by plaintiff in manner aforesaid for the benefit of the said Sarah Sutcliffe, who received all the benefit and advantage thereof, and such expenditure was useful and beneficial to her to the full amount thereof; that when the said Sarah Sutcliffe came of full age she had notice of the premises, and then assented to the loan so raised by plaintiff, and the security so given by him, and requested plaintiff to give up to one J. Stansfield as her agent, the controul and management of the said property, and then promised the plaintiff to pay and discharge the amount of the said note; and thereupon caused one year's interest upon the said sum of £140 to be paid to A. Blackburn. That thereupon plaintiff agreed to give up, and did then give up, the controul and management of the property to the said agent on behalf of the said Sarah Sutcliffe; that all the services of plaintiff were done and given by him for the said Sarah Sutcliffe, and for her benefit, gratuitously and without any fee, benefit, or award whatever; and the said services and expenditure were of great benefit to her, and her said property was increased in value by reason thereof to an amount far exceeding the said £140. That afterwards defendant intermarried with the said Sarah Sutcliffe, and had notice of the premises, and the accounts of plaintiff of and concerning the premises were then submitted to defendant, who then examined and assented to the same and upon such accounting there was found to be due to plaintiff a large sum of money, to wit, &c., for monies so expended and borrowed by him as aforesaid; and it also then appeared, that plaintiff was indebted to A. Blackburn in the amount of the said note. That defendant, in right of his wife, had and received all the benefit and advantage arising from the said services and expenditure. That thereupon in consideration of the premises defendant promised plaintiff that he would pay and discharge the amount of the said promissory note; but that, although a reasonable time for paying and discharging the said note had elapsed and A. Blackburn, the holder thereof, was always willing to accept payment from defendant, and defendant was requested by plaintiff to pay and discharge the amount thereof, defendant did not, nor would then, or at any other time pay or discharge the amount, &c., but wholly refused, &c.

Plea: non assumpsit.

On the trial before Patteson, J., at the York Spring Assizes, 1838, it was objected on the part of the defendant that the promise stated in the declaration, and proved, was a promise to pay the debt of another within the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II, c. 3, § 4, and ought to have been in writing; on the other hand it was contended that such defence, if available at all, was not admissible under the plea of non assumpsit. The learned Judge was of the latter opinion, and the plaintiff had a verdict, subject to a motion to enter a verdict for the defendant.

Cresswell, in the following term, obtained a rule nisi according to the leave reserved, and also for arresting judgment on the ground that the declaration shewed no consideration for the promise alleged. In Trinity vacation, 1839.

Alexander and W. H. Watson shewed cause.

[They argued on the basis of moral obligation because of the faithful management by the plaintiff and the pecuniary benefit to the defendant and his wife. Cresswell in reply, said that moral obligation is sufficient only in cases of infancy, bankruptcy, and the statute of limitations as stated in the note to Wennall v. Adney, 3 Bos. & P. 249. He admitted that the defendant might be bound if his wife had been so bound prior to their marriage.]

Lord DENMAN, C. J.[5] * * * The second point arose in arrest of judgment—namely, whether the declaration showed a sufficient consideration for the promise. It stated, in effect, that the plaintiff was executor under the will of the father of the defendant's wife, who had died intestate as to his real estate, leaving the defendant's wife, an infant, his only child; that the plaintiff had voluntarily expended his money for the improvement of the real estate, while the defendant's wife was sole and a minor; and that, to reimburse himself, he had borrowed money of Blackburn, to whom he had given his promissory note; that the defendant's wife, while sole, had received the benefit, and, after she came of age, assented and promised to pay the note, and did pay a year's interest; that after the marriage the plaintiff's accounts were shown to the defendant, who assented to them, and it appeared that there was due to the plaintiff a sum equal to the amount of the note to Blackburn; that the defendant in right of his wife had received all the benefit, and, in consideration of the premises, promised to pay and discharge the amount of the note to Blackburn.

Upon motion in arrest of judgment this promise must be taken to have been proved, and to have been an express promise, as indeed it must of necessity have been, for no such implied promise in law was ever heard of. It was then argued for the plaintiff that the declaration disclosed a sufficient moral consideration to support the promise.

Most of the older cases on this subject are collected in a learned note to the case of Wennall v. Adney [3 Bos. & P. 249], and the conclusion there arrived at seems to be correct in general, "that an express promise can only revive a precedent good consideration, which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law; but can give no original cause of action, if the obligation, on which it is founded, never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision." Instances are given of voidable contracts, as those of infants ratified by an express promise after age, and distinguished from void contracts, as of married women, not capable of ratification by them when widows; Loyd v. Lee [1 Stra. 94]; debts of bankrupts revived by subsequent promise after certificate, and similar cases. Since that time some cases have occurred upon this subject, which require to be more particularly examined. Barnes v. Hedley [2 Taunt. 184] decided that a promise to repay a sum of money, with legal interest, which sum had originally been lent on usurious terms, but, in taking the account of which, all usurious items had been by agreement struck out, was binding. Lee v. Muggeridge [5 Taunt. 36] upheld an assumpsit by a widow that her executors should pay a bond given by her while a feme covert to secure money then advanced to a third person at her request. On the latter occasion the language of Mansfield, C. J., and of the whole Court of Common Pleas, is very large, and hardly susceptible of any limitation. It is conformable to the expressions used by the judges of this Court in Cooper v. Martin [4 East, 76] where a stepfather was permitted to recover from the son of his wife, after he had attained his full age, upon a declaration for necessaries furnished to him while an infant, for which, after his full age, he promised to pay. It is remarkable that in none of these there was any allusion made to the learned note in 3 Bosanquet & Puller above referred to, and which has been very generally thought to contain a correct statement of the law. The case of Barnes v. Hedley is fully consistent with the doctrine in that note laid down. Cooper v. Martin also, when fully examined, will be found not to be inconsistent with it. This last case appears to have occupied the attention of the Court much more in respect of the supposed statutable liability of a stepfather, which was denied by the Court, and in respect of what a court of equity would hold as to a stepfather's liability, and rather to have assumed the point before us. It should, however, be observed that Lord Ellenborough in giving his judgment says: "The plaintiff having done an act beneficial for the defendant in his infancy, it is a good consideration for the defendant's promise after he came of age. In such a case the law will imply a request, and the fact of the promise has been found by the jury;" and undoubtedly the action would have lain against the defendant while an infant, inasmuch as it was for necessaries furnished at his request, in regard to which the law raises an implied promise. The case of Lee v. Muggeridge must, however, be allowed to be decidedly at variance with the doctrine in the note alluded to, and is a decision of great authority. It should, however, be observed that in that case there was an actual request of the defendant during coverture, though not one binding in law; but the ground of decision there taken was also equally applicable to Littlefield v. Shee [2 B. & Ad. 811], tried by Gaselee, J., at N. P., when that learned judge held, notwithstanding, that "the defendant having been a married woman when the goods were supplied, her husband was originally liable, and there was no consideration for the promises declared upon." After time taken for deliberation this Court refused even a rule to show cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside. Lee v. Muggeridge was cited on the motion, and was sought to be distinguished by Lord Tenterden, because there the circumstances raising the consideration were set out truly upon the record; but in Littlefield v. Shee the declaration stated the consideration to be that the plaintiff had supplied the defendant with goods at her request, which the plaintiff failed in proving, inasmuch as it appeared that the goods were in point of law supplied to the defendant's husband, and not to her. But Lord Tenterden added that the doctrine that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise is one which should be received with some limitation. This sentence, in truth, amounts to a dissent from the authority of Lee v. Muggeridge, where the doctrine is wholly unqualified.

The eminent counsel who argued for the plaintiff in Lee v. Muggeridge spoke of Lord Mansfield as having considered the rule of nudum pactum as too narrow, and maintained that all promises deliberately made ought to be held binding. I do not find this language ascribed to him by any reporter, and do not know whether we are to receive it as a traditional report, or as a deduction from what he does appear to have laid down. If the latter, the note to Wennall v. Adney shows the deduction to be erroneous. If the former, Lord Tenterden and this Court declared that they could not adopt it in Littlefield v. Shee. Indeed the doctrine would annihilate the necessity for any consideration at all, inasmuch as the mere fact of giving a promise creates a moral obligation to perform it.

The enforcement of such promises by law, however plausibly reconciled by the desire to effect all conscientious engagements, might be attended with mischievous consequences to society; one of which would be the frequent preference of voluntary undertakings to claims for just debts. Suits would thereby be multiplied, and voluntary undertakings would also be multiplied, to the prejudice of real creditors. The temptations of executors would be much increased by the prevalence of such a doctrine, and the faithful discharge of their duty be rendered more difficult.

Taking, then, the promise of the defendant, as stated on this record, to have been an express promise, we find that the consideration for it was past and executed long before, and yet it is not laid to have been at the request of the defendant, nor even of his wife while sole (though if it had, the case of Mitchinson v. Hewson [7 T. R. 348] shows that it would not have been sufficient), and the declaration really discloses nothing but a benefit voluntarily conferred by the plaintiff and received by the defendant, with an express promise by the defendant to pay money.

If the subsequent assent of the defendant could have amounted to a ratihabitio, the declaration should have stated the money to have been expended at his request, and the ratification should have been relied on as matter of evidence; but this was obviously impossible, because the defendant was in no way connected with the property or with the plaintiff, when the money was expended. If the ratification of the wife while sole were relied on, then a debt from her would have been shown, and the defendant could not have been charged in his own right without some further consideration, as of forbearance after marriage, or something of that sort; and then another point would have arisen upon the Statute of Frauds which did not arise as it was, but which might in that case have been available under the plea of non assumpsit.

In holding this declaration bad because it states no consideration but a past benefit not conferred at the request of the defendant, we conceive that we are justified by the old common law of England.

Lampleigh v. Brathwait [Hob. 105] is selected by Smith [1 Sm. L. C. 67] as the leading case on this subject, which was there fully discussed, though not necessary to the decision. Hobart, C. J., lays it down that "a mere voluntary courtesy will not have a consideration to uphold an assumpsit. But if that courtesy were moved by a suit or request of the party that gives the assumpsit, it will bind; for the promise, though it follows, yet it is not naked, but couples itself with the suit before, and the merits of the party procured by that suit; which is the difference;" a difference brought fully out by Hunt v. Bate [Dyer, 272a], there cited from Dyer, where a promise to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences of having bailed the defendant's servant, which the plaintiff had done without request of the defendant, was held to be made without consideration; but a promise to pay £20 to plaintiff, who had married defendant's cousin, but at defendant's special instance, was held binding.

The distinction is noted, and was acted upon, in Townsend v. Hunt [Cro. Car. 408], and indeed in numerous old books; while the principle of moral obligation does not make its appearance till the days of Lord Mansfield, and then under circumstances not inconsistent with this ancient doctrine when properly explained.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the rule must be made absolute to arrest the judgment.

Rule to enter verdict for defendant, discharged.

Rule to arrest judgment absolute.[6]

ALLEN v. BRYSON.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1885. 67 Iowa, 591, 25 N. W. 820, 56 Am. Rep. 358.)

Both parties are attorneys at law, and this action was brought to recover for professional services performed by the plaintiff for the defendant. Trial by jury. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

SEEVERS, J.[7] * * * 3. The defendant pleaded that he and the plaintiff were brothers-in-law, and, in substance, that each of them was engaged in the practice of the law, and had been in the habit of assisting each other as a matter of mutual accommodation, and that "all and each of the professional services for which plaintiff seeks to recover in this action were rendered by him as matters of mutual accommodation and interchange of courtesies, and without charge or expectation of payment or reward by one as against the other." The court instructed the jury: "If, however, such services were rendered by the plaintiff without expectation of reward, or intention on his part to charge therefor, or by any agreement or understanding that the services were to be gratuitous, the plaintiff cannot recover unless, after such services were rendered, and in consideration thereof, defendant agreed with or promised plaintiff to pay for the same. In the latter case the valuable character of the service, and the moral obligation to pay for the same, would be a sufficient consideration to support the promise, and enable the plaintiff to recover the reasonable value of such service." We understand this instruction to mean that where one person renders services for another gratuitously, and with no expectation of being paid therefor, that a moral obligation is incurred by the latter which will support a subsequent promise to pay. In our opinion, this is not the law. If the services are gratuitous, no obligation, either moral or legal, is incurred by the recipient. No one is bound to pay for that which is a gratuity. No moral obligation is assumed by a person who receives a gift. Suppose the plaintiff had given the defendant a horse, was he morally bound to pay what the horse was reasonably worth? We think not. In such case there never was any liability to pay and therefore a subsequent promise would be without any consideration to support it. That there are cases which hold that where a liability to pay at one time existed, which, because of the lapse of time, or for other reasons, cannot be enforced, the moral obligation is sufficient to support a subsequent promise, will be conceded. These cases are distinguishable, because the instructions contemplate a case where an obligation to pay never existed until the promise was made. We do not believe a case can be found where a moral obligation alone has been held to be a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise. To our minds, however, it is difficult to find a moral obligation to pay anything, in the case contemplated in the instructions, prior to the promise. The following cases support the view above expressed: Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 18 Am. Dec. 79; Williams v. Hathaway, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 387; Dawson v. Dawson, 12 Iowa, 515; McCarty v. Hampton Building Ass'n, 61 Iowa, 287, 16 N. W. 114. * * *

EDSON v. POPPE.

Action by George F. Edson against William Poppe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McCoy, J.[9] The plaintiff recovered judgment upon the verdict of a jury in the circuit court. The case was tried upon the following complaint: That the defendant at all the times hereinafter named was the owner of the following described premises situated in Turner county, S. D., to wit (describing the land); that at all the times herein named George Poppe was in possession of said premises as the tenant of defendant; that during the year 1904 this plaintiff, at the in-

In Moore v. Elmer, 180 Mass. 15, 61 N. E. 259 (1901), Holmes, J., said: "The modern authorities which speak of services rendered upon request as supporting a promise must be confined to cases where the request implies an undertaking to pay, and do not mean that what was done as a mere favor can be turned into a consideration at a later time by the fact that it was asked for."

stance and request of said George Poppe, drilled and dug upon said premises a well 250 feet deep, and obtained water in said well, and placed casing therein; that the reasonable value of the digging and casing of said well was and is the sum of $250; that said well was and is a valuable improvement upon the said premises, and greatly adds to the value thereof, and has been used by the occupants of said premises since the said digging thereof, with the knowledge and consent of defendant; that on or about the 5th day of August, 1905, the defendant, at the said premises, after having examined the said well, and in consideration of the said well to him, and of the improvement it made upon said premises, expressly ratified the acts of his said tenant in having said well drilled, and then and there promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the digging and casing of the said well as aforesaid; that defendant has since refused, and still refuses to pay plaintiff anything for said well. Wherefore, etc. To the said complaint defendant made the following answer: Denies generally and specifically each and every allegation in said complaint, except such as is hereinafter specifically admitted. Defendant admits that he is the owner of the said premises as stated in the complaint. At the opening of the trial, and upon the offer of testimony on the part of plaintiff, defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence, for the reason that the complaint did not state a cause of action, in that the consideration alleged in the contract is a past consideration, and no consideration for any promise, if any was made, and no consideration for the promise alleged. The objection was overruled, and defendant excepted. This ruling of the trial court is assigned and now urged as error, but we are of the opinion that the ruling of the learned trial court was correct.

It seems to be the general rule that past services are not a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay therefor, made at a subsequent time, and after such services have been fully rendered and completed; but in some courts a modified doctrine of moral obligation is adopted, and it is held that a moral obligation, founded on previous benefits received by the promisor at the hands of the promisee, will support a promise by him. 9 Cyc. 361; Doty v. Wilson, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 378; Oatfield v. Waring, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 188; Glenn v. Savage, 14 Or. 567, 13 Pac. 442. The authorities are not so clear as to the sufficiency of past services, rendered without previous request, to support an express promise; but, when proper distinctions are made, the cases as a whole seem to warrant the statement that such a promise is supported by a sufficient consideration if the services were beneficial, and were not intended to be gratuitous. Trimble v. Rudy, 53 L. R. A., note p. 373, and cases cited. In Drake v. Bell, 26 Misc. Rep. 237, 55 N. Y. Supp. 945, a mechanic, under contract to repair a vacant house, by mistake repaired the house next door, which belonged to the defendant. The repairing was a benefit to the latter, and he agreed to pay a certain amount therefor. It was held that the promise rested upon sufficient consideration. Gaynor, J., says: "The rule seems to be that a subsequent promise, founded on a former enforceable obligation, or on value previously had from the promisee, is binding." In Glenn v. Savage, 14 Or. 567, 13 Pac. 442, it was held that an act done for the benefit of another without his request is deemed a voluntary act of courtesy, for which no action can be sustained, unless after knowing of the service the person benefited thereby promises to pay for it. In Boothe v. Fitzpatrick, 36 Vt. 681, it is held that if the consideration, even without request, moves directly from the plaintiff to the defendant, and inures directly to the defendant's benefit, the promise is binding though made upon a past consideration. In this case the court held that a promise by defendant to pay for the past keeping of a bull, which had escaped from defendant's premises and been cared for by plaintiff, was valid, although there was no previous request, but that the subsequent promise obviated that objection; it being equivalent to a previous request. The allegation of the complaint here is that the digging and casing of the well in question inured directly to the defendant's benefit, and that, after he had seen and examined the same, he expressly promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value thereof. It also appears that said well was made under such circumstances as could not be deemed gratuitous on the part of plaintiff, or an act of voluntary courtesy to defendant. We are therefore of the opinion that, under the circumstances alleged, the subsequent promise of defendant to pay plaintiff the reasonable value for digging and casing said well was binding, and supported by sufficient consideration. We are also of the opinion that the instructions based on this complaint, and in particular as to the validity of the subsequent promise of defendant, properly submitted the issues to the jury. * * *

SHARP v. HOOPES.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1906. 74 N. J. Law, 191, 64 Atl. 989.)

Action by Lewis H. Hoopes against Joseph T. Sharp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

REED, J. Hoopes, the plaintiff below, sued to recover commission as a real estate agent for securing a tenant for a house belonging to Sharp. Mr. Hoopes met a lady who wished to rent a house. He seems to have known that Mr. Sharp had a house for rent. He went to the residence of a daughter of Mr. Sharp and there saw Mrs. Sharp, the wife of the defendant below, and got from her the amount of rental asked for the house. He then took the prospective tenant, Mrs. Johnson, to the house, then in the occupation of another tenant, and exhibited the same to Mrs. Johnson. Mr. Hoopes never saw or communicated with Mr. Sharp but afterwards Mrs. Johnson saw Sharp and rented the property directly from him. There had, therefore, been no employment of Hoopes by Sharp directly or indirectly in the transaction.

The trial court charged the jury that there was no evidence of any employment of Hoopes by Sharp, so that question was not passed upon by the jury. The court told the jury that the only point for their consideration was whether Mr. Sharp, after the renting, confirmed and ratified Hoopes' acts and agreed to pay him a commission therefor. The only testimony upon which a promise or ratification rested is that of the plaintiff. He says that after the renting he met Mr. Sharp, and "I told him I understood the house was rented by the party I introduced, and of course I expected a commission. He, Sharp, told me to see Mrs. Johnson, and if she would not pay, he supposed he would have to." Mr. Sharp admits the conversation, but says the language was that "If Mrs. Sharp put it in Hoopes' hands, he supposed he would have to pay it." The language of Mr. Sharp, if conceded to have been as Hoopes asserts, did not ratify any contract of employment, because no one had employed Hoopes, purporting to represent Sharp. The language, if it amounted to a promise to pay at all, which is not admitted, did not ratify any contract, but was a new promise to pay Hoopes for service previously rendered, without any request expressed or implied. Such a promise was devoid of any consideration to support it. In Lampleigh v. Brathwait, 1 S. L. C. marg. p. 264, it was resolved that a mere voluntary courtesy will not have a consideration to uphold an assumpsit. The same doctrine is asserted in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adol. & Ell. 438, also reported in 6 Eng. Rul. Cases, p. 23, and notes thereto. There must have been, at the time of the promise, some perfect or imperfect legal liability to support the promise. A mere moral liability will not furnish a consideration. Bartholomew v. Jackson, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 28, 11 Am. Dec. 237; Chamberlin v. Whitford, 102 Mass. 448; Freeman v. Robinson, 38 N. J. Law, 383, 20 Am. Rep. 399.

The judgment should be reversed.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1842. 3 Q. B. 234.)

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that, whereas heretofore, to wit, etc., in consideration that plaintiff, at the request of defendant, had bought of defendant a certain horse, at and for a certain price, etc., to wit, etc., defendant promised plaintiff that the said horse did not exceed five years old, and was sound, etc., and free from vice; nevertheless defendant did not perform or regard his said promise, but thereby deceived and defrauded plaintiff in this, to wit, that the said horse, at the time of the making of the said promise, was not free from vice, but, on the contrary thereof, was then very vicious, restive, ungovernable, and ferocious; whereby, etc.

Pleas: 1. Non assumpsit. Issue thereon.

2. That the horse, at the time of the supposed promise, was free from vice, and was not vicious, restive, ungovernable or ferocious, in manner, etc.; conclusion to the contrary. Issue thereon.

On the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Cornwall Spring Assizes, 1841, a verdict was found for the plaintiff on both the above issues. In Easter Term, 1841, Bompas obtained a rule nisi for arresting the judgment on the first count.

Lord Denman, C. J., in this term (May 30th) delivered the judgment of the Court.

This was an action of assumpsit for breach of warranty of the soundness of a horse. The first count of the declaration, upon which alone the question arises, stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, had bought of the defendant a horse for the sum of £30, the defendant promised that it was sound and free from vice. And it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that the precedent executed consideration was insufficient to support the subsequent promise. And we are of opinion that the objection must prevail.

It may be taken as a general rule, subject to exceptions not applicable to this case, that the promise must be co-extensive with the consideration. In the present case, the only promise that would result from the consideration, as stated, and be co-extensive with it, would be to deliver the horse upon request. The precedent sale, without a warranty, though at the request of the defendant, imposes no other duty or obligation upon him. It is clear therefore, that the consideration stated would not raise an implied promise by the defendant that the horse was sound or free from vice.

But the promise in the present case must be taken to be, as in fact it was, express; and the question is, whether that fact will warrant the extension of the promise beyond that which would be implied by law; and whether the consideration, though insufficient to raise an implied promise, will nevertheless support an express one. And we think that it will not.

The cases in which it has been held that, under certain circumstances, a consideration insufficient to raise an implied promise will nevertheless support an express one, will be found collected and reviewed in the note to Wennall v. Adney [3 Bos. & P. 249], and in the case of Eastwood v. Kenyon [11 A. & E. 438]. They are cases of voidable contracts subsequently ratified, of debts barred by operation of law, subsequently revived, and of equitable and moral obligations, which, but for some rule of law, would of themselves have been sufficient to raise an implied promise. All these cases are distinguishable from, and indeed inapplicable to, the present, which appears to us to fall within the general rule, that a consideration past and executed will support no other promise than such as would be implied by law.

The rule for arresting the judgment upon the first count must therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.[11]

EDMONDS' CASE.

(In the Common Pleas, 1587. 3 Leon. 164.)

In an action upon the case against Edmonds, the case was, that the defendant being within age, requested the plaintiff to be bounden for him to another, for the payment of £30 which he was to borrow for his own use; to which the plaintiff agreed, and was bounden, ut supra, afterwards, the plaintiff was sued for the said debt, and paid it; and afterwards, when the defendant came of full age, the plaintiff put him in mind of the matter aforesaid, and prayed him that he might not be damnified so to pay £30 it being the defendant's debt: whereupon the defendant promised to pay the debt again to the plaintiff: upon which promise, the action was brought. And it was holden by the Court, that although here was no present consideration upon which the assumpsit could arise; yet the Court was clear, that upon the whole matter the action did lie, and judgment was given for the plaintiff.[12]

WILLIAMS v. MOOR.

(In the Court of Exchequer, 1843. 11 Mees. & W. 256.)

Debt for work and materials, for goods sold and delivered, for interest, and for money due on an account stated.

Plea, infancy.

Replication, that the defendant, before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on the 10th day of December, 1837, attained his full age of twenty-one years, and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on the 27th September, 1839, in writing then signed by him, assented to and ratified and confirmed the said contract in the declaration mentioned, and then agreed to pay the plaintiff the said moneys therein mentioned.—Verification.

To this replication the defendant demurred on the following grounds, viz., that an action on an account stated did not lie against an infant; that the replication stated that the defendant was an infant at the time of stating the account, and that an infant, though he state an account cannot be sued upon it; that an infant could not ratify such a contract after he came of age or be liable in consequence of such subsequent ratification on an account stated by him when he was a minor; that the action should have been brought in assumpsit, and not debt: that an infant is not liable for interest.

Joinder in demurrer.

PARKE, B. This was an action of debt on the common counts for work and materials, and for goods sold and delivered, with a count on an account stated.

Plea, that at the time of making the alleged contracts, defendant was an infant. Replication, that, after defendant attained his age of twenty-one years, and before the commencement of the suit, he ratified and confirmed the said contract. To this replication there was a demurrer, on the ground that an account stated by an infant is absolutely void, and that no subsequent ratification of it, after the infant has attained his age of twenty-one years, will set it up, so as to enable the other party to the account to sue upon it. It is not necessary that we should decide what is the precise legal operation of the ratification by a party who has attained his age of twenty-one years, of a contract entered into during his minority; whether it is to be treated as an act giving validity to an otherwise invalid contract, or as a new contract voluntarily entered into after the party has obtained the capacity of contracting, the consideration being the moral duty arising from the previous transactions. The course of pleading in this case. following that which was adopted in Cohen v. Armstrong, 1 M. & slave or an infant, a new promise by the borrower after emancipation, was valid, and was not regarded as a donation, but as based upon causa. "Si quis servo pecuniam crediderit, deinde is liber factus eam expromiserit: non erit donatio, sed debiti solutio. Idem in pupillo, qui sine tutoris auctoritate debuerit, dicendum est, si postea tutore auctore promittat."

Selw. 724, Thornton v. Illingworth, 2 B. & Cr. 824, and Hartley v. Wharton, 9 Ad. & El. 934, (which last, like the present, was an action of debt,) would rather seem to indicate that the effect of ratification is to set up and give validity to the otherwise invalid contract—to remove the bar of infancy. On the other hand, that which is pointed out by the Court of King's Bench, in the above mentioned case of Cohen v. Armstrong, as the old form of pleading, would lead to the inference that in such a case as the present the liability of the defendant arises wholly on a new contract, made after he has attained his age of twenty-one years. [See what was said by Lord Mansfield, in Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. 290, and by Lord Holt in Heyling v. Hastings, 1 Ld. Raym. 389; and see Comberbach, 381.]

Whichever form of pleading is adopted, and whatever be the precise legal nature of ratification, it is clear that on a declaration for goods sold and delivered only, without any count on an account stated, the ratification by the defendant after he has attained his majority will entitle the plaintiff to recover.

But the argument on behalf of the defendant was, that the case is different in an action on an account stated; for that an account stated by an infant is not merely voidable, but actually void, so that no subsequent ratification can make it of any avail. But we can see no sound or sensible distinction in this respect between the liability of an infant on an account stated, and his liability for goods sold and delivered, or on any other contract.

The contract of an infant for goods sold and delivered (not being necessaries) is as completely void as his contract on an account stated, if by the word "void" is meant incapable of being enforced. The plea of infancy will be a bar to any demand on the one contract as well as on the other. But if by "void" is meant incapable of being ratified, then we can discover neither principle nor authority for the distinction relied on.

The principle on which the law allows a party who has attained his age of twenty-one years to give validity to contracts entered into during his infancy is, that he is supposed to have acquired the power of deciding for himself, whether the transaction in question is one of a meritorious character, by which in good conscience he ought to be bound; and there seems nothing in the liability on an account stated to take that out of this general principle. It was indeed argued for the defendant, that on an account stated an infant derives no benefit; that he does not, as on a purchase of goods, get any thing valuable; that he has no quid pro quo. But this is a fallacy; an infant stating an account gets precisely the same benefit as an adult gets on a similar transaction. He makes certain the previously uncertain state of transactions between himself and the person with whom he is stating accounts, and he gets rid of the necessity of preserving vouchers. This, in the case of an adult, is a sufficient consideration to create a debt; and we can discover no reason why it should not have the same effect in the case of an infant, supposing him to adopt and ratify it after he comes of age.

If an infant, having had dealings with an adult, meets and settles accounts with him during his infancy, in the ordinary way, and a balance is struck and vouchers destroyed, he does that which certainly creates no legal liability on his part. But if on attaining his age of twenty-one years, he is satisfied of the fairness of the settlement, there seems to us to be just the same reason why he should be permitted to confirm that settlement and render himself liable for the balance, as there is for enabling him to make himself liable on any other contract entered into during his infancy. The same principle applies as in the case of work and labour, or goods sold and delivered.

Neither do the cases cited by the defendant at all bear out his proposition. It is undoubtedly shown very clearly, by the early authorities, to which we were referred, that an infant cannot state on account so as to bind himself. But so neither can he render himself liable on any other contract not for necessaries.

The case of Trueman v. Hurst, 1 T. R. 40, was an action of assumpsit on an account stated—plea infancy—replication, that the promises were for necessaries. The replication was held bad on demurrer, and on very satisfactory grounds; for an account stated cannot possibly be itself described as coming under the head of necessaries: and the question, whether the items of which the account consists be made up of necessaries, is by the very statement of account itself excluded from the view of the Court, although that is in truth on such a replication the only question to be decided. The Court therefore most properly held that replication bad. Exactly the same observation applies to the case of Bartlett v. Emery, referred to by Mr. Justice Buller, and mentioned in the note to Trueman v. Hurst. But in neither of those cases was the point raised, whether an account stated was void against an infant in any sense which would render it impossible for him to set it up by ratification after he came of age. The authorities referred to, therefore, certainly do not bear out the proposition of the defendant; and we have already stated that we do not think it rests on any sound principle of law.

The general doctrine is, that a party may, after he attains his age of twenty-one years, ratify, and so make himself liable on contracts made during infancy. We think that, on principle unopposed by authority, this may be done on a contract arising on an account stated, as well as on any other contract. Judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

His Lordship afterwards added: "Whether this replication amounts in fact to a new assignment, or is improperly pleaded by way of replication, is not in question, as it is not pointed out as a ground of special demurrer." [18]

[18] In Edmunds v. Mister, 58 Miss. 765 (1881), the court said: "It is an anomaly in pleading that the plaintiff declares upon the original contract,

MERRIAM et al. v. WILKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1833. 6 N. H. 432, 25 Am. Dec. 472.)

Assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. The cause was tried in the common pleas, at September term, 1833, and a verdict taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of this court, on the following case.

The goods mentioned in the declaration were sold, and delivered to the defendants by the plaintiffs, but at the time of the sale Erastus Wilkins was an infant, under the age of twenty-one years. But to obviate the objection of his infancy the plaintiffs proved, that, after the commencement of this action, and after Erastus arrived at the age of twenty-one years, he declared that he would not take advantage of his infancy in the action.

RICHARDSON, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

We are of opinion that this action cannot be sustained against Erastus Wilkins. In Wright v. Steele, 2 N. H. 51, it was decided, that a promise made after the commencement of the action, and after the minor arrived at the age of twenty-one years, might be considered as a waiver of the defence of infancy so that the contract might be considered as valid from the beginning. But this view is sustained by no other authority, and cannot be reconciled with what must now be considered as settled principles of law on this subject.

It was supposed in that case that there was a close analogy between the case of a debt taken out of the statute of limitations by a new promise, and a contract of an infant ratified by a promise made after he comes of age; and that this analogy was close enough to sustain that decision. But there is, in truth, no analogy between the two cases. In the case of the statute of limitations the new promise does not create a new cause of action, but shields an old one from the operation of the statute.

But in the case of infancy there is no cause of action until the contract is ratified after the infant arrives at an age when the law allows him to bind himself by a contract. 2 B. & C. 824, Thornton v. Illingworth; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 202, Ford v. Phillips.

The contract of an infant to pay for goods, sold and delivered to him, is, unless the goods are necessaries, no foundation for an action. The delivery of the goods may be a moral consideration which will sustain a promise to pay for them, made after he comes of age. But such promise cannot relate back, upon any principle with which we are acquainted, so as to make the original contract a good foundation for an

and to a plea of infancy replies the new promise, while all the authorities declare that the recovery is not upon the original contract, but upon the new promise; and yet undoubtedly the anomaly exists."

action from the beginning. There is no legal cause of action until the contract is ratified.

In this case the plaintiffs may enter a nolle prosequi as to the infant, and take judgment on the verdict against the other defendant.[14]

EDGERLY v. SHAW.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1852. 25 N. H. 514, 57 Am. Dec. 349.)

Assumpsit upon a promissory note, made by the defendant while an infant, payable to John Barker, or order, and by him indorsed to the plaintiff, without recourse. The declaration follows the usual form of declaring upon indorsed notes.

The plaintiff called Barker to prove a new promise after the defendant became twenty-one years of age. * * * He testified that while he held and owned the note, he told the defendant, who is a joiner, that he was about having some work done, and he wished the defendant would come and pay him. The defendant answered that he was then engaged to others, but that at the end of six weeks he would come and work for him at a dollar a day, and thus pay him, or else he would pay him in money, but he never did any work for Barker. The defendant objected that this promise would not enable the plaintiff to maintain the suit, and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the exception.

Gilchrist, C. J.[15] The executory contract of an infant may be ratified or confirmed by an express promise, or by such acts as evince an intention to be bound by it. Hoit v. Underhill, 9 N. H. 436, 32 Am. Dec. 380; Aldrich v. Grimes, 10 N. H. 194. But a mere acknowledgment is not enough. Hale v. Gerrish, 8 N. H. 376; Millard v. Hewlett, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 301; Thompson v. Lay, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 48, 16 Am. Dec. 325. The case of a promissory note rests on the same ground as other executory contracts. It is not void, because it may be confirmed; but it is invalid, that is, without binding force, until it is confirmed. Merriam v. Wilkins, 6 N. H. 432, 25 Am. Dec. 472; Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, 26 Am. Dec. 746; Aldrich v. Grimes, supra; Reed v. Bachelder, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 559. The executory contracts of an infant are said to be voidable, but this word is used in a sense entirely different from that in which it is applied to the executed contracts of an infant. In the latter case, the contract is binding until it is avoided by some act indicating that the party refuses longer to be bound by it. In the former case, it is meant merely that the contract is capable of being confirmed or avoided, though it is invalid until it has been ratified.

In the present case, the proof relied on to show a ratification, is of an express promise. It is, therefore, unnecessary to refer to any of the other modes of ratification which are discussed in the books. An express promise to pay a debt or perform an agreement, contracted or entered into during minority, may be partial, qualified or conditional. And the effect of such promises as a ratification of a previous agreement, is by no means the same.

As to the absolute promise, no question can arise. The partial promise, or the promise to pay or perform a part of the original debt or agreement, is binding only to the extent of the new promise, and is not a ratification of the original debt, but a new and distinct promise, though founded upon the original consideration.

A new promise may be qualified in various ways. It may bind the promisor to pay the debt at a different time or place from those originally stipulated. It may be a promise to pay, not in money, but in specific articles, or in personal services. These cases cannot be distinguished, in principle, from that last stated. They are new contracts, not ratifications of the old ones.

When a contract which requires confirmation is confirmed, it takes effect from its date, or from the time of making it. But this cannot be the case as to an agreement which contains new stipulations, not comprised in the original agreement. Among the many advantages of an observance of the rules of pleading, is to be remarked the precision with which they indicate the exact point in controversy. And in whatever form the question may arise, we can see at once the material points involved, by supposing the questions to be raised by the pleadings. When infancy is pleaded to a declaration upon a contract, the replication, if the plaintiff would avail himself of a ratification or new promise, [should be] that the defendant, after the making of the said promises in the declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on, &c., attained his age of twenty-one years, and after he had so attained, &c., and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on, &c., assented to, and then and there ratified and confirmed the said promises in the declaration mentioned, &c. 2 Ch. Pl. 595; Story's Pl. 150. The rejoinder is, that the defendant did not, after he attained the age of twenty-one years, and before the commencement of the suit, assent to, ratify and confirm the said promises in the declaration mentioned, or either of them, in manner and form, &c. 2 Ch. Pl. 659; Story's Pl. 150. Upon these pleadings, it is apparent that the point to be tried and determined is merely whether the defendant confirmed the promises declared on. Evidence that he made any other or different agreement, would not support the replication, any more than it would support the original declaration. In such cases, it is clear that the new contract is valid, and it has never been denied that the original consideration is sufficient to support it; but being a new and different contract, it must be stated and declared on according to the facts and the evidence to sustain it.

Within the class of qualified promises in renewal of contracts entered into by an infant, are the cases of new promises, to be performed upon a condition or a contingency. They are distinguishable from other cases of qualified promises, by the nature of the qualification. So long as the contingency remains, or the condition is unperformed, they are qualified contracts, governed by the same rules as the class last referred to. They may be declared upon and an action maintained upon them, but the contract offered in evidence is not that originally made. It differs from it in substantial particulars. If the plaintiff declare upon the original cause of action, and allege a confirmation of the original contract, he will fail, because his proof will show a new and distinct contract, and not an affirmance of the old one. The evidence would, in fact, prove a refusal to ratify the original agreement. If the defendant promise to pay in goods, it will be equivalent to saying, "I will not pay you in money, but I will pay you in goods," thus proposing to substitute a new contract for the old one. If he should say, "I will pay you in three years," or "when I am able," he will, in substance, decline to pay when the plaintiff requests it.

If a new promise be made to pay or perform a contract made under age, upon a contingency or a condition, no action will lie until the happening of the contingency or the performance of the condition, for the old contract will not until that time have been confirmed, and the new agreement is distinct from it; and of that, in the case supposed, there will then have been no breach. When the contingency has happened, or the condition is fulfilled, the new contract becomes absolute, the original contract is ratified, and the plaintiff may declare upon it, or upon the new agreement. If he declare upon the original contract, and infancy be pleaded, he may reply a confirmation, and upon proper evidence he will be entitled to recover. Or he may declare upon the new promise, and set it forth with the necessary averments; and upon sufficient proof, will be entitled to recover in that case. * * *

In Thompson v. Lay (1826) 4 Pick. (Mass.) 48, 16 Am. Dec. 325, Parker, C. J., states the law thus: "A ratification may be absolute or conditional. If it be the latter, the terms of the condition must have happened or been complied with before an action can be sustained. I ratify and confirm my promise, provided I receive a certain legacy, or if I succeed to a certain estate, or if I recover a certain sum of money, or if I draw a prize in a certain lottery, would make a conditional promise or ratification sufficient to make the defendant liable on a contract made when a minor, when the events happen, but not before."

In the case before us, the defendant, on being asked by the plaintiff to pay, said that at the end of six weeks he would come and work for him, at a dollar a day, or else he would pay him the money. This was a qualified promise to pay, depending on a contingency. For the period of six weeks the defendant reserved to himself the right to pay in labor, at a dollar a day. During that time it was contingent whether his promise to pay the money would become binding, and until the expiration of that period, it was uncertain whether the original contract would be confirmed, or the alternative promise would be performed. Until the end of six weeks no action could be brought, either upon the old or the new contract; but after the six weeks had elapsed, after the right reserved by the defendant to pay in labor had ceased, the new promise to pay in money became absolute, and the old contract was absolutely confirmed, and the defendant was then liable to be sued upon either contract. It does not appear whether the action was brought before or after the expiration of the six weeks. We take it for granted, however, that it was brought after that time.

The effect of the new promise, after it became absolute, being to ratify and confirm the note, and to give it the same validity as if the promisor had been of legal capacity to make the note at the time of its date, it was from that time at least a good negotiable note, transferable according to its terms, and the action may well be brought in the name of the indorsee. Reed v. Bachelder, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 559. If an action had been brought upon the new promise, it must have been in the name of Barker, because that contract is not negotiable. * * *

Judgment on the verdict.[16]

LEE v. MUGGERIDGE et al.

(In the Common Pleas, 1813. 5 Taunt. 36.)

Assumpsit. The verdict for the plaintiff established the following facts: At the request of Mary Muggeridge, a married woman having a large separate estate, and in reliance upon her penal bond executed at that time undertaking to repay the money, the plaintiff had loaned £2,000 to one J. Hiller, Mary's son-in-law. The money was not repaid, and Mrs. Muggeridge, who meantime had become a widow and competent to contract, wrote to the plaintiff promising that the debt "would be settled by her executors." Mrs. Muggeridge died leaving an ample estate, and the defendants are her executors and residuary legatees. There was a motion in arrest of judgment on the ground that there was no consideration for the promise of the deceased. A rule nisi was obtained.

16 Other cases holding that action lies upon the note given by an infant are Reed v. Batchelder, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 559 (1840); Cheshire v. Barrett, 4 McCord (S. C.) 241, 17 Am. Dec. 735 (1827).

Action lies on the original promise of the infant, and, if infancy is pleaded, a replication alleging the new promise made after majority is sufficient to overcome the plea: Hunt v. Massey, 5 B. & Adol. 902 (1834); West v. Penny, 16 Ala. 186 (1849); Hodges v. Hunt, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 150 (1856). Contra: Bliss v. Perryman, 1 Scam. (Ill.) 484 (1838). See Kales' Cases on Persons, 132, and note.

MANSFIELD, C. J.[17] The counsel for the plaintiff need not trouble themselves to reply to these cases; it has been long established, that where a person is bound morally and conscientiously to pay a debt, though not legally bound, a subsequent promise to pay will give a right of action. The only question therefore is, whether upon this declaration there appears a good moral obligation. Now I cannot conceive that there can be a stronger moral obligation than is stated upon this record. Here is this debt of £2,000 created at the desire of the testatrix, lent in fact to her, though paid to Hiller. After her husband's death, she knowing that this bond had been given, that her son-in-law had received the money, and had not repaid it; knowing all this, she promises that her executors shall pay; if then it has been repeatedly decided that a moral consideration is a good consideration for a promise to pay this declaration is clearly good. This case is not distinguishable in principle from Barnes v. Hedley; there not only the securities were void, but the contract was void; but the money had been lent, and therefore when the parties had stripped the transaction of its usury, and reduced the debt to mere principal and interest, the promise made to pay that debt was binding. Lord Mansfield's judgment in the case of Doe on the demise of Carter v. Straphan is extremely applicable. Here in like manner the wife would have been grossly dishonest if she had scrupled to give a security for the money advanced at her request. As to the cases cited, of Lloyd v. Lee and Barber v. Fox, there was no forbearance, and those cases proceeded on the ground that no good cause of action was shown on the pleadings.

GIBBS, J. I agree in this case the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It cannot, I think, be disputed now that wherever there is a moral obligation to pay a debt, or perform a duty, a promise to perform that duty, or pay that debt, will be supported by the previous moral obligation. There cannot be a stronger case than this of moral obligation. The counsel for the defendant did not dare to grapple with this position, but endeavored to show that there was no case, in which a subsequent promise had been supported, where there had not been an antecedent legal obligation at some time or other; from whence he wished it to be inferred, that unless there had been the antecedent legal obligation, the mere moral obligation would not be a sufficient consideration to support the promise. But in Barnes v. Hedley, certainly Hedley never was for a moment legally bound to pay a farthing of that money for which he was sued; for it appears to have been advanced upon a previously existing usurious contract, and whatever was advanced upon such a contract certainly could not be recovered at any one moment. The borrower, availing himself of the law, so far as he honestly might, and no further, reducing it to mere principal and interest, does that which every honest man ought to do in like circumstances, promises to pay it, and that promise was held binding. As to the cases of Lloyd v. Lee and Barber v. Fox, they have sufficiently been answered by my Lord and my Brother Chambre, that if a man will state on his declaration a consideration which is no consideration, and shows no other consideration on his declaration, although another good consideration may exist, when that which he does show fails, he cannot succeed upon the proof of the other which he has not alleged. Now in the first of those cases there was clearly no forbearance, because forbearance must be a deferring to prosecute a legal right, but no legal right to recover previously existed. Whatever other consideration might exist for the promise, it was not stated in the declaration; it is therefore clear that this rule must be discharged upon the ground, that wherever there is an antecedent moral obligation, and a subsequent promise given to perform it, it is of sufficient validity for the plaintiff to be able to enforce it.

LITTLE v. BLUNT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1830. 9 Pick. 488.)

Assumpsit.[19] The writ was dated December 1, 1828.

The first, second and third counts were severally on three promissory notes, payable to one Somerby on demand, with interest, dated at Newburyport, one on August 29, 1807, another on September 12, 1807, and the third on April 26. 1810, and alleged to have been indorsed to the plaintiff each on the day of its date.

The decision was doubted and distinguished in Littlefield v. Shee, 2 B. & Adol. 811 (1831).

[19] The arguments of counsel and parts of the opinion are omitted.

The fourth, fifth and sixth counts were similar to the first three, except that the indorsements to the plaintiff are alleged to have been made on December 20, 1822.

The defendant pleads, 1, the general issue, which is joined; 2, non assumpsit infra sex annos.

To the second plea the plaintiff replies, as to the fourth, fifth and sixth counts, that on the 17th of April, 1822, the defendant, in a letter written by him at New York to Somerby, promised to pay Somerby the notes declared on; that Somerby, after the receipt of the letter, viz. on the 20th of December, 1822, indorsed the notes to the plaintiff; and that always afterward, to wit, from the 17th of April, 1822, to the date of the writ, the defendant has been absent from the commonwealth and has had no property within the commonwealth that could by the ordinary process be attached.

To this replication the defendant demurred generally.

St. 1786, c. 52, § 4, provides, that if any person, against whom there shall be any cause of suit, was, at the time the same accrued, without the limits of the commonwealth, and did not leave property therein that could by the common and ordinary process of law be attached, the person entitled to bring such suit shall be at liberty to commence the same within the periods before limited in the statute, after such person's return into this government.

WILDE, J., afterward drew up the opinion of the Court. Two questions are raised by these pleadings. The first is, whether the original cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; and if so, then, secondly, whether this action can be maintained on the new promise made in 1822. * * *

Then can this action be maintained on the new promise?

In the replication to the plea to the fourth, fifth and sixth counts, it is averred that this new promise was made on the 17th of April, 1822, that always afterwards, viz. from the 17th of April, 1822, to the date of the writ, the defendant had been absent from the commonwealth, and that he had no property within the state that could by ordinary process be attached. If the defendant had been living within this state at the time this new promise was made, an action no doubt would lie, at any time within six years after, and the statute would not operate as a bar. If the defendant in such a case had pleaded, that the cause of action did not accrue within six years before the commencement of the action, the plaintiff might reply that it did; and the new promise would support the affirmation of the issue. The reason is, that the new promise is regarded as a new cause of action upon which the statute operates in the same manner, and for the same period of time, as it did before on the original cause of action. Or it may be considered that the original cause of action is revived, and the statute again commences its operation; and this operation is limited by all the exceptions contained in the statute. Indeed the new promise is essentially a new cause of action. In the present case, before the promise in 1822 these demands had been long barred by the statute.

If the debt remained, the remedy was gone; and there was no subsisting cause of action. The new promise therefore was a new cause of action, for without it there was no cause of action. That alone gave the remedy. There was a sufficient consideration for this promise. A debt barred by the statute of limitations is a good consideration for an express promise. But it is not necessary to declare on the new promise. According to the established rules of pleading, the plaintiff had a right to declare on the original promise; and when the statute of limitations was pleaded, he might reply the new promise. When the pleadings assume this shape, the original promise is apparently the cause of action, but it is the new promise alone that gives it vitality; and that substantially is the cause of action. * * *

The defendant is clearly liable to an action on the new promise, and the statute could not be pleaded in bar. Or the plaintiff might amend by transferring the averments in the replication to the declaration, and setting forth the original cause of action as the consideration of the new promise. But there is no reason for turning the plaintiff round to a new action, or to require him to amend the declaration. The form of the pleadings cannot vary the construction or operation of the statute. We must regard substance rather than form, and substantially the new promise is the cause of action, whatever may be the form of the declaration.

Judgment for plaintiff on fourth, fifth, and sixth counts.[20]

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1919. 233 Mass. 591, 124 N. E. 426.)

BRALEY, J. The master finds that, the defendant having brought action against the plaintiff as maker on certain overdue promissory notes, the parties entered into negotiations for a settlement, and shortly before the return day the plaintiff executed "a note for fourteen hundred and twenty-two dollars," payment of which was secured by mortgage. It is further found that the note and mortgage were executed and duly delivered upon the consideration that the original note or notes were thereby paid and satisfied and the pending suit settled. While the master also states that when the action was begun [20] A new promise made to the assignee, after the assignment, is enforceable. Lamar v. Manro, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 50 (1838).

In Ilsley v. Jewett, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 439 (1841), the court held that the old debt and not the new promise was the real cause of action. This is to be explained on the ground that an intervening statute had enlarged the prison limits for debtors in case of new causes of action and the court thought it necessary to choose between the two operative facts, even though it is clear that both are necessary to an enforceable right.

six years had elapsed since the cause of action accrued and therefore the action had been barred under R. L. c. 202, § 2, it is plain that the mortgage note cannot be attacked for want of consideration as alleged in the bill. The remedy indeed had perished, but the debt not having been satisfied, the moral obligation to pay it afforded a sufficient consideration for the debtor's promise in writing signed by him with the unequivocal intention of liquidating the balance remaining on the old notes, as well as to avoid the expense and uncertainty of the litigation. Little v. Blunt, 9 Pick. 488; Chace v. Trafford, 116 Mass. 529, 17 Am. Rep. 171; Shepherd v. Thompson, 122 U. S. 231, 7 Sup. Ct. 1229, 30 L. Ed. 1156; R. L. c. 202, § 12; Custy v. Donlan, 159 Mass. 245, 247, 34 N. E. 360, 38 Am. St. Rep. 419. The compromise and settlement moreover furnished a sufficient consideration independently of the payment by the new note of the original indebtedness. Kennedy v. Welch, 196 Mass. 592, 596, 83 N. E. 11, and cases there collated. The note and mortgage being valid, the trial court properly refused to enjoin the foreclosure of the mortgage for breach of condition, or to order its cancellation for invalidity as prayed for, and the decree dismissing the bill should be affirmed with costs.

Ordered accordingly.

CARSHORE v. HUYCK.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1849. 6 Barb. 583.)

By the Court, HARRIS, J.[21] * * * The principal, and I think the only question in this case, is whether, after a justice's judgment has become barred by the statute of limitations, it will be so revived by a new promise of payment, as that an action of debt may be maintained upon it. Incidentally a question of pleading is involved, but the decision of the question I have stated must determine the rights of the parties in this action. The plaintiffs maintain the affirmative of this proposition. Unless they can sustain it, their action must fail. The defendant contends, that a promise to pay a judgment, cannot entitle the plaintiff in that judgment to maintain an action upon it, as a subsisting cause of action; that a judgment once barred by the statute of limitations can not have its vitality restored by a mere promise to pay.

The question is not without its difficulty; and neither party is without eminent authority to sustain his position. It seems, however, to be settled against the defendant, in this state. Upon a full examination of the cases in which the subject has been discussed I am satisfied that, at least in this state, the doctrine is too firmly established to be again unsettled, that where the operation of the statute of limitations is avoided by a new promise, the old demand, and not the new promise, is to be the foundation of the action. I confess that were I at liberty to reason upon the question, the inclination of my mind would be to the other side of this question. The doctrine rests for its support upon a distinction between the cause of action itself, and the remedy. The distinction is too thin and subtle to be received with satisfaction. An existing, continuing cause of action, without any remedy to enforce it, is, to my mind, a mere abstraction. To say that a man has a cause of action left, after he has lost, by the operation of the statute, his remedy upon it, seems to me little less absurd, than to say I still have my property after I have actually lost it. If a debtor obtain a discharge under an insolvent act, a subsequent promise to pay the debt discharged, is regarded as a new contract, supported, it is true, by the pre-existing moral obligation, as a consideration for the new promise, but to be enforced as a new contract, and, like every other contract, according to its own terms. The reasonableness of this doctrine is much more manifest, at least to my mind, than that which has been established in this state in respect to the revival of debts barred by the statute of limitations. The best defense of the latter doctrine, with which I have met, is contained in the opinion of Mr. Justice Marcy, in Dean v. Hewit, 5 Wend. 257. His argument is, that the new promise rebuts the presumption of payment upon which the statute of limitations proceeds, and has the same effect, in keeping alive the remedy, whether made before or after the statute attaches. I am unable to perceive the conclusiveness of this reasoning. In the one case, the new promise, made before the statute has barred the debt, arrests its course, and a new starting point is made, from which it again commences to run. It cannot be said, in that case, that the new promise revives the debt; for it never was extinct. But when the statute has once attached, the debt is in fact, however it may be in theory, extinct. It has lost all its vitality. If, afterwards, it has any "legal use or validity," it is through the reanimating principle of the new promise. And it is only useful for this purpose, as furnishing, by virtue of its continuing moral obligation, a sufficient consideration for the promise. But it would not be profitable further to examine the foundations of this doctrine. It is enough, for the present occasion, that the question is entirely settled by adjudged cases in our own courts. I cheerfully yield to their authority, and even where I cannot clearly see the reason upon which they are founded, I can say with Lord Kenyon, "it is my wish and comfort to stand super antiquas vias." See Sands v. Gelston, 15 Johns. 511; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351, 7 L. Ed. 174; Depuy v. Swart, 3 Wend. 135, 20 Am. Dec. 673; Soulden v. Van Rensselaer, 9 Wend. 293.

The doctrine is perhaps as clearly stated in Dean v. Hewit as any where else. "A demand," says Justice Marcy, "the remedy for the recovery of which is continued or revived by a new promise, is precisely the same, after the remedy has been continued or revived, as it was before the statute had or could have attached." In that case, the action was upon a negotiable note. The new promise relied upon to relieve it from the operation of the statute of limitations, was made to the payee. It was held, that the negotiability of the note was co-existent with the demand, and that the remedy upon the note having been revived, while the note remained in the hands of the payee, an indorsee, to whom it had been subsequently transferred, might maintain his action upon it.[22] The same was held in Pinkerton v. Bailey, 8 Wend. 600; also in Soulden v. Van Rensselaer, above cited. If, then, the new promise so completely restores life, and gives effect to the original demand, as in the case of a negotiable instrument, to enable a subsequent holder, to maintain an action upon it, I think it must follow, that in case of a justice's judgment barred by the same statute, a new promise will enable the plaintiff in the judgment to maintain an action upon it, with the same effect as before the statute had attached. It is true, that all the cases in which the question has been presented were actions upon contract. It is only since the adoption of the revised statutes, that justices' judgments have been subject to the operation of the statute of limitations. Pease v. Howard, 14 Johns. 479. But if a new promise can have the effect of sustaining an action upon a negotiable security in the hands of an indorsee, to whom it has been transferred after the promise, much more should it have the effect to enable the plaintiff in a justice's judgment to whom the promise was made, to maintain an action of debt upon it. * * *

Upon the whole case, therefore, the plaintiffs are, in my opinion, entitled to judgment.

An action for a tort, barred by statute of limitations, is not revived by an acknowledgment or a new promise. Hegedus v. Thomas Iron Co. (N. J. Sup.)

TRASK v. WEEKS et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1889. 81 Me. 325, 17 Atl. 162.)

Assumpsit on account by Abiel Trask against William Weeks and Stinson Weeks. Reported to stand for trial if, in the opinion of the law court, it could be maintained.

DANFORTH, J.[24] It is conceded that this action cannot be maintained against the defendant William Weeks. The result as to the other defendant must depend upon the construction of the following written contract, viz.: "Whereas, Abiel Trask, of Jefferson, has unsettled accounts against William Weeks and myself which it is not convenient to settle at this time, now I hereby agree to waive any and all objection to said accounts which might be brought against them on account of the statute of limitations, and hereby renew the promise to pay whatever balance shall be against us." This contract was dated March 20, 1868, signed by the defendant Stinson Weeks, and presumably delivered to the plaintiff at its date; and now, after the lapse of 20 years, this action is brought upon an account which is assumed to be that referred to in the agreement. To this action the defendant proposes to plead the statute of limitations. Is it competent for him to do so?

The plaintiff answers this question in the negative, claiming that the contract is equivalent to a covenant not to set up the statute in the future as a defense to the debt, and is therefore technically an estoppel, or operates as an estoppel, to avoid circuity of action, and relies upon Warren v. Walker, 23 Me. 453. It is clear that the contract cannot operate as an estoppel, for having been entered into after the statute of limitations had taken effect, there is no evidence in the case that the plaintiff, in consequence of it, has been induced to change his position, so as to lose any legal rights by delay or otherwise. There appear also insurmountable obstacles to its operation as a covenant. To give it this or any effect, it must necessarily have a sufficient consideration to support it. Such a contract, as seen in Warren v. Walker, is entirely independent of that mentioned in the statute as an acknowledgment of or a new promise to pay the debt, and must therefore have an independent consideration. In Warren v. Walker this was evidently considered an indispensable requisite, and much stress was laid upon the fact that a sufficient consideration there appeared.

110 Atl. 822 (1920). But if the tort was such that an action of indebitatus assumpsit could have been maintained against the wrong-doer, the debt created by the tort, even though barred, is a sufficient consideration for a new promise to pay it. See Ott v. Whitworth, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 494 (1847), a new promise is not implied in a mere confession of the tort; Oothout v. Thompson, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 277 (1822); Nelson v. Petterson, 229 Ill. 240, 82 N. E. 229, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 912, 11 Ann. Cas. 178 (1907); Belcher v. Tacoma Eastern R. Co., 99 Wash. 34, 168 Pac. 782 (1917).

In this case, though there appears abundant consideration for the contract construed as a new promise, none appears for such as the plaintiff claims it to be. As such it is immaterial that there is a subsisting debt, for, while the debt is the subject-matter of the contract, its state or condition is not changed; its obligation has neither increased nor diminished. Its value might be greater in consequence of a valid contract of that kind, but a benefit to the plaintiff is no reason for an increased obligation to the defendant, and, the statute of limitations having already applied, the delay takes no legal right from the plaintiff. True, as a supplementary report, there is in the case an agreement from the plaintiff to the defendant which we may assume is a part of the same transaction, but it is not of the same tenor as the defendant's. It promises nothing. It simply agrees to waive the statute, and "allow whatever may be found justly due them on settlement." This can only be construed to allow the amount on the plaintiff's account, and, as the defendant had already provided for this by his promise to pay the balance only, the agreement could be of no value to him, or injury to the plaintiff. It can therefore hardly be considered a valid consideration for the defendant's contract, as claimed by the plaintiff.

The proper construction of the agreement shows clearly that it is not in effect what the plaintiff claims, but that it was intended rather as the new promise contemplated by the statute to take the account out of its provisions than an independent covenant not to set it up in defense. The plaintiff contends that it is both; that it contains two elements,—a waiver of the statute, and a new promise to pay the balance due. There may be two elements, but they constitute one contract only. They are so combined that they cannot be separated, and must be construed as one whole. It is not to be expected, even if it were possible, that the parties would thus put in one, two contracts so entirely different in their nature and effect, when either would have answered the purpose in view. That the parties at the time the contract was made had in view the then condition of the account is evident from its terms. It refers in the preamble to the inconvenience of a settlement "at this time," agrees to waive, not the statute, "but all objections which," not may, but "might, be brought against them on account of the statute," and then, evidently to accomplish this purpose, adds, "and hereby renew the promise to pay whatever balance shall be against us," thus making the last clause a qualification of what went before. The waiving and the promise must stand or fall together; the former being in force only as long as the latter, and hence the contract as a whole subject to the statute of limitations. * * *

BARKER v. HEATH.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1907. 74 N. H. 270, 67 Atl. 222.)

Action by Levi Barker against Kate P. Heath on a note for $734.52, dated April 1, 1895, and payable to plaintiff on demand with interest. Suit was brought November 2, 1905, and defendant pleaded limitations, to which plaintiff replied, alleging new promise within six years. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and the case was transferred to the Supreme Court. Exceptions sustained.

The following indorsements are upon the back of the note: April 10, 1895, $5; September 19, 1895, $5; October 16, 1895, $5; December 16, 1895, $5; September 19, 1896, $3; August 25, 1898, $2; December 26, 1899, $2. The plaintiff testified as follows: He received the foregoing sums from the defendant at the dates mentioned, and made the indorsements in her presence. At the time of the last payment the defendant said, in substance, that it was all she could give him at that time; that she would give him more as soon as she could, and would pay him just as fast as she could; that she was having a hard time, her boarders had left her, her eyes were troubling her, and she had to go to an oculist; that it was taking her money, but she would pay him as fast as she could. At the dates of the indorsements she always promised to pay as fast as she could and as soon as she was able, and wanted him to be easy with her. In a conversation subsequent to December 26, 1899, she said she had no money for him then, but would give him some just as soon as she could. The defendant's evidence tended to prove that she did not make either of the last two payments indorsed on the note; that she did not promise the plaintiff at any time that she would pay the balance of the note, because she knew it was impossible for her to do so; and that she did not promise him on December 26, 1899, or at any subsequent date, that she would pay the note as soon as she was able, or as soon as she could, or promise anything to that effect. * * *

The court, after instructing the jury that their verdict must be for the defendant unless she, by her acts or promises, gave the plaintiff to understand within six years that she recognized the existence of the note and intended to pay it, further instructed them that the promise must be absolute, or, if conditional, that the condition must have been fulfilled; and that a promise by the defendant to pay as soon as she could, or when she was able, would be regarded by the law of this state as an absolute promise. Continuing, the court said: "So if you find that within six years she said, 'I will pay it as soon as I can,' or 'as soon as I am able,' then you will regard it as having been an absolute and unqualified promise on her part." To this portion of the charge the defendant excepted.

that, while a simple acknowledgment of a debt would not prevent the statute of limitations from operating upon it, such acknowledgment was evidence from which, if there was nothing to rebut it, a jury might find a new promise. A partial payment of a promissory note by the maker, under circumstances which show that he understood it was partial only, and which do not indicate an unwillingness on his part to pay the balance, is evidence from which, if there is nothing to control it, a jury should find a new promise. Indorsements upon a note will not be received as evidence of such payments unless shown to be in the handwriting of the maker, or there is other evidence of their genuineness and truthfulness. Brown, 69 N. H. 183, 45 Atl. 402.

According to the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a payment of $2 upon the promissory note in suit within six years of the time when the action was brought, and said, in substance, at the time of making the payment, that it was all she could then pay, that she would pay more as soon as she could, would pay just as fast as she could on the note. This testimony, if credited by the jury, would justify them in finding that the defendant understood she was making a partial payment upon a promissory note which she regarded as a subsisting debt that she was liable to pay, and was willing to pay as fast as she could or was able. Her statements relating to losing her boarders, and to the extraordinary expenses to which she was subjected by reason of the trouble in her eyes, tend to prove that her willingness to pay was conditional and depended upon her future pecuniary ability. In effect, she promised that she would make payments on the note as fast as her pecuniary ability would enable her to do so. The later statement in evidence was to the same effect. In Butterfield v. Jacobs, 15 N. H. 140, 141, the court said: "Where a person, on being applied to for payment of a debt, declares his inability to pay it, but promises to pay it when he shall become able, the happening of the contingency is in its nature susceptible of being proved. His pecuniary ability is a matter of fact no more indefinite nor uncertain than most facts ordinarily in controversy. Such a promise is clearly conditional, dependent on the happening of a future event. Evidence of the promise and of the pecuniary ability has therefore been held sufficient to take a case out of the operation of the statute." * * * It is quite clear that if the plaintiff's testimony in the present case is believed, the defendant's willingness to pay the balance of the note depended upon her pecuniary ability to pay it. Recent cases fully justify this view. Stowell v. Fowler, 59 N. H. 585; Rossiter v. Colby, 71 N. H. 386, 52 Atl. 927. See, also, Atwood v. Coburn, 4 N. H. 315, 318; Betton v. Cutts, 11 N. H. 170; Manning v. Wheeler, 13 N. H. 486. The defendant's exception to the charge of the court must therefore be sustained. * * * [27]

EARLY v. MAHON.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1821. 19 Johns. 147, 10 Am. Dec. 204.)

This was an action of assumpsit, tried at the Delaware Circuit, in June, 1820, before Mr. Chief Justice Spencer.

The plaintiff lent the defendant certain sums of money, for which the defendant gave a bond and warrant of attorney, in which bond was included usurious interest on the money lent. A judgment was entered upon the bond, in the Court of Common Pleas of Delaware county; and the Court, afterwards, on motion for that purpose, set aside the judgment on the ground of usury. The defendant, afterwards, promised to pay the plaintiff the original sum actually borrowed, but not the usurious interest contained in the bond. On this promise, the present suit was brought. At the trial, the plaintiff produced

App. 168, 95 S. E. 721 (1918).

In Philips v. Philips (Ch.) 3 Hare, 281, 289 (1844), the court said: "The legal effect of an acknowledgment of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations is that of a promise to pay the old debt, and for this purpose the old debt is a consideration in law. In that sense, and for that purpose, the old debt may be said to be revived. It is revived as a consideration for a new promise. But the new promise and not the old debt, is the measure of the creditor's right. If a debtor simply acknowledges an old debt the law implies from that simple acknowledgment a promise to pay it; for which promise the old debt is a sufficient consideration. But if the debtor promises to pay the old debt when he is able, or by instalments, or in two years, or out of a particular fund, the creditor can claim nothing more than the promise gives him. And the same consequences, I conceive, will follow upon that sort of acknowledgment which is found in a will like the present, creating a trust for paying debts barred by the Statute of Limitations. The creditor will get nothing but what the trust gives him."

the bond and note, which had also been given by the defendant, and offered to deliver them up, to be cancelled.

The Chief Justice was of opinion that the actual money lent, was a sufficient consideration to support the promise of repayment, though the securities taken were usurious and void; and the jury, under his direction, found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $569.84, subject to the opinion of the Court, on a case to be made.

SPENCER, C. J. delivered the opinion of the court.[28] There are two questions presented by the case: 1. Whether, when money has been lent upon an usurious contract, and the contract is afterwards vacated, there yet exists such a moral and equitable duty on the part of the borrower, that a subsequent promise by him to pay the money actually lent, can be enforced at law, in an action founded on the promise? * * *

1. The case of Barnes v. Hedley, 2 Taunt. 182, contains all the authorities and decisions in the British courts, on the first point; and, in my opinion, places the validity of the promise, and the sufficiency of the consideration, beyond a doubt. In that case, the original security was confessedly usurious; it was, by mutual consent, delivered up and cancelled and the borrowers promised to repay the principal and interest; and it was decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the principal and legal interest. It was an issue out of Chancery and the Judges merely certified the result of their decision without giving their reasons at large. It has been repeatedly decided in this Court, that an equitable or moral duty is a sufficient consideration for an actual promise to pay. In Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. 289, Buller, J. said, "if such a question were stripped of all authority, it would be resolved, by inquiring, whether law were a rule of justice, or whether it was something that acts in direct contradiction to justice, conscience and equity; but (he added) the matter has been repeatedly decided." I consider it entirely settled, that notwithstanding the security be usurious, the money lent is a debt in equity and conscience, and ought to be repaid. This principle has long been acknowledged, and acted upon in courts of equity. 2 Vesey, 567; 2 Brown's Ch. Cas. 649. In the latter case, upon an application to set aside a judgment tainted with usury, it was decided, that it could be displaced only by doing what was just, and that it must stand for the money actually paid, with legal interest. In Rogers v. Rathburn, 1 Johns. Ch. 367, the Chancellor pronounced it to be a settled principle, that he who seeks equity, must do equity; that if the borrower came into that court for relief against his usurious contract, he must do what is right, as between the parties, by bringing into court the money actually advanced, with the legal interest; and that then the court would lend him its aid, as against the usurious excess. The statute to prevent usury, (1 N. Y. L. 1813, p. 64,) after regulating the rate of interest, and forbidding a higher rate than seven per cent. per annum, to be taken, declares, that all bonds, bills, notes, contracts and assurances upon, or for any usury, by which there shall be reserved or taken, or secured, or agreed to be reserved or taken, above seven per cent. shall be utterly void. This provision of the statute relates wholly to the contract; and it makes that entirely void. Hence, it has been frequently held, that where there was an antecedent valid debt, and a security was given by the debtor, reserving illegal interest so as to be usurious, that the security being void, the pre-existing debt might be recovered, if even the security was one of a higher nature. 3 Camp. N. P. 119; 1 Hen. Bl. 462. I do not mean to say, that in this case, the plaintiff can recover, on the ground that the defendant has had his money, and the bond he took for it was void; and, that, therefore, he can maintain an action on the implied assumpsit. Here, the lending, and the usurious agreement, were contemporaneous acts; the usury infected the whole transaction; but I do say, in the words of Mr. Justice Lawrence, "the usury could not annihilate the sum of money itself, nor the fact of the receipt of the money;" and it does not admit of a doubt, that the defendant having had the plaintiff's money, without any consideration or security, but a void bond, the promise subsequently to repay this money, was founded on a moral and equitable duty. In Fitzroy v. Gwillim, 1 Term Rep. 153, in trover for goods which had been pledged for money advanced on an usurious contract, it was held, that to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it was necessary to prove a previous tender of the money actually due. This was a recognition by a court of law, of the principle adopted in courts of equity, that although the contract was void, there was yet a subsisting duty on the part of the borrower. It is observable, too, that the plaintiff has not committed an act which is malum in se, but malum prohibitum merely; and this distinguishes this case from giving money to one to commit a crime. In such case, it could not be recovered back, even upon a promise to restore it; and, it is to be borne in mind, that the present contract is free from usury. * * *

Judgment for the plaintiff.[29]

[29] In McClure v. Williams, 7 Vt. 210, 213 (1835), the court said: "The taint of usury is indeed upon him, but if the borrower promises to pay the honest debt, why is not the promise binding? The cash lent is still due and unpaid, and therefore as much a moral right and duty as a sum justly due on a note against which the statute of limitations has run, or that has been discharged by a certificate of bankruptcy; and no reason is perceived why the promise need be in writing in this any more than in those cases. In those cases, the original contract or note having been valid, it is declared upon, and the new promise removes the bar. Here the new promise is declared upon, because the first security was void, and the second good, which some judges have intimated should be the mode in case of a new promise, which avoids the statute of limitations."

Other cases in accord are Kilbourn v. Bradley, 3 Day (Conn.) 356, 3 Am. Dec. 273 (1809); Pinckard v. Ponder, 6 Ga. 253 (1849); Phillips v. Columbus City Bldg. Ass'n, 53 Iowa, 719, 6 N. W. 121 (1880); Sanford v. Kunz, 9 Idaho, 29, 71 Pac. 612 (1903); Sheldon v. Haxtun, 91 N. Y. 124 (1883);

BREWSTER v. BANTA.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1901. 66 N. J. Law, 367, 49 Atl. 718.)

DEPUE, C. J. The declaration contains only the common counts. Annexed to it is a notice, pursuant to the statute, that the action was brought to recover the amount due on a promissory note dated November 7, 1898, made by Demarest Banta, and indorsed by Harvey D. Banta. The defense was that the note in question was made on Sunday, and that it was given in payment of the difference on an exchange of horses concluded on that day, and was therefore void. The case was tried in the Bergen circuit by the court without a jury. The court directed a nonsuit as to Harvey Banta, and found in favor of the plaintiff as against Demarest Banta. The judge held that the Sunday transaction was wholly illegal, and a nonsuit as to Harvey Banta was directed on the ground that he had no connection with the transaction, except in the indorsement of the note. The finding against Demarest Banta was made on the ground of an express promise made by him to the plaintiff to pay the debt after the note was given, which the learned judge decided was binding upon him. The law regulating this subject is conclusively settled in the series of cases beginning with Reeves v. Butcher, 31 N. J. Law, 224. In the first of these cases the supreme court held that the statute forbidding worldly employment or business on Sunday rendered void every transaction which, if performed on a week day, would be enforceable in a court of justice; that such a transaction, being wholly void, could not be validated by ratification, but that the consideration emanating from the tainted contract will be sufficient to form the foundation for a new express promise, on which recovery might be had. Reeves v. Butcher, supra; Ryno v. Darby, 20 N. J. Eq. 231; Cannon v. Ryan, 49 N. J. Law, 314, 8 Atl. 293.

The trial court found, as a question of fact, that, so far as Demarest Banta was concerned, there had been an express promise to the plaintiff to pay the debt. In the trial of an issue before the court, a jury being waived, pursuant to section 176 of the practice act (2 Gen. St. p. 2562), the court is substituted for the jury, and its finding on questions of fact cannot be reviewed on writ of error. All that can be reviewed is the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment. Bridge Co. v. Geisse, 38 N. J. Law, 39, 580; City of Elizabeth v. Hill, 39 N. J. Law, 555; Blackford v. Gaslight Co., 43 N. J. Law, 440. In this case there was evidence of a subsequent express promise to pay the note, and the trial judge so found. That decision cannot be called in question.

The judgment should be affirmed.

MUIR v. KANE et ux.

Action by B. L. Muir against M. Francis Kane and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff is a real estate broker and had found a purchaser for a parcel of land in Seattle by virtue of an oral agreement with the owners thereof, the defendants Kane and wife. The defendants later executed a written agreement with the purchaser, one Paul Bush, stating the terms of the sale and expressly providing that the defendants should pay to the plaintiff the sum of $200 out of the purchase price for his services theretofore rendered as broker. They have not paid this sum, and he now sues to enforce the written agreement.

FULLERTON, J.[30] * * * The statute (Laws 1905, p. 110, c. 58) governing contracts for commissions for buying or selling real estate provides that any agreement authorizing an employé, as an agent, or broker, to sell or purchase real estate for compensation or a commission, shall be void unless the agreement, contract, or promise or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing. The appellants contend that the writing relied upon by the respondent is insufficient under the statute; that it is not an agreement authorizing the respondent to sell the real property described for compensation or commission, nor does it authorize or employ the respondent to sell real estate at all. Manifestly, if the writing sued upon was intended as an agreement authorizing the respondent to sell real estate of the appellants, it is faulty in the particulars mentioned, and so far deficient as not to warrant a recovery even if a sale had been made thereunder. But we do not understand that this is the question presented by the record. It is clear that this writing was not intended as an agreement authorizing the respondent to sell the real property mentioned. In fact it was executed after that service had been performed, and is an agreement in writing to pay a fixed sum for a past service, not a service to be performed in the future. The question for determination is its validity as a promise to pay for a past service. Looking to the instrument itself, there is nothing on its face that in any manner impugns its validity. It is a direct promise to pay a fixed sum of money for services rendered. Prima facie, therefore, it is legal and valid; and, if it is illegal at all, it is because the actual consideration for the promise, which was alleged and proven, rendered the promise illegal. This consideration was the sale of real property for the appellants by the respondent acting as a broker without a written agreement authorizing the service, and it is thought that, because the statute declares an agreement for such a service void unless in writing, the service furnishes no consideration for the subsequent promise, since the service must either have been founded upon an invalid agreement or was voluntary. There are cases which maintain this doctrine. In Bagnole v. Madden, 76 N. J. Law, 255, 69 Atl. 967, the precise question was presented. There the plaintiff had been orally authorized by the defendant to sell a parcel of real estate owned by the defendant. A purchaser was found and a contract of sale entered into. The defendant thereupon executed a written agreement, and delivered the same to the plaintiff, wherein she promised to pay him $50 for his services. In an action brought upon the writing, the court held that she could not recover because of the invalidity of the original oral contract authorizing the services; it being in violation of the statute declaring such agreement void unless in writing.

The case was rested on a decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals (Stout v. Humphrey, 69 N. J. Law, 436, 55 Atl. 281), which announced the same doctrine, but upon a state of facts not quite the same; the subsequent promise to pay being oral instead of in writing. In the course of its opinion in the latter case the court said: "It is clear that if a contract between two parties be void, and not merely voidable, no subsequent express promise will operate to charge the party promising, even though he has derived the benefit of the contract. Yet, according to the commonly received notion respecting moral obligations, and the force attributed to a subsequent express promise, such a person ought to pay. An express promise, therefore, as it should seem, can only revive a precedent good consideration which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original right of action if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision." The court, it will be observed, makes a distinction between contracts formerly good, but on which the right of recovery has been barred by the statute, and those contracts which are barred in the first instance because of some legal defect in their execution, holding that the former will furnish a consideration for a subsequent promise to perform, while the latter will not. It has seemed to us that this distinction is not sound. The moral obligation to pay for services rendered as a broker in selling real estate under an oral contract where the statute requires such contract to be in writing is just as binding as is the moral obligation to pay a debt that has become barred by the statute of limitations; and there is no reason for holding that the latter will support a new promise to pay while the former will not. There is no moral delinquency that attaches to an oral contract to sell real property as a broker. This service cannot be recovered for because the statute says the promise must be in writing, not because it is illegal in itself. It was not intended by the statute to impute moral turpitude to such contracts. The statute was intended to prevent frauds and perjuries, and, to accomplish that purpose, it is required that the evidence of the contract be in writing; but it is not conducive to either fraud or perjury to say that the services rendered under the void contract or voluntarily will support a subsequent written promise to pay for such service. Nor is it a valid objection to say there was no antecedent legal consideration. The validity of a promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations is not founded on its antecedent legal obligation. There is no legal obligation to pay such a debt, if there were there would be no need for the new promise. The obligation is moral solely, and, since there can be no difference in character between one moral obligation and another, there can be no reason for holding that one moral obligation will support a promise while another will not.

Our attention has been called to no case, other than the New Jersey case above cited, where the facts of the case at bar are presented. A case in point on the principle involved, however, is Ferguson v. Harris, 39 S. C. 323, 17 S. E. 782, 39 Am. St. Rep. 731. Certain persons without authority from the defendant had ordered lumber and used it in the erection of a building on the defendant's separate property; she being a married woman. Subsequently she gave her promissory note therefor, and, when an action was brought upon the note, she sought to defend on the ground of want of consideration. It was conceded that there was never any legal obligation on the part of the defendant to pay for the lumber, but that her obligation was wholly moral. It was thereupon urged that such an obligation was insufficient to support the promise. Speaking upon this question, the court said: "All of the authorities admit that where an action to recover a debt is barred by the statute of limitations, or by a discharge in bankruptcy, a subsequent promise to pay the same can be supported by the moral obligation to pay the same, although the legal obligation is gone forever; and I am unable to perceive any just distinction between such a case and one in which there never was a legal, but only a moral, obligation to pay. In the one case the legal obligation is gone as effectually as if it had never existed, and I am at a loss to perceive any sound distinction in principle between the two cases. In both cases, at the time the promise sought to be enforced is made there is nothing whatever to support it except the moral obligation, and why the fact that, because in the one case there was once a legal obligation, which having utterly disappeared, is as if it had never existed, should affect the question, I am at a loss to conceive. If in the one case the moral obligation, which alone remains is sufficient to afford a valid consideration for the promise, I cannot see why the same obligation should not have the same effect in the other. The remark made by Lord Denman in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & E. 438, that the doctrine for which I am contending 'would annihilate the necessity for any consideration at all, inasmuch as the mere fact of giving a promise creates a moral obligation to perform it,' is more specious than sound, for it entirely ignores the distinction between a promise to pay money which the promisor is under a moral obligation to pay, and a promise to pay money which the promisor is under no obligation, either legal or moral, to pay. It seems to me that the cases relied upon to establish the modern doctrine, so far as my examination of them has gone, ignore the distinction pointed out in the note to Comstock v. Smith, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 89, above cited, between an express and an implied promise resting merely on a moral obligation, for, while such obligation does not seem to be sufficient to support an implied promise, yet it is sufficient to support an express promise." To the same effect is Anderson v. Best, 176 Pa. 498, 35 Atl. 194, wherein it was said: "The distinction sought to be made between considerations formerly good but now barred by statute, and those barred by statute in the first instance, is not substantial, and is not sustained by the cases." See, also, Bailey et al. v. Philadelphia et al., 167 Pa. 569, 31 Atl. 925, 46 Am. St. Rep. 691; Stout v. Ennis, 28 Kan. 706.

Believing, as we do, that the better rule is with the cases holding the moral obligation alone sufficient to sustain the promise, it follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed. It is so ordered.[31]

HURLBURT v. BRADLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1920. 94 Conn. 495, 109 Atl. 171.)

Action by Minnie W. Hurlburt against E. Miles Bradley and Dwight E. Russell, the maker and indorser respectively of a promissory note. Verdict set aside as against the indorser, and plaintiff appeals. Error.

On March 20, 1897, the defendant Bradley, by his promissory note, promised to pay to the order of the defendant Russell $500 six months after date at the maker's office, and the defendant Russell indorsed the note to the plaintiff. The complaint alleges that at the time of the indorsement it was understood and agreed that the indorser waived presentment and notice of dishonor, and also alleges that the note was not presented for payment at the time and place therein provided, and was not paid at maturity, and the plaintiff did not give the defendant Russell notice of nonpayment, and that Russell afterwards, with full knowledge of these facts, promised and agreed to pay the note. On the trial it appeared that semiannual payments of interest had been made by the maker and indorser on the note down to March 20, 1918; that about that time, the plaintiff having demanded payment of the note, the two defendants called at the plaintiff's residence, and after some conversation the defendant Russell promised to pay the note.

[31] In accord: Mohr v. Rickgauer, 82 Neb. 398, 117 N. W. 950, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 533 (1908); Pool v. Horner, 64 Md. 131, 20 Atl. 1036 (1885), past consideration given at request. As to moral obligation as a consideration, see notes in 53 L. R. A. 353; 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 520.

There was a verdict for the plaintiff against both defendants, and the trial court on motion set aside the verdict as to the defendant Russell on the ground that there was no evidence which would justify the jury in finding that the new promise was made with knowledge on the part of the defendant Russell that no demand had been made on the maker of the note at maturity.

BEACH, J.[32] (after stating the facts as above). No evidence was offered in support of the allegation of an express waiver of the presentment and notice at the time of the indorsement; and the first question is whether a new promise to pay, made by the indorser long after his discharge by omission to make presentment and give due notice of dishonor, revives his liability as indorser when the promise is made with full knowledge of the laches of the holder.

Until the Negotiable Instruments Act of 1897 the rule in Connecticut was that stated in the headnote to Huntington v. Harvey, 4 Conn. 124: "The promise of the indorser of a note, payable to a third person, and by him assigned to the holder, to pay the note, made after the indorser had become discharged from his liability by the laches of the holder, has no legal efficacy, being without consideration."

On principle this would seem to follow from the language of the indorser's contract. The indorser is not a surety. When his contract is expressed by a simple indorsement, he is only secondarily liable. In addition to the implied warranties his contract, as defined in section 4424, is that on due presentment the note shall be paid according to its tenor, and that, if dishonored, and the necessary steps on dishonor are duly taken, he will pay the amount thereof to the holder or to any subsequent indorser who has been compelled to pay it. This is the contract which was implied by law before the statute, and, stated shortly, it is: "A contract for payment conditioned on due presentment to the maker for payment and due notice of dishonor." Spencer v. Allerton, 60 Conn. 410–417, 22 Atl. 778, 779 (13 L. R. A. 806).

If the holder fails to perform these conditions, the result is, as stated in section 4447, that "any * * * indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged." It is true that the word "discharged" as applied to debts and debtors is used in two senses—it may mean a discharge by performance which puts an end to the obligation as well as to the liability; or it may mean, as in bankruptcy, a personal privilege which leaves the obligation unfulfilled, and hence capable of supporting a new promise. As applied to the contract of indorsement, a discharge by failure to give notice of dishonor would seem to leave no obligation on the part of the indorser unfulfilled, and hence to leave no support for a new promise to pay.

It is easy to see why such a promise made after the time for giving notice of dishonor has passed should be taken as an admission that due notice of dishonor was in fact given, when that fact is in dispute.

[32] Part of the opinion is omitted.

And when the question is whether the notice was given within a reasonable time, or in a proper manner, such a promise may well be taken as an admission that the notice was reasonable and regular. Breed v. Hillhouse, 7 Conn. 523–528. In this case no such question of fact is in dispute. The complaint alleges that the note was not presented for payment, and that no notice of dishonor was given. It admits that the indorser was discharged; and it is hard to see how a liability can be created more than ten years afterward by a new promise without fresh consideration.

Nevertheless, it has long been the law in England and in most of the United States that an indorser who has been discharged may make himself liable by a new promise. No satisfactory explanation of this rule has been brought to our attention. * * *

But, however that may be, our decision is controlled by section 4467, which provides that notices of dishonor may be waived either before giving notice or after the omission to give due notice, and that the waiver may be express or implied. In the language of the Kentucky court, when confronted with the same situation, we feel that the foregoing provision was intended "to put in force in this state the rule that had theretofore been adopted by a majority of the states." Mechanics' Bank v. Katterjohn, 137 Ky. 427, 125 S. W. 1071, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 439.

The statute puts the revival of liability on the ground of waiver, and in this case waiver by a new promise to pay. To have that effect the promise must have been made with full knowledge of the facts, and the next question is whether the evidence supports the verdict in that respect. The general rule is that the burden of proving a waiver rests upon him who asserts it; and in this case the complaint expressly admits that the indorser was discharged, and expressly alleges a subsequent waiver by a new promise made with full knowledge of the facts. The evidence offered in support of these allegations stops with proof of the new promise and with proof that the note was not presented for payment and that no notice of dishonor was given. It may fairly be said, notwithstanding the lapse of time, that the defendant indorser, when he made the new promise, knew that no notice of dishonor had been given, for he was the one to be notified. But there is no evidence as to whether he knew that the note was not presented for payment, unless such knowledge or the lack of it is to be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. We think, however, that in this particular case it is quite immaterial whether or not the indorser knew of the failure to present the note. The question is whether the new promise was made with intent to relinquish a known right, or in this case a known immunity arising from the laches of the holder. A new promise made with knowledge of the fact that no notice of dishonor had been given sufficiently manifests that intent. When the intent to relinquish the immunity is established, the waiver is complete. It adds nothing to prove that the indorser also knew that the note had not been presented for payment, and it detracts nothing to prove that he thought it had been presented. It is sufficient that, knowing he was immune from liability because of the holder's laches, he nevertheless promised to pay.

There is error, and the case is remanded, with directions to enter judgment against the indorser, Russell, upon the verdict.

The other Judges concurred.[33]

ZAVELO v. REEVES et al.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1913. 227 U. S. 625, 33 Sup. Ct. 365, 57 L. Ed. 676, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664.)

Mr. Justice PITNEY delivered the opinion of the court:[34]

Defendants in error sued plaintiff in error November 22, 1907, in the city court of Birmingham, Alabama, declaring upon the common counts for moneys due December 10, 1906, and February 19, 1906, and by an amendment declared upon a promissory note for about $250, which was a part of a claim of the defendants in error that antedated the bankruptcy of the plaintiff in error. The defendant (now plaintiff in error) pleaded that on November 22, 1905, he filed in the district court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama, his petition in bankruptcy; that said court had jurisdiction of said bankruptcy proceedings, and duly adjudicated him a bankrupt on that date; that subsequently he offered a composition to his creditors, and the offer was accepted and a composition made in said proceedings and duly confirmed by said district court February 6, 1906, a certified copy of the decree of confirmation being attached to and made a part of the plea; that the plaintiffs were then creditors of the bankrupt, and as such accepted the offer of composition and were paid a dividend thereon; that the claim sued on herein is a part of and was included in said claim on which said dividend was paid, and the claim herein is barred by said proceedings and discharged by said composition. The plaintiffs replied, (a) that on January 1, 1906 (which date was after the adjudication and before the discharge), defendant promised that if plaintiffs would lend him $500 for use in paying the consideration of a composition with his creditors in said bankruptcy proceedings, he, defendant, when said composition was confirmed, would pay plaintiffs the balance of the demand sued on, after deducting therefrom plaintiffs' share of the consideration of such composition; and plaintiffs averred that they accepted defendant's said offer and promise, and did so lend him the said sum of $500 for the said purpose; and (b) for further replication, that after the filing of defendants' said petition in bankruptcy, and after he had been adjudged a bankrupt, defendant promised plaintiffs that he would pay what he owed them, being the same demand sued on herein, when his composition in bankruptcy was confirmed, and that plaintiffs accepted said promise. To these replications the defendant demurred. The city court overruled the demurrers and proceeded to a trial of the issues of fact, which resulted in favor of the plaintiffs upon both the common counts and the note. The defendant appealed to the supreme court of Alabama, which affirmed the judgment. 171 Ala. 401, 54 South. 654. Whereupon he sued out the present writ of error.

The case is brought here under § 709, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575), the contention being that a right or immunity set up and claimed by the plaintiff in error under the Federal bankruptcy act was denied by the state court. * * * [35]

(2) It is contended as to both replications that although a debt barred by discharge in bankruptcy may be revived by a new promise made after the discharge, this cannot be done by a new promise made in the interim between the adjudication and the discharge.

It is settled, however, that a discharge, while releasing the bankrupt from legal liability to pay a debt that was provable in the bankruptcy, leaves him under a moral obligation that is sufficient to support a new promise to pay the debt. And in reason, as well as by the greater weight of authority, the date of the new promise is immaterial. The theory is that the discharge destroys the remedy, but not the indebtedness; that, generally speaking, it relates to the inception of the proceedings, and the transfer of the bankrupt's estate for the benefit of creditors takes effect as of the same time; that the bankrupt becomes a free man from the time to which the discharge relates, and is as competent to bind himself by a promise to pay an antecedent obligation, which otherwise would not be actionable because of the discharge, as he is to enter into any new engagement. And so, under other bankrupt acts, it has been commonly held that a promise to pay a provable debt, notwithstanding the discharge, is as effectual when made after the filing of the petition and before the discharge as if made after the discharge. Kirkpatrick v. Tattersall, 13 Mees. & W. 766; Otis v. Gazlin, 31 Me. 569; Hornthal v. McRae, 67 N. C. 21; Fraley v. Kelly, 67 N. C. 78; Hill v. Trainer, 49 Wis. 537, 5 N. W. 926; Knapp v. Hoyt, 57 Iowa, 591, 10 N. W. 925, 42 Am. Rep. 59; Lanagin v. Nowland, 44 Ark. 84; Wiggin v. Hodgdon, 63 N. H. 39; Griel v. Solomon, 82 Ala. 85, 2 South. 322, 60 Am. Rep. 733; Jersey City Ins. Co. v. Archer, 122 N. Y. 376, 25 N. E. 338.

[35] The court held that the pleadings did not show that the agreement was an illegal secret preference.

Our attention is not called to any decision in point arising under the present bankruptcy act; but we deem it clear that the same rule should be applied. * * * [36]

Judgment affirmed.

EARLE v. OLIVER.

(In the Court of Exchequer, 1848. 2 Exch. 71 [Welsby, H. & G.].)

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the plaintiff had become surety for the defendant in a sum not to exceed £250, by a continuing guaranty in favor of a certain bank giving credit to the defendant. Later, and after the bank had made advances to the defendant, bankruptcy proceedings were brought against him. During such proceedings the defendant promised the plaintiff in writing that if the plaintiff should be forced to pay to the bank the sum of £250 by virtue of the guaranty, he would repay that sum to the plaintiff with interest thereon without regard to the certificate of discharge in bankruptcy, "whenever it should be in his power to do so." The plaintiff was later forced to pay £250 to the bank and has been repaid only £50 by the defendant. It was alleged that it had been and still was within the power of the defendant to pay as promised, and judgment was asked for £200 with interest amounting to £52.

There were several pleas, a replication, and a general demurrer, and the question was whether or not the declaration stated a cause of action.[37]

PARKE, B. This case was very fully and ably argued before my Brothers ALDERSON, ROLFE, PLATT, and myself, at the sittings after last Michaelmas term. Two questions arose,—the first, as to the sufficiency of the first count on general demurrer; the second, whether the pleadings to the second count, which was money paid, disclosed a sufficient defence. The first count was, in substance, on a promise in writing by the defendant to the plaintiff, in consideration of the defendant's liability, to repay the plaintiff a debt which he had contracted with a banking company as surety for the defendant before the bankruptcy; and the promise was made, before the certificate, to repay the debt when the plaintiff should have paid it, and also the interest on that debt from the time it should be paid by the plaintiff to the time of repaying by the defendant. There was a plea stating that the promise was before certificate, and a special demurrer to the plea, on the ground that it merely stated what was admitted before in the declaration. That is true, and the consequence is, that the question is simply whether the first count is good on demurrer.

[36] The court further held that under the present Bankruptcy Act no claims are provable, except those existing at the time of filing the petition, in bankruptcy, and that therefore the duty created by the new promise was not itself affected by the subsequent discharge.

[37] The statement of facts has been condensed and part of the opinion has been omitted.

So far as relates to the objection that the promise was made before the certificate, the case of Kirkpatrick v. Tattersall, 13 Mees. & W. 766, is an answer. It may be worth while to state that a similar point had been previously decided by Lord Chief Justice Eyre in the case of Roberts v. Morgan, 2 Esp. 736.

The next objection was that, although an existing debt which would be barred by a certificate, and which was due by the bankrupt to the plaintiff, was a good consideration to support a promise to pay it, a mere liability to repay the plaintiff when he should have first paid the debt for the defendant was not. This goes a step further than the cases above cited, but seems to us to fall within the same principle. This liability, like the debt, would be discharged by the certificate; and it seems to us as just and reasonable for the bankrupt, after the fiat, to waive the benefit of his certificate with respect to it, as it is to waive it with respect to a debt; and, if the debt so discharged is a good consideration for a promise to pay it, the liability which is discharged in the same way is a good consideration for a promise to continue liable.

Two further objections were made, on the supposition that this liability is to be put on the same footing as a debt, and is a good consideration: First, that this debt or liability, in a course of being barred by a certificate, cannot be treated as the executed consideration for a promise which a debt or liability, not barred by a certificate, would not support, and that by the course of modern decisions, beginning with the case of Hopkins v. Logan, 5 Mees. & W. 241, and ending with Roscorla v. Thomas, 3 Q. B. 234, a debt cannot be laid as an executed consideration for any promise which the law would not imply from it; and that a promise to pay whenever the party was able was never implied. The second was that a promise to pay interest could not be supported by the consideration, and was as objectionable as if the promise had been to do any collateral thing. We think that these objections ought not to prevail.

The strict rule of the common law was no doubt departed from by Lord Mansfield in Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. 290, and Atkins v. Hill, Id. 288. The principle of the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield is that where the consideration was originally beneficial to the party promising, yet if he be protected from liability by some provision of the statute or common law, meant for his advantage, he may renounce the benefit of that law; and if he promises to pay the debt, which is only what an honest man ought to do, he is then bound by the law to perform it. There is a very able note to the case of Wennall v. Adney, 3 Bos. & P. 252, explaining this at length. The instances given to illustrate the principle are, amongst others, the case of a debt barred by certificate and by the statute of limitations; and the rule in these instances has been so constantly followed that there can be no doubt that it is to be considered as the established law. Debts so barred are unquestionably a sufficient consideration for every promise, absolute or unqualified, qualified or conditional, to pay them. Promises to pay a debt simply, or by installments, or when the party is able, are all equally supported by the past consideration; and, when the debts have become payable instanter, may be given in evidence in the ordinary declaration in indebitatus assumpsit. So, when the debt is not already barred by the statute, a promise to pay the creditor will revive it, and make it a new debt, and a promise to an executor to pay a debt due to a testator creates a new debt to him. But it does not follow that, though a promise revives the debt in such cases, any of those debts will be sufficient consideration to support a promise to do a collateral thing, as to supply goods, or perform work and labour; and so indeed it was held in this court in the case of Reeves v. Hearne, 1 Mees. & W. 323.[38] In such case it is but an accord unexecuted, and no action will lie for not executing it.

We think, therefore, that the conditional promise to pay the debt would be good in this case, and supported by the original consideration; and a conditional promise, which, when absolute, will be only a renewal of the original liability, and to the same extent, is equally good and supported by the original consideration.

The next objection relates to the interest. It seems to us to be supported by the same consideration as the original promise. The promise is to pay the debt conditionally; and, if the debt be unpaid, that the defendant will pay interest for it. We are of opinion, therefore, that the first count is good.[38] * * *

HERRINGTON v. DAVITT et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1917. 220 N. Y. 162, 115 N. E. 476.)

COLLIN, J. The action is upon a promissory note made by the defendants' testator. After the note was delivered the maker was adjudicated a bankrupt, under the federal act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 9585-9656]), and thereunder received his discharge. A composition was effected, under the provisions of the act, between the bankrupt and his creditors. The plaintiff duly accepted the offer of the composition and the 20 per centum of [38] See, also, Trask v. Weeks, ante, p. 421.

In Porter's Adm'r v. Porter, 31 Me. 169 (1850) the court said: "If any action would lie against the defendant upon a promise to pay the debt in a manner different from that provided in the original contract, it would be necessary to declare specially on such promise. Penn v. Bennet, 4 Camp. 205 (1815). As where the debt was payable in money, and there should be a new promise to pay in specific articles." And see note to Janson v. Colomore, ante, p. 388.

the face value of the note payable under it. The defendants' testator thereafter wrote to the plaintiff a letter as follows:

"Troy, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1904.

"My Dear Sister: Your letter received. Was somewhat surprised at its contents. In regard to your claim against me you will be paid every dollar of it with inst as soon as I sell the mill. If anything happens to me the farm is in my name and you will be paid. I have left orders to that effect. Tell Lester to see what balance there is due me on the books for wood and to pay it to you for inst money.

"Yours truly, A. W. Davitt."

The claim mentioned in the letter was the note. The mill referred to in the letter was sold and conveyed by the testator in January, 1907. This action upon the note was commenced June 8, 1912. Upon the trial judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the unpaid balance payable by the terms of the note was ordered. The Appellate Division unanimously affirmed the consequent judgment.

The action was properly brought upon the note. For the purpose of the remedy, the original debt might still be considered the cause of action. Dusenbury v. Hoyt, 53 N. Y. 521, 13 Am. Rep. 543.[89] It might, had the plaintiff so elected, have been brought upon the new promise. It would be more accurate and consistent with the provisions of section 481 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the other sections regulating the pleadings in an action to allege the new promise as the real foundation of the action. The note was a debt provable in the bankruptcy proceedings. The legal obligation which it created or evidenced was, by virtue of the confirmation of the composition offer and the discharge in the proceedings, discharged by force of the statute, and the remedy of plaintiff existing at the time the discharge was granted to recover her debt by action barred. The right of action is given by a new and efficacious promise. The practice of bringing the action upon the original demand is, however, sanctioned by usage. The discharge in bankruptcy is, under such practice, regarded as a discharge of the debt sub modo only, and the new promise as a waiver of the bar to the recovery of the debt created by the discharge. The new promise with such other facts as are essential to constitute it a valid cause of action may, however, be alleged. See Wolffe v. Eberlein, 74 Ala. 99, 49 Am. Rep. 809; Taylor v. Hotchkiss, 81 App. Div. 470, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1042, affirmed 179 N. Y. 546, 71 N. E. 1140; Scheper v. Briggs, 28 App. Div. 115, 50 N. Y. Supp. 869.

The appellants assert and argue that the letter of December 6, 1904, does not contain or constitute a promise or agreement to pay the sum unpaid. At its writing, a statute provided: "Every agreement, promise or undertaking is void, unless it or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his lawful agent, if such agreement, promise or undertaking; * * * 5. Is a subsequent or new promise to pay a debt discharged in bankruptcy. * * *" Personal Property Law (Laws 1897, c. 417) § 21.

The statute has remained in force. Personal property law (Consol. Laws, c. 41) § 31. The debtor does not promise to pay the debt discharged in bankruptcy, unless there is a distinct and unequivocal expression by him, by a writing of the prescribed form, of a clear intention to bind himself to its payment. The acknowledgment of the existence of the debt by the payment of a part of it or of interest upon it or by express written words is not sufficient. For the purpose of creating anew the liability, the law does not imply a promise. The promise need not be made to the creditor, but it must with certainty refer to the debt. No particular form of words need be used. The promise is constituted by words which, in their natural import, express the present intention to obligate or undertake to pay. The payment may, however, depend upon a contingency or condition. If so dependent, it must be proved that the contingency has happened or the condition has been performed. Lawrence v. Harrington, 122 N. Y. 408, 25 N. E. 406; Nathan v. Leland, 193 Mass. 576, 79 N. E. 793; Elwell v. Cumner, 136 Mass. 102; Bigelow v. Norris, 139 Mass. 12, 29 N. E. 61; Kraus v. Torry, 146 Ala. 548, 40 South. 956; Meech v. Lamon, 103 Ind. 515, 3 N. E. 159, 53 Am. Rep. 540; Scheper v. Briggs, 28 App. Div. 115, 50 N. Y. Supp. 869. A promise made at any time after the adjudication, and, perhaps, after the filing of the petition, is actionable. Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 33 Sup. Ct. 365, 57 L. Ed. 676, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664; Everett v. Judson, 228 U. S. 474, 33 Sup. Ct. 568, 57 L. Ed. 927, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 154.

The letter of the defendant's testator constituted a distinct and unqualified promise to pay the debt. In effect and in truth it said to the plaintiff, I will pay you every dollar remaining unpaid upon the note, with interest, and will so pay you as soon as I sell the mill. He stated positively that he then undertook and obligated himself to pay. The construction of the words used by the debtors and the conclusions stated in the judicial decisions above cited adequately support such decision.

The rule of law is well-nigh universal that such a promise made has an obligating and validating consideration in the moral obligation of the debtor to pay. The debt is not paid by the discharge in bankruptcy. It is due in conscience, although discharged in law, and this moral obligation, uniting with the subsequent promise to pay, creates a right of action. Dusenbury v. Hoyt, 53 N. Y. 521, 13 Am. Rep. 543. The appellant asserts that the rule does not obtain or have applicability where, as in the present case, there was a composition between the bankrupt and his creditors, assented to and accepted by the creditors seeking to enforce the unpaid debt. The clear weight of judicial opinion and correct reasoning declare such assertion erroneous. In Cohen v. Lachenmaier, 147 Wis. 649, 133 N. W. 1099, the facts, in the particular under consideration, were as are the facts here. The trial court awarded judgment for the balance unpaid on the note. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin in affirming the judgment said:

"It is further contended that each promise, if made, is nudum pactum, because the plaintiff, as one of the creditors, joined with the majority of the creditors in number and amount in accepting the defendant's offer of a composition with the creditors in settlement of their claims. This claim is based upon the ground that a discharge in bankruptcy in a composition is not a discharge by operation of law but is one effected by the voluntary assent of the creditors. The adjudications are to the effect that a debt which has been extinguished by a voluntary agreement of the debtor and creditor will not support a new promise and that one discharged by operation of law will support one. The proceeding resulting in the discharge of a debtor from liability, based on a composition after bankruptcy proceedings are instituted, is not in its nature such a voluntary act of the creditor as is considered in law as being a voluntary assent of the creditor to the satisfaction of the debt."

In Matter of Merriman's Estate, 44 Conn. 587, Fed. Cas. No. 9,479, the court stated the principal question as being "whether an express promise made by a bankrupt to a creditor to pay the amount of his debt is valid, such creditor having theretofore expressly assented to a composition made and confirmed under the seventeenth section of the amended Bankruptcy Act of June 22, 1874," and carried into effect and held that the promise was valid. It enunciated that an express promise to pay a debt, which had been theretofore discharged by operation of law, was valid. The adequate consideration was the moral obligation to keep the original promise; this rule does not apply to a composition inter partes which derives its validity merely from the will of the parties; and if a debt is legally discharged by the voluntary act of the party, there remains no obligation which can be deemed a consideration for a promise; a discharge by performance of the terms of a bankruptcy composition is a discharge by operation of law; the composition is as to the assenting creditor both a voluntary act and an act of the law, but its efficiency is derived from the compulsory power of the law. There are other decisions of like reasoning and effect. Guild v. Butler, 122 Mass. 498, 23 Am. Rep. 378; First National Bank of St. Albans v. Wood, 53 Vt. 491; Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. v. Bancroft, 1 Abb. N. C. 415; Easton Furniture Manfg. Co. v. Caminez, 146 App. Div. 436, 131 N. Y. Supp. 157. In Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 33 Sup. Ct. 365, 57 L. Ed. 676, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664, the plaintiffs accepted the composition offer of the defendant in bankruptcy proceedings. Thereafter the defendant promised plaintiffs, upon a loan to them of $500, that he would pay the balance of their claim proved in the proceedings. The action was to recover such balance. The plaintiffs recovered. Mr. Justice Pitney in the opinion of the court recognized the general rule that a discharge, while releasing the bankrupt from legal liability to pay a debt that was provable in the bankruptcy, leaves him under a moral obligation that is sufficient to support a new promise to pay the debt, and ignored the composition and its acceptance. The reasoning and the conclusions of those decisions are harmonious with and applicable to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898.

The case of Taylor v. Skiles, 113 Tenn. 288, 81 S. W. 1258, conflicts with the decisions cited and others of like import. Therein it is stated: "It is very generally held that, in the case of a discharge of a debt under insolvent or bankrupt laws, a subsequent promise to pay by the insolvent or bankrupt will revive the original debt and make it enforceable at law. But it is otherwise where the creditor comes to terms with his debtor under a valid composition, and agrees to, and does, accept a part of his debt for the whole. When this is done, the debt is extinguished. The parties having met on common ground, and agreed on terms of settlement which have been carried out, there is no longer even a moral obligation resting upon the debtor as to the balance of the original liability. So that a new promise after composition is without consideration, and will not afford a cause of action. Warren v. Whitney, 24 Me. 561 [41 Am. Dec. 406]; Stafford v. Bacon, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 532 [37 Am. Dec. 366]; Evans v. Bell, 15 Lea [Tenn.] 569."

It is to be noted that the decisions thus cited sustain the proposition that a promise to pay a debt voluntarily discharged is not binding for want of a legal consideration, but do not hold that a discharge in bankruptcy through a composition is a voluntary release or extinguishment of the debt.

We do not find merit in the other grounds for reversal urged by the appellant.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.[40]

[40] This case is annotated in 1 A. L. R. 1700, 1704. In accord: Spann v. Read Phosphate Co., 238 Fed. 338, 151 C. C. A. 354 (1916); Brashears v. Combs, 174 Ky. 344, 192 S. W. 482 (1917).

WARREN v. WHITNEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1845. 24 Me. 561, 41 Am. Dec. 406.)

SHEPLEY, J. It appears from the case stated, that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff before Jan. 16, 1836, on a promissory note; and that on that day they made an assignment of their property for the benefit of their creditors. The assignment contained a release of all debts due from the defendants to their creditors. The plaintiff became a party to it, and thereby released his debt, and received a dividend upon it from the assignees. The defendants, by a contract in writing, made on March 14, 1836, promised to pay the plaintiff any balance of the debt, which might remain unpaid by the assignees. And they afterward paid a small amount of such balance. The plaintiff having voluntarily released his debt upon an agreement to receive his proportion of the property conveyed to the assignees, the transaction was equivalent to an accord and satisfaction. There was no longer a subsisting debt due from the defendants to the plaintiff; and no consideration for the new promise; unless a moral obligation to pay a debt, which has been discharged by payment of part only, can be considered sufficient.

This court had occasion to consider and to deny, that a moral obligation can constitute in all cases a legal consideration for a contract, and to lay down some rules respecting it, in the case of Farnham v. O'Brien, 22 Me. 475. It was there stated, that when a person had received a benefit from, or occasioned a loss to, another, and a statute or rule of public policy protected him from making compensation, the moral obligation to do it remained, and would constitute a legal consideration for a promise to do it. When a debt has been voluntarily discharged, a case is not presented within the rule. The case of Willing v. Peters, 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 177, would however authorize the plaintiff to recover in this case. The authority of that case must be considered as essentially impaired, if not wholly destroyed, by the case of Snevily v. Reed, 9 Watts (Pa.) 396. In the latter case, the plaintiff had discharged the defendant from custody under a ca. sa.; and thereby discharged the debt. The defendant subsequently promised to pay it; and the Court considered, that there was no legal consideration for the promise.[41]

The case of Stafford v. Bacon, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 533, 37 Am. Dec. 366, decided, that a promise to pay a debt voluntarily discharged, was not binding for want of a legal consideration.

The counsel for the plaintiff insist upon a distinction, that when the release is made at the request and for the benefit of the debtor, the new promise is binding; and that when not so made, it is not. The case of Valentine v. Foster, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 520, 35 Am. Dec.

[41] An agreement for forbearance to prosecute further would likewise be no consideration. Herring v. Dorell (Q. B.) 8 Dowling, 604 (1840).

377, is referred to as establishing such a distinction. It the debt be released for the benefit of the debtor, it is not the less perfectly discharged. When a moral obligation has been properly held to constitute a legal consideration a plea of accord and satisfaction could not have been supported. The party must have pleaded a statute bar, or facts to bring the case within some rule of public policy forbidding a recovery, such as infancy or coverture. There is little similarity between such cases and a case, in which a party could have pleaded and have sustained his plea, that he had satisfied and paid the debt.

A nonsuit is to be entered.[42]

STRAUS v. CUNNINGHAM.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1913. 159 App. Div. 718, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1014.)

Action by Ferdinand Straus against James W. Cunningham. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings and sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

SCOTT, J. The question presented by this appeal is: When will a moral obligation survive the release of a debt by a composition agreement so as to furnish a sufficient consideration to support a subsequent promise to pay the debt?

The latest and most comprehensive decision upon this subject in this state is to be found in Taylor v. Hotchkiss, 81 App. Div. 470, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1042, affirmed 179 N. Y. 546, 71 N. E. 1140. In that case Mr. Justice Hiscock, writing for the Appellate Division, stated the general rule as follows:

"If plaintiff, under proceedings in bankruptcy or other involuntary form, had been compelled to accept the stock received by him in full legal settlement of an indebtedness which it did not in fact actually pay, a moral obligation upon the part of the debtor to pay the deficiency would have survived his discharge from his legal and enforceable obligations which would be a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise to pay such balance. Upon the other hand * * * if plaintiff, without further agreement or provision by voluntary proceedings of compromise, had accepted the stock in question in full settlement and satisfaction of the indebtedness due to him, no moral obligation on the part of the debtor would have survived which would have furnished an adequate consideration for a subsequent promise to pay."

[42] In accord: Phelps v. Dennett, 57 Me. 491 (1870); Grant v. Porter, 63 N. H. 229 (1884); Shepard v. Rhodes, 7 R. I. 470, 84 Am. Dec. 573 (1863); Montgomery v. Lampton, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 519 (1861); Ingersoll v. Martin, 58 Md. 67, 42 Am. Rep. 322 (1882). See, also, note, 53 L. R. A. 363.

In Valentine v. Foster, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 520, 35 Am. Dec. 377 (1840), a new promise to pay made subsequently to a voluntary release, given by the creditor for a purpose of his own, was not enforceable.

That these two propositions, so far as they go, accurately state the law upon the subject, seems to be conceded and, at all events, is well settled.

There is a third case, however, not precisely covered by either of the foregoing propositions, and that third case is illustrated by Taylor v. Hotchkiss. In that case the firm of H. L. Hotchkiss & Co., being financially embarrassed and unable to pay its debts, made a general assignment. It then sought an adjustment with its creditors and issued a circular letter to them suggesting that they should accept certain stocks and bonds at a valuation of 80 per cent. of their par value, and should thereupon release the firm so that it might resume business on the Stock Exchange. This was accepted and a general release executed. In their circular letter Hotchkiss & Co. said:

"We propose to offer a moral obligation to take those securities back from our creditors at 80 at a date not later than April 1, 1895."

Then followed an explanation as to how the firm proposed to fulfill this moral obligation. Of course, this proposition was intended to, and doubtless did, have an influence in inducing the creditors to execute the composition agreement, although of itself it did not amount to a binding agreement to take the stock back. The court, however, found that after the execution of the release Hotchkiss renewed by independent agreements his obligation to retake the stock at 80. The question was whether a moral obligation arose out of the composition agreement sufficient to serve as a consideration for the new promise. The court held that it did, notwithstanding the composition and release were voluntary acts on the part of the creditors. The court was of the opinion that, even in case of a voluntary composition, the debtors may, by their acts, expressly provide for that survival of the moral obligation to pay, in the future, in full the indebtedness compromised which would serve as a sufficient consideration for a new promise.

This seems to be a reasonable rule in view of the wide power which individuals have to contract as between themselves. Nor is it necessary that the reservation of this moral obligation be so closely interwoven with the composition agreement as it was in Taylor v. Hotchkiss. We see no reason why a debtor may not, at the time he accepts a voluntary extinguishment of his debts, expressly reserve a moral obligation to pay in full, if able, which will support a subsequent promise to pay.

The facts alleged in the complaint in the present case, which for the purpose of this appeal must be taken as true, are that in March, 1905, the firm of Ellingwood & Cunningham owed the plaintiff the sum of $27,000; that said firm entered into a composition agreement with certain of their creditors wherein and whereby said creditors for certain consideration therein expressed agreed to release said firm and the members thereof from all their legal obligation to pay the debts and obligations due to said creditors; that plaintiff signed said agreement and became a party thereto. The complaint then proceeds as follows:

"IV. That prior to and simultaneously with the making of the said agreement, the defendant expressly reserved from the operation of the said agreement and release his moral obligation to pay the debt of the plaintiff, amounting, as aforesaid, to the sum of $27,000 and interest, and duly acknowledged and recognized said moral obligation as then existing and continuing to exist thereafter.

"V. That thereafter and on or about the 19th day of April, 1905, the defendant recognizing his said moral obligation to pay to the plaintiff the said debt of $27,000, and in consideration thereof, did then and there promise that he would pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $27,000 with interest from April 19, 1905, as follows: $8,000 on or about May 22, 1906, and the balance within a year thereafter, the said defendant, however, to be credited on account of said payment with all sums which the plaintiff might receive from the trustees or assignees under said composition agreement.

"VI. That thereafter, from time to time, the defendant made payments upon account of the said sum agreed to be paid by him, as aforesaid, in the amounts and at the times set forth in the annexed schedule, which is marked schedule 'A' and made part thereof as though the same were herein specifically set forth in full, and the plaintiff received various sums from the trustees or assignees under said composition agreement at the times and in the amounts set forth in said schedule 'A'."

It is also alleged that from time to time plaintiff sent to defendant statements of account which were received and accepted by defendant. Attached to the complaint is a schedule showing the payment of several thousand dollars by defendant to plaintiff between June 1, 1905, and January 20, 1908.

Those allegations, as it seems to us, bring the present case fairly within the principle of Taylor v. Hotchkiss.

It was certainly competent for the defendant to reserve a moral obligation to pay his debt in full, if possible, and perhaps most honorable men would feel that such an obligation rested upon them. It may well be, although not so alleged, that the defendant's recognition and reservation of this moral obligation had weight with the creditors in consenting to compromise and release the debts.

The rule is we think satisfied by holding that, unless specially reserved, no moral obligation to pay the debts survives a voluntary composition and release, but that where at the time of the release the debtor expressly recognizes and reserves a moral obligation to pay notwithstanding the release, that express reservation keeps alive the obligation after release to the extent that it will furnish a sufficient consideration for a subsequent and quite distinct promise to pay. It is entirely optional with a debtor, under such circumstances, whether or not he will reserve a moral obligation, and if he elects to do so we can see no rule of law which is violated by holding that that reservation will support a subsequent promise to pay.

The appellant devotes no small space in his brief to demonstrating that it does not appear on the face of the complaint that the alleged reservation was a fraud upon other creditors. It is quite clear that it does not so appear, and the respondent expressly disclaims making any such contention, admitting in express terms, as is the undoubted fact, that on the face of the complaint no preference is shown to have been obtained by the plaintiff over any other creditor.

The order appealed from must therefore be reversed, with $10 costs and disbursements, and plaintiffs' motion for judgment on the pleadings granted, with $10 costs, with leave to the defendant to withdraw his demurrer and answer over within 20 days upon payment of all costs of the action.[43]

BENTLEY v. MORSE.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1817. 14 Johns. 468.)

In error, on certiorari to a justice's court.

The plaintiff in error had an account, for work, against the defendant in error, which the latter paid, and took the receipt of the plaintiff in error for $24.90. In November, 1815, the plaintiff in error brought an action against the defendant in error, on his account, and recovered judgment. It did not appear that any defence was made. In December, in the same year, the parties happening to be together, the defendant observed to the plaintiff, that he had paid him a sum of money, and held his receipt for it, (alluding to the receipt above mentioned,) and had been since compelled to pay him a second time; the defendant denied any knowledge of the payment or of giving a receipt, but promised, that if the defendant had such receipt, he would repay him the amount of it. The present action was founded on that promise; and the defendant in error, who was plaintiff in the court below, at the trial, produced the receipt in evidence. The defendant below offered the record of the former judgment in evidence, as a bar to the action, but it was overruled, and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant in error.

Per Curiam. In consequence of the omission of the defendant in error, to make a defence in the former action against him, and to produce his receipt to show the payment of the debt, he was forever barred from maintaining an action to recover back the money he had paid; and the question now is, whether the promise to repay the amount of the money expressed in the receipt is valid in law.

The debt having been paid, the recovery in the former action was clearly unjust; and though, in consequence of his neglect, the defendant in error lost all legal remedy to recover back his money; yet there was such a moral obligation, on the part of the plaintiff in error, to refund the money, as would be a good consideration to support an assumpsit or express promise to pay it. The moral obligation is as strong as any in the cases in which it has been held sufficient to revive a debt barred by statute or some positive rule of law. It is like the promise of an infant to pay a debt contracted during his non-age, or of an insolvent or bankrupt to pay a debt from which he is discharged by his certificate.[44]

Judgment affirmed.

BINNINGTON v. WALLIS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1821. 4 Barn. & Ald. 650, 106 Eng. Rep. 1074.)

Declaration stated, that before the making of the promise and undertaking, the plaintiff had cohabited with the defendant as his mistress; and an immoral connexion and intercourse had existed between them for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of twelve years; and the plaintiff had thereby been greatly injured in her character and reputation, and deprived of the means of honestly procuring a livelihood; and that, before the time of the making of the promise, to wit, on the 1st of January, 1816, at, &c. the plaintiff wholly ceased to cohabit with the said defendant, as his mistress, and to have any immoral intercourse with her, and thereupon it was determined and agreed between them, that no immoral intercourse or connexion should ever again take place between them; and that the defendant, as a compensation for the injury so sustained by the plaintiff, should pay and allow to the plaintiff, the quarterly sum of £10, while she should be and continue of good and virtuous life, conversation, and demeanour; and there-

[44] Lord Mansfield laid it down as a general rule that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent express promise. In Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowper, 289 (1782), he said: "Where a man is under a moral obligation, which no court of law or equity can enforce and promises, the honesty and rectitude of the thing is a consideration." See, also, Watson v. Turner, Buller N. P. 129 (1767).

In a few states the same general rule has been laid down, either by statute or by the courts. See Ga. Code 1895, § 3658; Gray v. Hamil, 82 Ga. 375, 10 S. E. 205, 6 L. R. A. 72 (1889); Robinson v. Hurst, 78 Md. 59, 26 Atl. 956, 20 L. R. A. 761, 44 Am. St. Rep. 266 (1893); Holden v. Banes, 140 Pa. 63, 21 Atl. 239 (1891); Spear v. Griffith, 86 Ill. 552 (1877); Olson v. Hagan, 102 Wash. 321, 172 Pac. 1173 (1918). The cases antecedent hereto show the extent to which a moral obligation is regarded as a consideration in other states.

A bare promise without consideration, past or present, creates no moral obligation, and a subsequent note or promise in renewal thereof creates no legal duty. Monroe v. Martin, 137 Ga. 262, 73 S. E. 341 (1911); Parsons v. Teller, 188 N. Y. 318, 80 N. E. 930 (1907); Nutter v. Stover, 48 Me. 163 (1859); Smith v. Taylor, 39 Me. 242 (1855).

upon, in consideration of the premises; and that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would resign and give up the said quarterly sum, he undertook to pay her so much money as the said quarterly sum was reasonably worth, in order to enable her to continue to live in a virtuous and decorous manner. The declaration then averred, that the plaintiff did resign and give up the said quarterly sum, and the same from thence wholly ceased and determined; and that she had always, from the time of the cessation of the immoral connexion lived in a virtuous and decorous manner, and been of virtuous life, conversation, and demeanour. It then averred, that the quarterly sum was reasonably worth £400; and then alleged as a breach, nonpayment by the defendant. The other counts omitted any mention of the quarterly allowance, and in other respects were similar to this. To this declaration, there was a general demurrer.

PER CURIAM. The declaration is insufficient. It is not averred that the defendant was the seducer, and there is no authority to shew that past cohabitation alone, or the ceasing to cohabit in future, is a good consideration for a promise of this nature. The cases cited are distinguishable from this, because they are all cases of deeds, and it is a very different question, whether a consideration be sufficiently good to sustain a promise, and whether it be so illegal as to make the deed which required no consideration void. There must therefore be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.[45]

MILLS v. WYMAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1825. 3 Pick. 207.)

This was an action of assumpsit brought to recover a compensation for the board, nursing, &c., of Levi Wyman, son of the defendant, from the 5th to the 20th of February, 1821. The plaintiff then lived at Hartford, in Connecticut; the defendant, at Shrewsbury, in this county. Levi Wyman, at the time when the services were rendered, was about 25 years of age, and had long ceased to be a member of his father's family. He was on his return from a voyage at sea, and being suddenly taken sick at Hartford, and being poor and in distress, was relieved by the plaintiff in the manner and to the extent above stated. On the 24th of February, after all the expenses had been incurred, the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff, promising to pay him such expenses. There was no consideration for this promise, except what grew out of the relation which subsisted between Levi Wyman and the defendant, and Howe, J., before whom the cause was tried in the court of common pleas, thinking this not sufficient to support the action, directed a nonsuit. To this direction the plaintiff filed exceptions.

[45] In accord: Beaumont v. Reeve, 8 Q. B. 483 (1846).
But a release from a valid engagement to marry in a case of this sort is a sufficient consideration. Henderson v. Spratlen, 44 Colo. 278, 98 Pac. 14, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 655 (1908). See, also, Jennings v. Brown (Exch.) 9 M & W. 496 (1842).

Parker, C. J. General rules of law established for the protection and security of honest and fair-minded men, who may inconsiderately make promises without any equivalent, will sometimes screen men of a different character from engagements which they are bound in foro conscientiæ to perform. This is a defect inherent in all human systems of legislation. The rule that a mere verbal promise, without any consideration, cannot be enforced by action, is universal in its application, and cannot be departed from to suit particular cases in which a refusal to perform such a promise may be disgraceful.

The promise declared on in this case appears to have been made without any legal consideration. The kindness and services towards the sick son of the defendant were not bestowed at his request. The son was in no respect under the care of the defendant. He was twenty-five years old, and had long left his father's family. On his return from a foreign country, he fell sick among strangers, and the plaintiff acted the part of the good Samaritan, giving him shelter and comfort until he died. The defendant, his father, on being informed of this event, influenced by a transient feeling of gratitude, promises in writing to pay the plaintiff for the expenses he had incurred. But he has determined to break this promise, and is willing to have his case appear on record as a strong example of particular injustice sometimes necessarily resulting from the operation of general rules.

It is said a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration to support an express promise; and some authorities lay down the rule thus broadly; but upon examination of the cases we are satisfied that the universality of the rule cannot be supported, and that there must have been some preëxisting obligation which has become inoperative by positive law, to form a basis for an effective promise. The cases of debts barred by the statute of limitations, of debts incurred by infants, of debts of bankrupts, are generally put for illustration of the rule. Express promises founded on such preëxisting equitable obligations may be enforced; there is a good consideration for them; they merely remove an impediment created by law to the recovery of debts honestly due, but which public policy protects the debtors from being compelled to pay. In all these cases there was originally a quid pro quo; and according to the principles of natural justice the party receiving ought to pay; but the legislature has said he shall not be coerced; then comes the promise to pay the debt that is barred, the promise of the man to pay the debt of the infant, of the discharged bankrupt to restore to his creditor what by the law he had lost. In all these cases there is a moral obligation founded upon an antecedent valuable consideration. These promises therefore have a sound legal basis. They are not promises to pay something for nothing; not naked pacts; but the voluntary revival or creation of obligation which before existed in natural law, but which had been dispensed with, not for the benefit of the party obliged solely, but principally for the public convenience. If moral obligation, in its fullest sense, is a good substratum for an express promise, it is not easy to perceive why it is not equally good to support an implied promise. What a man ought to do, generally he ought to be made to do, whether he promise or refuse. But the law of society has left most of such obligations to the interior forum, as the tribunal of conscience has been aptly called. Is there not a moral obligation upon every son who has become affluent by means of the education and advantages bestowed upon him by his father, to relieve that father from pecuniary embarrassment, to promote his comfort and happiness, and even to share with him his riches, if thereby he will be made happy? And yet such a son may, with impunity, leave such a father in any degree of penury above that which will expose the community in which he dwells, to the danger of being obliged to preserve him from absolute want. Is not a wealthy father under strong moral obligation to advance the interest of an obedient, well disposed son, to furnish him with the means of acquiring and maintaining a becoming rank in life, to rescue him from the horrors of debt incurred by misfortune? Yet the law will uphold him in any degree of parsimony, short of that which would reduce his son to the necessity of seeking public charity.

Without doubt there are great interests of society which justify withholding the coercive arm of the law from these duties of imperfect obligation, as they are called; imperfect, not because they are less binding upon the conscience than those which are called perfect, but because the wisdom of the social law does not impose sanctions upon them.

A deliberate promise, in writing, made freely and without any mistake, one which may lead the party to whom it is made into contracts and expenses, cannot be broken without a violation of moral duty. But if there was nothing paid or promised for it, the law, perhaps wisely, leaves the execution of it to the conscience of him who makes it. It is only when the party making the promise gains something, or he to whom it is made loses something, that the law gives the promise validity. And in the case of the promise of the adult to pay the debt of the infant, of the debtor discharged by the statute of limitations or bankruptcy, the principle is preserved by looking back to the origin of the transaction, where an equivalent is to be found. An exact equivalent is not required by the law; for there being a consideration, the parties are left to estimate its value: though here the courts of equity will step in to relieve from gross inadequacy between the consideration and the promise.

These principles are deduced from the general current of decided cases upon the subject as well as from the known maxims of the common law. The general position, that moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for an express promise, is to be limited in its application, to cases where at some time or other a good or valuable consideration has existed.

A legal obligation is always a sufficient consideration to support either an express or an implied promise; such as an infant's debt for necessaries, or a father's promise to pay for the support and education of his minor children. But when the child shall have attained to manhood, and shall have become his own agent in the world's business, the debts he incurs, whatever may be their nature, create no obligation upon the father; and it seems to follow, that his promise founded upon such a debt has no legally binding force.

The cases of instruments under seal and certain mercantile contracts, in which considerations need not be proved, do not contradict the principles above suggested. The first import a consideration in themselves, and the second belong to a branch of the mercantile law, which has found it necessary to disregard the point of consideration in respect to instruments negotiable in their nature and essential to the interests of commerce.

Instead of citing a multiplicity of cases to support the positions I have taken, I will only refer to a very able review of all the cases in the note in 3 Bos. & P. 249. The opinions of the judges had been variant for a long course of years upon this subject, but there seems to be no case in which it was nakedly decided, that a promise to pay the debt of a son of full age, not living with his father, though the debt were incurred by sickness which ended in the death of the son, without a previous request by the father proved or presumed, could be enforced by action.

It has been attempted to show a legal obligation on the part of the defendant by virtue of our statute, which compels lineal kindred in the ascending or descending line to support such of their poor relations as are likely to become chargeable to the town where they have their settlement. But it is a sufficient answer to this position, that such legal obligation does not exist except in the very cases provided for in the statute, and never until the party charged has been adjudged to be of sufficient ability thereto. We do not know from the report any of the facts which are necessary to create such an obligation. Whether the deceased had a legal settlement in this commonwealth at the time of his death, whether he was likely to become chargeable had he lived, whether the defendant was of sufficient ability, are essential facts to be adjudicated by the court to which is given jurisdiction on this subject. The legal liability does not arise until these facts have all been ascertained by judgment, after hearing the party intended to be charged.

For the foregoing reasons we are all of opinion that the nonsuit directed by the court of common pleas was right, and that judgment be entered thereon for costs for the defendant.[46]

[46] Moral obligation, so called, and the facts causing such moral obligation, are generally stated not to be a sufficient consideration. Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 18 Am. Dec. 79 (1828); Inhabitants of Freeman v. Dodge, 98 Me. 531, 57 Atl. 884, 66 L. R. A. 395 (1904), promise of son to reimburse a town for supporting his mother; Schwerdt v. Schwerdt, 235 Ill. 386, 85 N. E. 613 (1908); Rask v. Norman, 141 Minn. 198, 169 N. W. 704 (1918); Strevell v. Jones' Estate, 106 App. Div. 334, 94 N. Y. Supp. 627 (1905); Eastwood v. St. Rep. 171 (1903), the court said: "No benefit accrued to him who made the promise, nor did any injury flow to him who received it. Such promises are not made within the scope of transactions intended to confer rights enforceable at law. They are lightly made, dictated by generosity, courtesy, or impulse, often by ruinous prodigality. To enforce them by a judgment in favor of those who gave nothing therefor would often bring such imperfect obligations into competition with the absolute duties to wife and children, or into competition with debts for property actually received, and make the law an instrument by which a man could be forced to be generous before he was just."

CHAPTER III

CONTRACTS UNDER SEAL

DEED [Defined in TERMES DE LA LEY, 149–152]. Translated in the first American edition from the London edition of 1721.

Deed is a writing sealed and delivered, to prove and testify the agreement of the party whose deed it is to the thing contained in the deed; as a deed of feoffment is a proof of the livery of seisin, for the land passes by the livery of seisin; but when the deed and the delivery are joined together, that is a proof of the livery, and that the feoffor is contented that the feoffee shall have the land.

All deeds are either indented, whereof there are two, three, or more parts, as the case requires; of which the feoffor, grantor, or lessor hath one; the feoffee, grantee, or lessee another; and peradventure some other body a third, &c. Or else they are poll deeds, single, and but one, which the feoffee, grantee, or lessee hath, &c. And every deed consists of three principal points, (without which it is no perfect deed to bind the parties) namely, writing, sealing, and delivery.

1. By writing is shewed the parties' names to the deed, their dwelling places, their degrees, the thing granted, upon what considerations, the estate limited, the time when it was granted, and whether simply, or upon condition, with other such like circumstances. But whether the parties to the deed write in the end their names, or set to their marks, (as it is commonly used) it matters not at all, (as I think) for that is not meant, where it is said, that every deed ought to have writing.

2. Sealing is a farther testimony of their consents to what is contained in the deed; as it appears in these words, In witness whereof, &c. or to such effect, always put in the latter end of deeds, without which words the deed is insufficient.

And because we are about sealing and signing of deeds, it shall not be much amiss here to shew you, for antiquity's sake, the manner of signing and subscribing deeds in our ancestors the Saxons' time, a fashion differing from that we use now, in this, that they to their deeds subscribed their names, (commonly adding the sign of the cross) and in the end did set down a great number of witnesses, not using at that time any kind of seal; and we at this day, for more surety, both subscribe our names, (though that be not very necessary) and put to our seals, and use the help of witnesses besides.

That the former fashion continued absolute until the time of the conquest by the Normans, whose manners by little and little at the length prevailed amongst us; for the first sealed charter in England, is thought to be that of king Edward the Confessor, to the abbey of Westminster, who being educated in Normandy, brought into the realm that and some other of their fashions with him. And after the coming of William the Conqueror, the Normans liking their own country custom, (as naturally all nations do) rejected the manner that they found here, and retained their own, as Ingulphus the abbot of Croiland, who came in with the conquest witnesses, saying: "The Normans do change the making of writings (which were wont to be firmed in England with crosses of gold, and other holy signs) into an impression of wax, and reject also the manner of the English writing." Howbeit, this was not done all at once, but it increased and came forward by certain degrees; so that first and for a season the king only or a few other of the nobility, used to seal; then the noblemen, for the most part, and none other. Which thing a man may see in the history of Battle-Abby, where Richard Lucie, chief justice of England, in the time of king Henry II, is reported have blamed a mean subject for that he used a private seal, whereas that pertained (as he said) to the king and nobility only.

At which time also, as J. Rosse notes it, they used to engrave in their seals their own pictures and counterfeits, covered with a long coat over their armours. But after this, the gentlemen of the better sort took up the fashion, and because they were not all warriors, they made seals engraven with their several coats or shields of arms, for difference sake, as the same author reports. At length about the time of Edward III seals became very common; so that not only such as bear arms used to seal, but other men also fashioned to themselves signets of their own devices, some taking the letters of their own names, some flowers, some knots and flourishes, some birds and beasts, and some other things, as we now yet daily see used.

Some other manners of sealings besides these have been heard of among us; as namely, that of king Edward III, by which he gave to Norman the Hunter,

> The hop and the hop town,
> With all the bounds upside down:
> And in witness that it was sooth,
> He bit the wax with his fore tooth.

The like to this was shewed me by one of my friends in a loose paper, but not very anciently written, and therefore he willed me to esteem of it as I thought good. It was as follows:

"I, William, King, give to thee Plowden Royden, my hop and hop lands, with all the bounds up and down, from heaven to earth, from earth to hell for thee and thine to dwell, from me and mine, to thee and thine, for a bow and a broad arrow, when I come to hunt upon yarrow. In witness that this is sooth, I bite this wax with my tooth, in the presence of Magge, Maud, and Margery, and my third son Henry." [1]

[1] A practice of this sort is referred to in Lacey v. Hutchinson, 5 Ga. App. 865, 64 S. E. 105 (1909).

Also that of Alberick de Vere, containing the donation of Hatfield, to which he affixed a short black-hafted knife like an old halfpenny whittle, insead of a seal: with divers such like.

But some peradventure will think, that these were received in common use and custom, and that they were not the devices and pleasures, of a few singular persons: such are no less deceived than they that deem every charter and writing, that hath no seal annexed, to be as ancient as the conquest; whereas indeed sealing was not commonly used till the time of king Edward III, as hath been already said.

3. Delivery, though it be set last, is not the least; for after a deed is written and sealed, if it be not delivered, all the rest is to no purpose.

And this delivery ought to be done by the party himself, or his sufficient warrant; and so it will bind him whosoever wrote or sealed the same: and by this last act the deed is made perfect, according to the intent and effect of it; and therefore, in deeds, the delivery is to be proved, &c.

Thus you see, writing and sealing, without delivery, is nothing to purpose: sealing and delivery, where there is no writing, work nothing: and writing and delivery without sealing, make no deed. Therefore they all ought jointly to concur to make a perfect deed.[2]

WARREN v. LYNCH.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New York, 1810. 5 Johns. 239.)

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff, as the first endorser of a promissory note, against the defendant as maker. The note was as follows:

"Petersburg, Va., August 27, 1807.

"Four months after date I promise to pay Hopkins Robertson or order, the sum of $719.12½ cents, witness my hand and seal. Payable in New York. Thomas Lynch. [L. S.]"

The flourish and initials L. S. at the end of the maker's name constituted what was called his seal. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, with notice of special matter to be given in evidence at the trial. * * *

On this evidence the judge was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and under his direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the note with interest.

KENT, C. J.[3] * * * 1. The note was given in Virginia, and by the laws of that State it was a sealed instrument or deed. But it was made payable in New York, and according to a well-settled rule, it is to be tested and governed by the law of this State. Thompson v. Ketcham, 4 Johns. 285. Independent then of the written agreement of the parties (and on the operation of which some doubt might possibly arise), this paper must be taken to be a promissory note, without seal, as contradistinguished from a specialty. We have never adopted the usage prevailing in Virginia and in some other States, of substituting a scrawl for a seal; and what was said by Mr. Justice Livingston, in the case of Meredith v. Hinsdale, 2 Caines, 362, in favor of such a substitute, was his own opinion and not that of the court. A seal, according to Lord Coke (3 Inst. 169), is wax with an impression. Sigillum est cera impressa, quia cera sine impressione non est sigillum.

A scrawl with a pen is not a seal, and deserves no notice. The law has not indeed declared of what precise materials the wax shall consist; and whether it be a wafer or any other paste or matter sufficiently tenacious to adhere and receive an impression, is perhaps not material. But the scrawl has no one property of a seal. Multum abludit imago. To adopt it as such would be at once to abolish the immemorial distinction between writings sealed and writings not sealed. Forms will frequently, and especially when they are consecrated by time and usage, become substance. The calling a paper a deed will not make it one if it want the requisite formalities. "Notwithstanding," says Perkins (§ 129), "that words obligatory are written on parchment or paper, and the obligor delivereth the same as his deed, yet if it be not sealed, at the time of the delivery, it is but an escrowl, though the name of the obligor be subscribed." I am aware that ingenious criticism may be indulged at the expense of this and of many of our legal usages, but we ought to require evidence of some positive and serious public inconvenience before we, at one stroke, annihilate so well-established and venerable a practice as the use of seals in the authentication of deeds. The object in requiring seals, as I humbly presume, was misapprehended both by President Pendleton and by Mr. Justice Livingston. It was not, as they seem to suppose, because the seal helped to designate the party who affixed it to his name. Ista ratio nullius pretii (says Vinnius, in Inst. 2, 10, 5) nam et alieno annulo signare licet. Seals were never introduced or tolerated in any code of law, because of any family impression or image or initials which they might contain. One person might always use another's seal, both in the English and in the Roman law.[4]

[4] In accord: Ball v. Dunsterville, 4 T. R. 313, 100 E. R. 1038 (1791), one partner attached a seal for both in the other's presence. And where the instrument purports in its own terms to be under the hands and seals of the parties, they will all be presumed to have adopted the single seal appearing thereon. Ryan v. Cooke, 172 Ill. 302, 50 N. E. 213 (1898); Hiett v. Turner-Hudnut Co., 182 Ill. App. 524 (1913); Davis v. Burton, 3 Scam. (4 Ill.) 41, 36 Am.

The policy of the rule consists in giving ceremony and solemnity to the execution of important instruments, by means of which the attention of the parties is more certainly and effectually fixed and frauds less likely to be practised upon the unwary. President Pendleton, in the case of Jones and Temple v. Logwood, 1 Wash. (Va.) 42, which was cited upon the argument, said that he did not know of any adjudged case that determines that a seal must necessarily be something impressed on wax; and he seemed to think that there was nothing but Lord Coke's opinion to govern the question. He certainly could not have examined this point with his usual diligence. The ancient authorities are explicit, that a seal does, in legal contemplation, mean an impression upon wax. "It is not requisite," according to Perkins (§ 134), "that there be for every grantor who is named in the deed a several piece of wax, for one piece of wax may serve for all the grantors if every one put his seal upon the same piece of wax." And Brooke (tit. Faits, 30 and 17) uses the same language. In Lightfoot and Butler's Case, which was in the Exchequer, 29 Eliz. (2 Leon. 21) the Barons were equally explicit as to the essence of a seal, though they did not all concur upon the point, as stated in Perkins. One of them said that twenty men may seal with one seal upon one piece of wax only, and that should serve for them all, if they all laid their hands upon the seal; but the other two Barons held that though they might all seal a deed with one seal, yet it must be upon several pieces of wax. Indeed this point, that the seal was an impression upon wax, seems to be necessarily assumed and taken for granted in several other passages which might be cited from Perkins and Brooke, and also in Mr. Selden's Notes to Fortescue (De Laud. p. 72); and the nature of a seal is no more a matter of doubt in the old English law than it is that a deed must be written upon paper or parchment, and not upon wood or stone. Nor has the common law ever been altered in Westminster Hall upon this subject, for in the late case of Adam v. Keer, 1 Bos. & Puller, 360, it was made a question whether a bond executed in Jamaica, with a scrawl of the pen, according to the custom of that island, should operate as such in England, even upon the strength of that usage.

The civil law understood the distinction and solemnity of seals as well as the common law of England. Testaments were required not only to be subscribed, but to be sealed by the witnesses. Subscrip-tione testium, et ex edicto prætoris, signacula testamentis imponerentur (Inst. 2, 10, 3). The Romans generally used a ring, but the seal was valid in law, if made with one's own or another's ring; and, according to Heineccius (Elementa juris civilis secundum ord., Inst. 497), with any other instrument which would make an impression, and this, he says is the law to this day throughout Germany. And let me add that we have the highest and purest classical authority for Lord Coke's definition of a seal, Quid si in ejusmodi cera centum sigilla hoc annulo impressero? (Cicero. Academ. Quæst. Lucul. 4, 26.) * * *

JACKSON v. SECURITY MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

Action by Isabella H. Jackson against the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, affirmed by the Appellate Court, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.[6]

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Court affirming the judgment of the circuit court of Cook county in an action in assumpsit brought by appellant to recover from appellee a balance of $7,500 alleged to be due upon an insurance policy for $10,000, issued November 17, 1897, upon the life of her husband, William S. Jackson. * * * Appellee pleaded, in addition to the general issue, a release by appellant, for $2,500, of all claims under the policy; that the policy was issued in consideration of a written application by the insured, which appellee's officers, after the death of the insured, were led by certain information to believe contained divers false representations; that appellee in good faith believed it had a complete defense to all claims and entered into the agreement with appellant

[5] In accord "at common law": Woodbury v. United States Casualty Co., 284 Ill. 227, 120 N. E. 8 (1918).

In many states it is provided by statute that a scroll or other device with the pen shall be sufficient. Stimson, Am. St. Law, §§ 1564-5. In New York the word "seal" or the letters "L. S." (locus sigilli), or anything affixed by an adhesive substance, may be used. N. Y. Statutory Construction Law (Consol. Laws, c. 22) § 13.

In other states the earlier common-law rule has been changed by judicial decision, following changes in local custom: Lorah v. Nissley, 156 Pa. 329, 27 Atl. 242 (1893); Hacker's Appeal, 121 Pa. 192, 15 Atl. 500, 1 L. R. A. 861 (1888). In Alexander v. Jameson, 5 Bin. (Pa.) 238, 244 (1812), Brackenridge, J., said: "Illi robur et æs triplex. He was a bold fellow who first in these colonies, and particularly in Pennsylvania, in time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, substituted the appearance of a seal by the circumflex of a pen, which has been sanctioned by usage and the adjudication of the courts, as equipollent with a stamp containing some effigies or inscription on stone or metal. * * * How could a jury distinguish the hieroglyphic or circumflex of a pen by one man from another? In fact the circumflex is usually made by the scrivener drawing the instrument, and the word 'seal' inscribed within it."

to compromise said claims for $2,500, which sum was paid in full satisfaction of all claims and the policy surrendered. After both parties had introduced their evidence, the jury, under an instruction from the court, returned a verdict in favor of appellee. At the time of the settlement appellant gave a receipt to appellee's respresentative, H. J. McCormick, as follows:

"Chicago, Ill., Nov. 18, 1898.

"Received of the Security Mutual Life Association twenty-five hundred dollars, in full release of all claims under this policy No. 22,819 on the life of William S. Jackson.

"Isabella H. Jackson. [Seal.]
"Widow of William S. Jackson. Seal. } Beneficiary.
"........................ Seal.

"Witness: Adelor J. Petit,
"H. J. McCormick."

It is admitted that the word "seal" after the name of appellant was on the receipt before she signed it, but the evidence is conflicting as to whether the scrawl or irregular ink line about the word "seal," indicated above by brackets, was also there at that time.

CARTER, J. * * * Appellant insists that the scrawl or irregular ink mark around the word "seal" after her name on the release was placed there after she signed it. McCormick testified that he put the scrawl about the word "seal" at the same time he filled in the body of the release and dated it, and that this was done before it was signed by the appellant. Even though it should be admitted that the scrawl was placed there afterwards by a representative of appellee, such fact does not render the instrument void, if the word "seal" was sufficient to constitute the instrument a sealed instrument without the necessity of a scrawl. Section 1 of chapter 29, p. 460, Hurd's Rev. St. 1905, reads: "That any instrument of writing, to which the maker shall affix a scrawl by way of seal, shall be of the same effect and obligation, to all intents, as if the same were sealed." While this statute has been frequently construed, the precise question in the form here presented has never been passed upon by this court. In Ankeny v. McMahon, 3 Scam. 12, it was held that, where an instrument describes itself in the body as sealed, and the letters "L. S." are either written or printed opposite the signature, it is a sealed instrument, and that there is no substantial difference as to the validity or dignity of the instrument whether the party executing it writes his name opposite a scrawl previously written or printed, or actually affixes a scrawl after signing his name. In Davis v. Burton, 3 Scam. 41, 36 Am. Dec. 511, it was held that where a bond or sealed instrument purports, on its face, to be sealed by all the signers, and there are several seals attached, but not so many as there are names, the court will presume that each signer has adopted some one of the seals already attached. To the same effect is Ryan v. Cooke, 172 Ill.

302, 50 N. E. 213. See, also, Eames v. Preston, 20 Ill. 389. The recital of the seal is not essential. If the instrument be actually sealed, it will operate as such without the recital, and the general rule is that, if there is no seal at the end, the instrument will not be held to be a specialty, although the parties in the body of the writing make mention of a seal. 2 Bouvier's Law Dic. (Rawle's Rev.) p. 1020; 9 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 147, and cases cited.

Appellant contends that, our statute on this subject having been adopted substantially from that of Virginia, it must be presumed we adopted the construction given by the courts of that state up to the time the statute was adopted; that the courts of Virginia had held that an instrument such as this, even with a scrawl about the word "seal," but which did not term itself in the body of the instrument as a sealed instrument, was not one. Clegg v. Lemessurier, 15 Grat. (Va.) 108; Parks v. Hewlett, 9 Leigh (Va.) 511. This rule might obtain if this were a question of first impression and our courts had not construed the statute differently from the Virginia courts. Moreover, a more recent decision of the highest court of that state has held that the word "seal" has the same force and effect as a scrawl, under a statute very like our own. Lewis' Ex'rs v. Overby's Adm'r, 28 Grat. (Va.) 627. Considering the evidence in the most favorable light possible to appellant, our conclusion on the whole record is that this must be held a sealed instrument. * * *

Judgment affirmed.[7]

PARKS v. HAZLERIGG.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1845. 7 Blackf. 536, 43 Am. Dec. 106.)

SULLIVAN, J. This was an action of debt on an appeal-bond. The plaintiff declared against Hazlerigg, Kizer, Russell, and Dugan; for that the defendants, on, etc., at, etc., by their certain writing obligatory sealed with their seals, etc., acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound, etc. On oyer it appeared that the above defendants were named in the bond as obligors. There were four seals affixed to the bond, but it was signed only by Hazlerigg, Russell, and Dugan. Opposite to the fourth seal there was no signature. Demurrer to the declaration and judgment for the defendants.

This case presents the simple question, whether it is necessary to the validity of a bond, which has been sealed by the obligor, that it be signed by him also.

[7] Seals not consisting of cera impressa are now generally operative. Hacker's Appeal, 121 Pa. 192, 15 Atl. 500, 1 L. R. A. 861 (1888), a mere dash after the name; Van Bokkelen v. Taylor, 62 N. Y. 105 (1875), a revenue stamp affixed as a seal; Pillow v. Roberts, 13 How. 472, 14 L. Ed. 228 (1851), an impression in the paper itself, like the official and corporation seals now in use; Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. S. 546, 1 Sup. Ct. 418, 27 L. Ed. 254 (1882).

The local custom should be looked up and followed.

At common law, signing was not necessary to the validity of a deed. 2 Blacks. Comm. 305–306; Cromwell v. Grunsden, 2 Salk. 462. To this point it is not necessary to multiply authorities. It has been intimated that since the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, signing, as well as sealing, is necessary, 2 Blacks. Comm., supra; but the better opinion seems to be, that the statute has made no alteration in this respect, since it applies only to mere agreements and not to deeds. 1 Shepp. Touch. by Preston, 56, note 24; Hurlstone on Bonds, 8. "Signing," says Gresley, in his Equity Evidence, p. 121, in speaking of the execution of a deed, "is not ordinarily essential, but it is always as well to prove it as a regular part of the transaction. Besides, it assists the other parts of the proof of execution, for the circumstance that the party has written his name opposite to the seal, on an instrument bearing on its face a declaration that it was sealed by him, is prima facie evidence of sealing and delivery." The common law, therefore, remains unchanged, and signing was not essential to the validity of the bond declared on in this case. If the plaintiff can prove that Kizer, with the other defendants, sealed the bond, the proof will support the declaration, which is in the usual form. The Court erred in sustaining the demurrer.[8]

The judgment is reversed, with costs. Cause remanded.

TRINITY TERM, 1537. DYER, 19a.

An obligation was thus: "for the well and faithful payment of which I bind myself by these presents, dated, etc." and not said "sealed with my seal" nor "in witness whereof;" wherefore it was asked of the court if such an obligation be good, or not. And it seemed to SHELLEY and FITZHERBERT that the obligation is well enough, if a seal be put to the deed, etc.[9]

[8] In accord: Taunton v. Pepler, 6 Madd. 166 (1820); Cherry v. Heming, 4 Exch. 631 (1849). No doubt an instrument sealed and delivered without a signature would be regarded with doubt and suspicion.

[9] It is usual and desirable for the instrument to contain a testimonium clause, "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal," but by the great weight of authority it is not necessary. See Brook's New Cases, 83; Peters v. Field, Hetley, 75 (1630); Eames v. Preston, 20 Ill. 389 (1858); Wing v. Chase, 35 Me. 260 (1853); Osborn v. Kistler, 35 Ohio St. 99 (1878). A few states require it in certain cases. Bradley Salt Co. v. Norfolk Importing & Exporting Co., 95 Va. 461, 28 S. E. 567 (1897); Blackwell v. Hamilton, 47 Ala. 470 (1872). Some do not require it in the case of a common-law seal but do in the case of a pen scroll seal. Alt v. Stoker, 127 Mo. 466, 30 S. W. 132 (1895). And cf. Weeks v. Esler, 143 N. Y. 374, 38 N. E. 377 (1894).

MICHELL v. STOCKWITH AND ANDREWS.

(1588. Gouldsborough, 83.)

Thomas Michell brought debt upon an obligation against Stockwith and Andrews, and the jury found a special verdict, viz. that after the issue joyned, and before the nisi prius, the seal of Andrews was fallen off & si, &c.

WINDHAM. A case hath been adjudged here, that where a bond was delivered to the custos brevium to be kept, and the mise broke the seal, and the Court adjudged that the plaintiff should be at no prejudice thereby. And here insomuch that no fault was in the plaintiff, the Court awarded that he should recover, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Y. B., 1 HENRY VI, 4, pl. 14.

Note, that COTT said, that if I make and deliver a release to you bearing a certain date, and you make an obligation to me bearing date a week earlier, and you deliver the obligation to me after the release was delivered to you, etc., in an action of debt upon this obligation it is a good plea to say that I have given a release, and it is a good replication for me to say that you have delivered the obligation to me at a time since the delivery of the release. And this was so adjudged before CHIRN and HULL, etc.[10]

CHAMBERLAIN v. STAUNTON.

(In the Common Pleas, 1588. 1 Leon. 140.)

Chamberlain brought debt upon an obligation against Staunton, and upon non est factum, the jury found this special matter, that the defendant subscribed and sealed the said obligation, and cast it upon a certain table, and the plaintiff took it without any other delivery or any other thing amounting to a delivery. And the Court was clear of opinion, that upon that matter the jury had found against the plaintiff, and it is not like the case which was here lately adjudged, that the obligor subscribed and sealed the obligation, and cast it upon a table, saying these words, this will serve, the same was held to be a good delivery, for here is a circumstance, the speaking of these words, by which the will of the obligor appeareth, that it shall be his deed.[11]

[10] A deed is effective from the day of its delivery, not from the day of its date. Stone v. Bale, 3 Lev. 348 (1693); Y. B. 34 Lib. Ass. pl. 7; Goddard's Case, 2 Co. Rep. 4 b (1584).

That a deed need not be dated at all, see Kellway, 34 pl. 1 (13 Hen. VII).

"Delivery may be effected by words without acts, or by acts without words, or by both acts and words." Ruckman v. Ruckman, 32 N. J. Eq. 259, 261 (1880);

ANONYMOUS.

(1596. 2 Anderson, 41, No. XXVII.)

An instrument poll (unindented) was made in which J. S. covenanted with R. C., and in the very same instrument R. C. covenanted with J. S., and the covenants were both in express terms in the instrument. The said R. C. first delivered the instrument ensealed to the said J. S. as his deed, and afterwards the said J. S. delivered it as his deed ensealed by him to the said R. C. The question was whether this was the deed of J. S. or of R. C. or of both. It was adjudged by THE COURT that this was the deed of both the one and the other, and that he who had possession of it could maintain an action of covenant against the other, irrespective of whether he held by the first or the second delivery, for both parties are equally bound.[12]

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

The plaintiffs were owners of the ship Leonidas, and the defendant is the representative of the Victoria Insurance Company. The declaration alleged, in the usual form, that the plaintiffs caused their vessel to be insured by this company for the space of twelve months, from the 25th of April, 1861, to the 24th of April, 1862, on a policy valued at £1,000, upon a ship valued at £13,000, and the loss was alleged to have occurred by perils of the sea. The defendant denied the insurance as alleged.

It appeared on the trial that the plaintiffs employed Mr. Lascaridi, an insurance broker, to secure a policy on the Leonidas for £1,000.

Jordan v. Davis, 108 Ill. 336 (1884); Johnson v. Gerald, 169 Mass. 500, 48 N. E. 764 (1897); Thoroughgood's Case, 9 Co. Rep. 136 b (1612), words not necessary; Shelton's Case, Cro. Eliz. 7 (1582). Mere intention is insufficient. Bush v. Genther, 174 Pa. 154, 34 Atl. 520 (1896); Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 260, 71 N. W. 22 (1897).

The validity of a delivery of any formal document is determined by the same rules, whether it is a sealed instrument or not. See Sarasohn v. Kamaiky, 193 N. Y. 203, 86 N. E. 20 (1908), delivery of a certified copy, or counterpart, of a written contract.

Delivery of Incomplete Document.—It was often held that the filling of material blanks after delivery of the deed invalidated the whole. Powell v. Duff, 3 Camp. 181 (1812); Buller, N. P. 267; Cross v. State Bank, 5 Ark. 525 (1844); State to Use of Rosett v. Boring, 15 Ohio, 507 (1846). A new delivery after filling the blanks is effective. Hudson v. Revett, 5 Bing. 368 (1829). The doctrine of estoppel is often invoked to sustain such instruments in the hands of innocent holders for value. Butler v. U. S., 21 Wall. 272, 22 L. Ed. 614 (1874); White v. Duggan, 140 Mass. 18, 2 N. E. 110, 54 Am. Rep. 437 (1885); Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 617, 35 Pac. 328 (1893).

[12] Where a lease is to be executed by both parties, the delivery of the document, signed and sealed by one party, for the purpose of execution by the other, does not make it an operative instrument. Diebold Safe & Lock Co. v. Morse, 226 Mass. 342, 115 N. E. 431 (1917).

He called at the defendant's office and they agreed upon the issuance of such a policy at a definite premium. The Company gave credit to Lascaridi, charging him personally with the premium, and Lascaridi collected the premium from the plaintiffs. A policy in the usual form was drawn up in accordance with Lascaridi's instructions, duly signed and sealed, but was held by the company's clerks until the following month when Lascaridi was requested to make payment. He did not pay, and the policy remained with the company.

Several months later, the Leonidas was lost, and suit was brought for the insurance. The Lord Chief Justice directed a verdict for the defendant, his decision being later affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber. On appeal to the House of Lords, the Judges were summoned, the following attending: POLLOCK, C. B., PIGOTT, B., and BLACKBURN, WILLES, MELLOR, and SMITH, JJ. The following question was put to the Judges:

"Whether, on the facts stated in the special case, the Victoria Fire & Marine Insurance Company was, when the ship Leonidas was lost, liable as insurer to the plaintiffs on the policy, or alleged policy, in the pleadings mentioned?"

Mr. Justice BLACKBURN. I answer your Lordships' question in the affirmative. Two questions are involved in your Lordships' question. First, whether the policy before the 8th of June was so executed as to bind the defendant's company to the plaintiffs.[13] * * *

As to the other branch, I should wish to call your Lordships' attention to what I think are the real points in controversy. They are, I think, two; one of fact, the other of law.

The question of fact is, I think, this: Was the policy really in fact intended by both sides to be finally executed and binding from the time when the directors of the defendant's company affixed their seals to it, and left it in their office; or was it, in fact, intended that the assured or their brokers should exercise a subsequent discretion as to whether they would accept it or not.

If I thought that the parties did not in fact intend it to be then finally binding, I do not think there would be any magic in the law to make it binding contrary to their intention; but I submit to your Lordships that the statements in the case as to what is stated to be "always" the practice, and the statements there as to what was done in this particular case, shew that the intention of both parties was, that the policy, when drawn up by the company in conformity with the instructions in the advice slip sent in by the broker, should be finally binding as soon as executed by the officers of the company. It was not intended by either side that anything more should be done, but that the policy from that time should be binding, and should lie in the company's office as the property of the assured till sent for by them, and then be handed over to their messenger.

It seems that some of the Judges take a different view of the fact, and think it really was intended that the policy should not be finally binding till something more was done by the assured. Your Lordships will decide which is the true view of the facts.

Then, assuming that the intention really was that the policy should be binding as soon as executed, and should be kept by the company as a baillee for the assured, the question of law arises, whether the policy could in law be operative until the company parted with the physical possession of the deed.

I can, on this part of the case, do little more than state to your Lordships my opinion, that no particular technical form of words or acts is necessary to render an instrument the deed of the party sealing it. The mere affixing the seal does not render it a deed; but as soon as there are acts or words sufficient to shew that it is intended by the party to be executed as his deed presently binding on him, it is sufficient. The most apt and expressive mode of indicating such an intention is to hand it over, saying: "I deliver this as my deed;" but any other words or acts that sufficiently shew that it was intended to be finally executed will do as well. And it is clear on the authorities, as well as the reason of the thing, that the deed is binding on the obligor before it comes into the custody of the obligee, nay, before he even knows of it; though, of course, if he has not previously assented to the making of the deed, the obligee may refuse it. In Butler and Baker's Case (3 Co. Rep. 26), it is said: "If A. make an obligation to B., and deliver it to C. to the use of B., this is the deed of A. presently; but if C. offers it to B., there B. may refuse it in pais, and thereby the obligation will lose its force." [14] I cannot perceive how it can be said that the delivery of the policy to the clerks of the defendant, to keep till the assured sent for it, and then to hand it to their messenger, was not a delivery to the defendant to the use [14] Delivery in Escrow.—Delivery can be made to a third person to be held in escrow until the fulfillment of some condition, and the fact that such delivery was conditional may be proved by parol evidence. See Pym v. Campbell, 6 El. & Bl. 370 (1856). By the weight of authority a delivery directly to the other party to the deed or contract makes the document operative at once, and parol evidence is not admitted to show that the delivery was conditional and intended as a delivery in escrow. This rule is disapproved by Wigmore, Evidence, § 2404 et seq. Parol evidence that such a delivery was conditional was allowed in an action on a sealed contract in Blewitt v. Boorum, 142 N. Y. 357, 37 N. E. 119, 40 Am. St. Rep. 600 (1894). See Anson on Contracts (Corbin's Ed. 1919) § 346, and notes; Conditions in the Law of Contract, 28 Yale L. Jour. 764–768 (1919).

After delivery in escrow, the grantor has no power of revocation. "A subsequent change of intention, if any were shown, could not affect the delivery thus completed." Moore v. Downing, 289 Ill. 612, 124 N. E. 557 (1919).

See, also, Braman v. Bingham, 26 N. Y. 483 (1863); Jones v. Jones, 101 Me. 447, 64 Atl. 815, 115 Am. St. Rep. 328 (1903), conditional delivery of promissory note.

of the assured. There is neither authority nor principle for qualifying the statement in Butler and Baker's Case, by saying that C. must not be a servant of A., though, of course, that is very material in determining the question whether it was "delivered to C. to B.'s use," which I consider it to be, in other words, whether it was shewn that it was intended to be finally executed as binding the obligor at once, and to be thenceforth the property of B. In the present case, the assured could not have refused the deed in pais, for it was drawn up in strict pursuance of the authority given by them in the slip set out in the case; and I think a prior authority is at least as good as a subsequent assent. That question, however, does not arise, as they did not refuse it in pais.

No authority, I think, has been cited which supports the position that there is a technical necessity for some one who is agent of the assured taking corporal possession of a policy under seal before it can be binding, though intended by both parties to be so. I think it would be very inconvenient, and would work great injustice, if such were the law. I must leave it to your Lordships to determine whether it is so or not.

The House decided in harmony with Blackburn's opinion. Judgment reversed; and judgment given for the plaintiffs.[15]

[15] Of course delivery of the policy might not be necessary to the valid acceptance of the insured's application and offer for insurance. In such case the undelivered policy would not itself be an operative fact, but there would be a parol agreement without it. Weber v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 284 Ill. 326, 120 N. E. 291 (1918); Cherokee Life Ins. Co. v. Brannum, 203 Ala. 145, 82 South. 175 (1919).

The mailing of the policy to the company's own agent operates as delivery, if the agreement is perfect and no act other than physical transfer of the document is to be done by the agent. Williams v. Philadelphia Life Ins. Co., 105 S. C. 305, 89 S. E. 675 (1916). But otherwise if the agent is not to deliver it until after a health investigation. Bowen v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 178 Mich. 63, 144 N. W. 543, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 587 (1913).

Acceptance by Grantee.—It has often been held in America that delivery is not complete until an expression of assent, by the grantee or his representative. Meigs v. Dexter, 172 Mass. 217, 52 N. E. 75 (1898); Bowen v. Prudential Ins. Co., of America, 178 Mich. 63, 144 N. W. 543, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 587 (1913); Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 264 (1862); Gorham's Adm'r v. Supp. 1132 (1913); Anon, 2 Rolle Rep. 238 (1622). UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. RIEFLER et al.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1915. 239 U. S. 17, 36 Sup. Ct. 12, 60 L. Ed. 121.)

On a certificate from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit presenting questions as to whether a certain instrument was a completed contract of indemnity or guaranty. Answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts certified are simple. One Dooling, being required to give an official bond, applied in Springfield, Illinois, to an agent of the plaintiff in error, a bonding company having its home office in Baltimore, Maryland, was informed that the company would become his surety only on condition that he furnish indemnity, and was handed a printed form of indemnity bond. The defendants in error, at Dooling's request, signed and sealed this bond for the purposes therein expressed, and authorized Dooling to deliver it to the company through its Springfield agent, which Dooling did. The agent, who is not shown to have had authority to execute bonds, forwarded it for acceptance. The company, relying upon it, became surety for Dooling. One of the recitals of the bond was that the company "has become or is about to become surety, at the request of the said Frank E. Dooling, on a certain bond in the sum of Five Thousand Two Hundred Dollars, wherein Frank E. Dooling is principal, as Recorder of Springfield District Court No. 25, Court of Honor, located at Springfield, Illinois, a copy of which bond is hereto attached No. 52012-5, which bond is made a part hereof." The condition was that Dooling should keep the company indemnified for all loss by reason of its suretyship. A copy of the company's bond was not attached and at the date of the indemnity bond had not been executed. Dooling was not a party to the indemnity bond. The defendants in error received no pecuniary consideration for their act and were not notified of the acceptance of their bond or of the execution of the other by the company. The questions propounded are: "(1) Was the instrument which was signed by Riefler and Hall, and relied on by the company, a completed contract of indemnity or guaranty? (2) Or was it merely an offer to become indemnitors or guarantors, requiring notice of acceptance by the company, in accordance with Davis v. Wells, F. & Co., 104 U. S. 159, 26 L. Ed. 686, and Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Richards, 115 U. S. 524, 29 L. Ed. 480, 6 Sup. Ct. 173? (3) And, if in substance the instrument was merely an offer, does the fact that it was in the form of a bond under seal take it out of the rule of those authorities?"

If the bond in suit had been delivered directly to the company and had been pronounced satisfactory there would have been no need to notify Riefler and Hall of the company's subsequently executing the Dooling bond. Riefler and Hall assumed an obligation in present words to indemnify the company against an exactly identified suretyship that the company had gone or was about to go into, as they stated. The company was about to go into it and went into it. If Riefler and Hall had made only a parol offer in the same terms, the company, by becoming surety, would have furnished the consideration that would have converted the ofter into a contract; but notice is held necessary in Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Richards. If it had been a covenant, the company's act would have satisfied the condition upon which the covenant applied. O'Brien v. Boland, 166 Mass. 481, 483, 44 N. E. 602. As it was a bond, the company's entering into its undertaking in like manner furnished the subject-matter to which the obligation by its terms applied. In the case of either covenant or bond there was no need for notice that an event had happened that the defendants' contract contemplated as sure to happen, if it had not already come to pass.

The only ground for hesitation is that seemingly the bond in suit might have been rejected by the company as unsatisfactory, and that therefore it may be argued that Riefler and Hall were entitled to notice that it had been accepted. But we are of opinion that, in the circumstances of this case, it is reasonable to understand that they took the risk. They are chargeable with notice that by their act their bond had come to the hands of the company. The bond on its face contemplated that the company would accept it and act upon it at once, and disclosed the precise extent of the obligation assumed. It seems to us that when such a bond, carrying, as a specialty does, its complete obligation with the paper, is put by the obligors into the hands of the obligee, and in fact is accepted by it, notice is not necessary that a condition subsequent to the delivery, by which the obligee might have made it ineffectual, has not been fulfilled. The contract is complete without the notice (Butler's Case, 3 Coke, 25, 26b; Xenos v. Wickham, L. R. 2 H. L. 296; Pollock, Contr. [8th Ed.] 7, 8), and we see no commercial reason why the principles ordinarily governing contracts under seal should not be applied (Bird v. Washburn, 10 Pick. [Mass.] 223). In Davis v. Wells, F. & Co. the guaranty was an open, continuing one up to $10,000, but it was under seal, and was held binding, although additional reasons were advanced.

We answer the first question: Yes.

BELLEWE, 111.

WADHAM. In debt on contract the plaintiff must show in his count for what cause the defendant became his debtor. Otherwise in debt on obligation, for the obligation is contract in itself.[16]

ALLER v. ALLER.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1878. 40 N. J. Law, 446.)

The action was brought on the following instrument, viz.: "One day after date, I promise to pay my daughter, Angeline H. Aller, the sum of three hundred and twelve dollars and sixty-one cents, for value received, with lawful interest from date, without defalcation or discount, as witness my hand and seal this fourth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three. $312.61. This note is given in lieu of one-half of the balance due the estate of Mary A. Aller, deceased, for a note given for one thousand dollars to said deceased by me. Peter H. Aller. [L. S.] Witnesses present, John J. Smith, John F. Grandin."

Both subscribing witnesses were examined at the trial, and it appeared that there was a note for $1000, dated May 1st, 1858, given by said Peter H. Aller to Mary Ann Aller, upon which there were endorsements of payments—April 1st, 1863, $50; April 1st, 1866, $46; April 1st, 1867, $278.78.

Mary Ann Aller, the wife, died, and on the day after her burial, Peter H. Aller told his daughter, the plaintiff, to get the note, which he said was among her mother's papers. She brought it, read the note; he said there was more money endorsed on it than he thought; requested the witness John F. Grandin to add up the endorsements and subtract them from the principal, to divide the balance by two, and draw a note to each of her daughters, Leonora and Angeline, for one-half. After they were drawn by the witness, Peter H. Aller said: "Now here, girls, is a nice present for you," and gave them the notes.

"Specialties—Those formal common-law contracts under seal—were enforced in the absence of an allegation of consideration, not because it was conclusively presumed that they were founded on a consideration, but because consideration was not an essential element to such contracts. Contracts under seal were enforceable at common law because of the formality of their execution, and such contracts were fully recognized and enforced long before the doctrine of consideration appeared in the law." Lacey v. Hutchinson, 5 Ga. App. 865, 64 S. E. 105 (1909), holding, however, that the rule is not applicable to a sealed instrument of a sort unknown to early common law.

Angeline was directed to put the old note back among her mother's papers. Grandin was afterwards appointed administrator of Mary A. Aller, and as such, he says, he destroyed the old note. * * *

The verdict was for the plaintiff, and a rule to show cause was allowed at the Circuit.

The opinion of the court was delivered by

SCUDDER, J.[17] * * * But it is said that the act of April 6th, 1875, (Revision 1877, p. 387, § 52,) opens it to the defence of want of sufficient consideration, as if it were a simple contract, and, that being shown, the contract becomes inoperative.

The statute reads—"that in every action upon a sealed instrument, or where a set-off is founded on a sealed instrument, the seal thereof shall be only presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration, which may be rebutted, as if such instrument was not sealed," &c.

Suppose the presumption that the seal carries with it, that there is a sufficient consideration, is rebutted, and overcome by evidence showing there was no such consideration, the question still remains, whether an instrument under seal, without sufficient consideration, is not a good promise, and enforceable at law. It is manifest that here the parties intended and understood that there should be no consideration. The old man said: "Now here, girls, is a nice present for each of you," and so it was received by them. The mischief which the above-quoted law was designed to remedy, was that where the parties intended there should be a consideration, they were prevented by the common law from showing none, if the contract was under seal. But it would be going too far to say that the statute was intended to abrogate all voluntary contracts, and to abolish all distinction between specialties and simple contracts.

It will not do to hold that every conveyance of land, or of chattels, is void by showing that no sufficient consideration passed when creditors are not affected. Nor can it be shown by authority that an executory contract, entered into intentionally and deliberately, and attested in solemn form by a seal, cannot be enforced. Both by the civil and the common law, persons were guarded against haste and imprudence in entering into voluntary agreements. The distinction between "nudum pactum" and "pactum vestitum," by the civil law, was in the formality of execution and not in the fact that in one case there was a consideration, and in the other none, though the former term, as adopted in the common law, has the signification of a contract without consideration. The latter was enforced without reference to the consideration, because of the formality of its ratification. 1 Parsons on Cont. (6th Ed.) *427.

The opinion of Justice Wilmot, in Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr. 1663, is instructive on this point.

The early case of Sharington v. Strotton, Plow. 308, gives the same cause for the adoption of the sealing and delivery of a deed. It says, among other things, "because words are oftentimes spoken by men unadvisedly and without deliberation, the law has provided that a contract by words shall not bind without consideration. And the reason is, because it is by words which pass from men lightly and inconsiderately, but where the agreement is by deed there is more time for deliberation, &c. So that there is great deliberation used in the making of deeds, for which reason they are received as a lien final to the party, and are adjudged to bind the party without examining upon what cause or consideration they were made. And therefore in the case put in 17 Ed. IV, if I by deed promise to give you £20 to make your sale de novo, here you shall have an action of debt upon the deed, and the consideration is not examinable, for in the deed there is sufficient consideration, viz., the will of the party that made the deed." It would seem by this old law, that in case of a deed the saying might be applied, stat pro ratione voluntas.

In Smith on Contracts, the learned author, after stating the strictness of the rules of law, that there must be a consideration to support a simple contract to guard persons against the consequences of their own imprudence, says: "The law does not absolutely prohibit them from contracting a gratuitous obligation, for they may, if they will, do so by deed."

This subject of the derivation of terms and formalities from the civil law, and of the rule adopted in the common law, is fully described in Fonb. Eq. 335, note a. The author concludes by saying: "If, however, an agreement be evidenced, by bond or other instrument, under seal, it would certainly be seriously mischievous to allow its consideration to be disputed, the common law not having pointed out any other means by which an agreement can be more solemnly authenticated. Every deed, therefore, in itself imports a consideration, though it be only the will of the maker, and therefore shall never be said to be nudum pactum." See, also, 1 Chitty on Cont. (11th Ed.) 6; Morly v. Boothby, 3 Bing. 107; Rann v. Hughes, 7 T. R. 350, note a.

These statements of the law have been thus particularly given in the words of others, because the significance of writings under seal, and their importance in our common-law system, seem in danger of being overlooked in some of our later legislation. If a party has fully and absolutely expressed his intention in a writing sealed and delivered, with the most solemn sanction known to our law, what should prevent its execution where there is no fraud or illegality? But because deeds have been used to cover fraud and illegality in the consideration, and just defences have been often shut out by the conclusive character of the formality of sealing, we have enacted in our state the two recent statutes above quoted. The one allows fraud in the consideration of instruments under seal to be set up as defence, the other takes away the conclusive evidence of a sufficient consideration heretofore accorded to a sealed writing, and makes it only presumptive evidence. This does not reach the case of a voluntary agreement, where there was no consideration, and none intended by the parties. The statute establishes a new rule of evidence, by which the consideration of sealed instruments may be shown, but does not take from them the effect of establishing a contract expressing the intention of the parties, made with the most solemn authentication, which is not shown to be fraudulent or illegal. It could not have been in the mind of the legislature to make it impossible for parties to enter into such promises; and without a clear expression of the legislative will, not only as to the admissibility, but the effect of such evidence, such construction should not be given to this law. Even if it should be held that a consideration is required to uphold a deed, yet it might still be implied where its purpose is not within the mischief which the statute was intended to remedy. It was certainly not the intention of the legislature to abolish all distinction between simple contracts and specialties, for in the last clause of the section they say that all instruments executed with a scroll, or other device by way of scroll, shall be deemed sealed instruments. It is evident that they were to be continued with their former legal effect, except so far as they might be controlled by evidence affecting their intended consideration. * * *

The rule for a new trial should be discharged.[18]

PATTERSON v. CHAPMAN et al.

Two actions by Etta I. Patterson against M. C. Chapman and others, executors of the estate of Wm. E. Dargie, deceased. Judgments in each case for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Judgments reversed.

PER CURIAM. In these two appeals from judgments entered in favor of the defendants the plaintiff attacks the rulings of the court sustaining general demurrers to the complaints without leave to amend. The question involved in each case is the same.

It appears from the complaints that William E. Dargie made, executed and delivered to plaintiff an instrument in writing, a copy of which as set out therein is as follows:

"Oakland, Jan. 16—08.

"For value received I hereby instruct the administrator of my estate to pay to Miss Etta Patterson, formerly of Edgewood, Cal., the [18] By a later statute (P. L. 1900, p. 366) it was further provided that in actions upon sealed instruments the defendant may plead want or failure of consideration, the same as if the instrument were not sealed. sum of fifty thousand dollars, within one year from the date of my death—or two years at the least. Interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum is to be paid on said sum, quarterly, till said amount is paid in full. Said fifty thousand dollars may be paid in real estate or stocks and bonds, which I may own at the time of my death, if cash cannot be paid without sacrificing my estate, but said stocks, bonds or real estate, must be the full value of cash at the date of delivery. I desire this request and order to be carried out promptly and without question of any kind. W. E. Dargie."

Dargie died testate on February 10, 1911, and thereafter plaintiff duly presented her claim based upon said instrument to the executors of his estate, by whom it was rejected.

Some confusion of thought may arise if there is not kept constantly in mind the difference between the question of the sufficiency of the complaint as a pleading and the question of the sufficiency of the instrument as evidence of a valid contract or obligation for the payment of money. At common law a seal was necessary in order to create the presumption that an executory contract was founded upon a valuable consideration, and therefore, if it was not under seal, the rule of pleading was that the complaint or declaration must allege that the contract was executed for a valuable consideration. Our Civil Code declares that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Section 1614. Hence it follows that in this state, in an action upon an unsealed written instrument as evidence of an obligation to pay money, the common-law rule applicable to sealed instruments prevails and it is not necessary to make the additional allegation that it was made for a valuable consideration. Henke v. Eureka Endowment Ass'n, 100 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 1089; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965. Hence the complaints are not rendered bad because of the failure to make such allegation.

The sole question presented for determination is whether or not the writing upon which plaintiff relies is in form and character testamentary as held by the trial court, or as claimed by appellant it is a contract by virtue of the execution and delivery of which Dargie in his lifetime created an obligation to be discharged after his death by his executors.

If the instrument created a debitum in præsenti, an obligation existing in the lifetime of the obligor, the fact that it was not to be discharged until after Dargie's death renders it none the less enforceable as a demand against his estate. 8 Cyc. 1007. "Where a testator has not, in a paper payable post mortem, recognized himself either by intendment, or language, as under legal indebtedness to the party in whose favor it is made, such instrument is without consideration, purely voluntary, and testamentary in its character." Kirkpatrick v. Pyle, 6 Houst. (Del.) 569. Any memorandum in writing, however, regardless of its form, and whether payable in money or specific property, whereby a debt is acknowledged by one as owing to another to whom the memorandum is delivered is sufficient to create such obligation. "Any words which prove a man to be a debtor will charge him with the payment of the money." Cover v. Stem, 67 Md. 449, 10 Atl. 231, 1 Am. St. Rep. 406. Hence, conceding the document in question is not a negotiable instrument, draft, check, or bill of exchange, as claimed by respondent, the want of such character is immaterial if terms are employed therein which at the time of its execution created a debitum in præsenti. Banker v. Coons, 40 App. Div. 572, 58 N. Y. Supp. 47; Robbins v. Robbins' Estate, 175 Mo. App. 609, 158 S. W. 400; Kirkpatrick v. Pyle, supra.

It is true the instrument contains no express promise to pay, but where the existence of an indebtedness based upon consideration is acknowledged the law implies a promise to pay it (Ward v. Bush, 59 N. J. Eq. 144, 45 Atl. 534), and the fact that payment is postponed until after the death of the party so acknowledging it is immaterial (Robbins v. Robbins' Estate, supra; Hegeman v. Moon, 131 N. Y. 462, 30 N. E. 487).

The instrument being signed by Dargie, every statement therein must be considered as his declaration and given effect accordingly. In the absence of any defense on the ground of fraud, mistake, or want of consideration, each declaration therein made, or necessarily implied from its language, must be given the full effect that the meaning carries. The instrument, therefore, contains a declaration by Dargie that in his lifetime, and before or at the time of its execution, he had received from the plaintiff something of value, a value which he considered equal to $50,000, and that for that consideration his executors are ordered and directed to pay to the plaintiff that sum in the manner and at the time specified. This precludes the idea of a gift to her. Its meaning is that he is ordering the payment to be made to her as a return for the value which he had received from her. This makes it a payment or recompense, not a gift. Furthermore, as it was an admission by him that in his lifetime he had received from her that value, not as a gift or as payment of any obligation to him, this fact alone, without any order to his executors to pay, would, in law, raise an implied promise by him to pay her for the benefit so received, and would be a sufficient foundation for a claim against the estate for such value. Cover v. Stem, supra. The only effect of the order, it having been accepted by her, is to merge the implied contract, and to modify it, so that she is thereby obliged to accept payment at the time and in the manner therein provided.

An examination of the authorities cited by respondent, chief among which is that of Cover v. Stem, supra, discloses that the instruments under consideration and constituting the subjects of the actions contained no promise and no words which by intendment or otherwise could be construed as acknowledging an indebtedness. Thus, in Cover v. Stem, supra, Moore v. Stephens, 97 Ind. 271, Pena v. New Orleans, 13 La. Ann. 86, 71 Am. Dec. 506, and other like cases, it was held that in the absence of a promise, and without recital or acknowledgment of consideration, an instrument containing a mere direction to the executors to pay the sum mentioned was testamentary in character. And to like effect are the cases in this state, namely, Wisler v. Tomb, 169 Cal. 382, 146 Pac. 876, and Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 655, 50 Pac. 757, both of which involved notes shown to have been given without consideration, and in the first of which such fact appeared from the complaint. On the other hand, in the cases of Banker v. Coons, supra, Robbins v. Robbins' Estate, supra, Kirkpatrick v. Pyle, supra, Hatch v. Gillette, 8 App. Div. 605, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1016, and Ward v. Bush, supra, where the instruments were executed under seal, but in addition to the fact presumed therefrom, as in the case at bar, contained the words, "For value received," or those of like import, it was held they created a debitum in præsenti, which obligation being established, the law implied a promise to pay it.

The judgments are reversed.[19]

CHAPTER IV

OPERATION OF CONTRACT AND OF FACTS SUBSEQUENT TO ACCEPTANCE[1]

(And Herein of the Interpretation and Construction of Contracts, and the Effect of Breach)

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

1. What is a condition? A condition is an operative fact, the occurrence of which will create some new legal relation (or extinguish an existing legal relation). It is generally not a promise, although the performance of an act promised is often a condition. A not uncommon use of the word is to denote almost any term or provision in a contract (i. e., a group of words). This use should be avoided. A group of words may determine that some fact shall operate as a condition, but the group of words are not themselves the condition.

2. When will a fact operate as a condition? It will so operate when the parties to a contract agree that it shall and express this agreement either by words or by conduct from which it may reasonably be inferred (or implied). It will likewise so operate when the court believes that justice requires it, even though the parties neither had nor expressed any intention regarding it.[2] Conditions may therefore be classified as express, implied, and constructive.

3. What are conditions precedent and subsequent? A condition may be regarded with reference to the legal relations that it extinguishes or those that it helps to create. As to the former, it is subsequent; as to the latter, it is precedent.[3] The particular legal relation

[1] See Anson on Contract (Corbin's Ed.) chapter XIII.

[2] "You can always imply a condition in a contract. But why do you imply it? It is because of some belief as to the practice of the community or of a class, or because of some opinion as to policy, or, in short, because of some attitude of yours upon a matter not capable of exact quantitative measurement, and therefore not capable of founding exact logical conclusions." Justice O. W. Holmes, "The Path of the Law, 10 Harv. L. Rev. 466. See, also, Leonard v. Dyer, 26 Conn. 172, 178, 68 Am. Dec. 382 (1857); Bankes, L. J., in Grove v. Webb, 114 L. T. 1082, 1089 (1916).

[3] In the sense as herein defined, a condition is never "concurrent." It precedes the legal relation that it creates, and it is subsequent to the relation that it extinguishes. But two mutual promises may require concurrent performances. In such cases a tender of performance by either one may be a condition precedent to an instant and enforceable duty in the other.

with respect to which a condition is to be judged varies with the case, but it is usually the legal duty of instant performance for breach of which an action lies. When the creation of a particular legal duty requires the existence of four facts, all four are conditions precedent; if three of them already exist, the fourth is a condition precedent. The term "conditional duty" is commonly used to indicate that three (or some) of the necessary facts exist or have occurred and that the enforceable duty awaits only the occurrence of the fourth (or others).

4. Are offer, acceptance, consideration, delivery, legality of object, and the like, conditions? They might be so called, because in their absence no new contractual relations will exist; but it is not customary to describe them as conditions, and it is convenient to restrict the term condition to apply to an operative fact subsequent to acceptance and prior to discharge. The legal relations created by acceptance are called "contract" or primary obligation (primary relations). The question of conditions usually involves an inquiry as to breach of contract and the existence of new legal relations called secondary obligations.

5. What is a dependent promise? It is one that creates no instant duty, but instead a duty conditional upon the performance (or tender thereof) by the promisee of a return promise made by him. An independent promise is one that is not thus conditional.

6. What sorts of facts customarily operate as conditions? They are many, and the question must be answered by a study of the cases. They may be classified according to a number of different principles, each having a certain usefulness and convenience.

I. Express; implied; constructive. (See 2, supra.)

II. Precedent; subsequent. (See 3, supra.)

III. (a) Acts or events not in themselves the consideration for the promise sued on. These are usually express; e. g., architect's certificate.

(b) Facts constituting the expected equivalent, being generally acts of the promisee (he sometimes having promised to perform them and sometimes not). These are more often not express.

IV. (a) Acts or events that are certain to occur at a definite time; e. g., the arrival of a future date.

(b) Those certain to occur, but at an uncertain time; e. g., the death of X.

(c) Those not certain to occur at all; e. g., the arrival of a ship, or the construction of a building.

V. (a) Conditions not within the volitional control of any person; e. g., a fair wind, as in Constable v. Clobery.

(b) Those within the volitional control of a third person; e. g., architect's certificate, or the king's return to London.

(c) Those within the volitional control of the promisor. See Scott v. Moragues Lumber Co. (1918) 202 Ala. 312, 80 South. 394, infra, 492.

(d) Those within the volitional control of the promisee; e. g., ordinary option contracts.

VI. By the Louisiana Code, conditions precedent and subsequent are called suspensive and resolutory, each of these being again subdivided into casual and potestative. See discussion and application of these code provisions in New Orleans v. Texas & Pac. R. Co. (1897) 171 U. S. 312, 332, 18 Sup. Ct. 875, 43 L. Ed. 178.

No doubt still other classifications are useful, and no classification is indispensable. The cases present facts in many combinations and they are not easily classified. In some degree, the cases herein are arranged according to I and II, supra; but the chief purpose underlying the arrangement was to make the cases most readily teachable.

SECTION 1.—EXPRESS CONDITIONS PRECEDENT [4]

(Conditions Distinguished from Promises and Covenants, and Express Conditions Illustrated)

CONSTABLE v. CLOBERY.

(In the King's Bench, 1626. Latch, 49.)

Action of covenant. The plaintiff alleged that he had hired his ship to the defendant and that by charter party indented he had covenanted with the defendant and one A. that the ship should sail with the next wind on a voyage to Cadiz. The defendant and A. jointly and severally covenanted with the plaintiff that if the ship went the intended voyage and returned to the Downs the plaintiff should receive a certain sum as freight, but if it should go on to Amsterdam they would pay to the plaintiff so much more. The plaintiff further alleged that the ship went to Cadiz and returned to the Downs, and that the defendant had not paid the sum agreed upon for freight, primage, etc. The defendant pleaded a special plea and denied particularly that the ship had sailed with the next wind.

[4] Several cases are here printed merely as illustrations of different sorts of Express Conditions. There is no distinct boundary line between express and implied conditions, since the intention of men is expressed in various ways, with varying degrees of clearness and accuracy. In general, the effort of the courts is to interpret the words and other conduct of the parties, so as to arrive at their intention; so that, in dealing with Implied Conditions later, we shall constantly deal also with "express" conditions as well.

The plaintiff demurred to this plea, raising the question whether it set up a good defense. STONE argued that it did not, because the substance of the covenant is that the ship should sail and not that it should sail with the next wind, inasmuch as the wind may change and vary with the passing hour. And he said that this was proved by the covenant itself, which is to give so much as freight, that is to say, for going the voyage, and not for sailing with the next wind (citing Ughtred's Case, 7 Co. Rep. 9). THE COURT held that the plea was bad. But JONES, J., said that if the defendant had covenanted that if the ship should sail for Cadiz with the next wind he would pay the agreed sum, then the plaintiff ought to allege that he had sailed with the next wind. DODERIDGE, J., gave as his reason that the wind is uncertain, and therefore is not the substance of the covenant.[5]

ANDERSON et al. v. ODD FELLOWS' HALL OF JERSEY CITY.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1914. 86 N. J. Law, 271, 90 Atl. 1017.)

Action by John B. Anderson and others against the Odd Fellows' Hall of Jersey City. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

BERGEN, J.[6] This action was instituted to recover the value of extra work and material furnished by the plaintiffs, in excess of what a contract between the plaintiffs and defendant for the construction of a building required. The plaintiffs had judgment in the district court for $297, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, where the judgment below was reversed, and a judgment of nonsuit ordered entered in the district court for two reasons, the first being that a covenant contained in the contract, requiring arbitration in certain matters, was a condition precedent, and that without its performance the plaintiffs could not recover.

At the close of the testimony the defendant admitted that as to $227 of plaintiffs' claim written orders required by the contract had been produced, and to that extent the claim was not disputed on that ground, but insisted that, as some of the items were disputed, arbitration as to all was a condition precedent, and this the Supreme Court sustained. To affirm this judgment will sustain a nonsuit where a part of the plaintiffs' claim is not in any wise subject to the arbitration agreement, even if it should be a condition precedent, because not disputed. But, in our opinion, the covenant for arbitration contained in this contract is not a condition precedent to an action for the recovery of the extra work sued for.

[5] Not all of the report is here translated. The case is also reported in Palmer, 397, and Popham, 161.

See, also, Shadforth v. Higgin, 3 Camp. 385 (1813), and Ollive v. Booker, 1 Ex. 416 (1847), post, pp. 692, 693.

[6] A condition precedent is an operative fact that must precede the existence of an enforceable right. Part of the opinion not dealing with the distinction between a condition and a covenant is omitted.

The contract on this subject provides that: "No alteration shall be made in the work except upon written order of the committee; the amount to be paid by the owner, or allowed by the contractors by virtue of such alterations, to be stated in said order. Should the owner and the contractors not agree as to amount to be paid or allowed, the work shall go on under the order required above, and in case of failure to agree the determination of said amount shall be referred to arbitration as provided for in article XII of this contract."

Article XII provides that: "In case the owner and contractors fail to agree in relation to matters of payment, allowance, or loss, referred to in articles III or VII of this contract, or should either of them dissent from the decision of the committee referred to in article VII, * * * the matter shall be referred to a board of arbitration, to consist of one person selected by the owner and one person selected by the contractors, these two to select a third. The decision of any two of this board shall be final and binding on both parties hereto."

The condition to arbitrate, as expressed in this contract, is not, by its terms, made a condition precedent to an action to recover for extra work.[7] It is nothing more than an agreement to arbitrate disputes regarding the amount to be allowed for extra work ordered and performed, in cases where the parties cannot agree, revocable at any time before it is fully executed and an award made, and the bringing of a suit amounts to a revocation. Reed v. Washington Ins. Co., 138 Mass. 572.

In the case of Wolff v. Ins. Co., 50 N. J. Law, 453, 14 Atl. 561, the agreement contained a stipulation that no action should be maintained until after an award be obtained fixing the amount of the claim, as provided by the agreement to arbitrate. This was held to be a condition precedent, but Chief Justice Beasley, who delivered the opinion of the court, distinguished such condition from a case where the agreement merely declares that, if the parties shall disagree as to the amount, such difference shall be arbitrated, which is the situation in the present case, for there is here no contract that the amount shall not be recoverable by suit until after arbitration, or the recovery limited to a sum to be fixed by arbitrators, or that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to a right of action, and therefore the arbitration covenant in this contract is not a condition precedent. Birmingham Fire Ins. Co. v. Pulver, 126 Ill. 329, 18 N. E. 804, 9 Am. St. Rep. 598. This question was considered in Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708, where the condition was similar to that in this case, there being "no provision whatever postponing the right to sue until after an award," and it was there held that the agreement to arbitrate was not a condition precedent, and the court distinguished that case from Hamilton v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419, where the condition was that no suit should be sustained until after an award, in which case the obtaining of an award was held to be a condition precedent. To the same effect is Mutual Ins. Co. v. Alvord, 61 Fed. 752, 9 C. C. A. 623.

The weight of authority favors the rule that, where the contract provides for submission to arbitration of matters of dispute arising under it, such agreement is a condition precedent, where it is provided that an action can only be brought for a sum to be fixed by arbitrators, or that no action shall be brought until there has been an arbitration, or that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to a right of action, but, where no such covenants are present, and there is simply a covenant to pay, and another covenant to arbitrate, they are distinct and collateral, and the covenant to arbitrate [the arbitration and award] is not in such case a condition precedent. The covenant to arbitrate in the present case being distinct and collateral, and the right of action not having been made dependent upon the result of arbitration, it is not a condition precedent, and the judgment of the Supreme Court based upon this ground cannot be sustained. * * *

Reversed, and new trial granted.[8]

[8] Cases holding that a term of the contract creates a condition, but is not a promise, and creates no duty, are Home Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 40 R. I. 367, 100 Atl. 1010, L. R. A. 1917F, 375 (1917); Coykendall v. Blackmer, 161 App. Div. 11, 146 N. Y. Supp. 631 (1914).

For cases holding that the particular proviso is promissory, and creates a duty, and not a mere condition, see St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Upton, 2 N. D. 229, 50 N. W. 702 (1891); Boston Safe-Deposit & Trust Co. v. Thomas, 59 Kan. 470, 53 Pac. 472 (1898). Some cases indicate a great readiness to find a promise by mere inference or implication. Dupont De Nemours Powder Co. v. Schlottman, 218 Fed. 353, 134 C. C. A. 161 (1914); Patterson v. Meyerhofer, 204 N. Y. 96, 97 N. E. 472 (1912). Cf. Clark v. Hovey, 217 Mass. 485, 105 N. E. 222 (1914).

In Green County, Ky., v. Quinlan, 211 U. S. 582, 29 Sup. Ct. 162, 53 L. Ed. 335 (1908), a county issued bonds to assist in construction of a railroad, "upon condition" that the railroad be constructed through Green county. It was held that "that which is called a condition is really but a covenant or agreement, to be performed independently of the counter obligation with which it is associated." This holding was largely due to the fact that the money was to be used in the construction and not afterwards.

A representation of fact made in the formal document may be such that its truth is a condition. If the statement is "warranted" to be true, it will often be held to be a promise, and its truth to be a condition. See Yorkshire Ins. Co. v. Campbell, [1917] A. C. 218; Harrison v. Knowles, [1918] 1 K. B. 608. Cf. Globe Mut. Life Ins. Ass'n v. Wagner, 188 Ill. 133, 58 N. E. 970, 52 L. R. A. 649, 80 Am. St. Rep. 169 (1900); Rathman v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 186 Mich. 115, 152 N. W. 983, L. R. A. 1915E, 980, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 459 (1915). See Ollive v. Booker, post, 693.

production of these. He argues that the policy is to be void only for the failure to do both, and that no penalty attaches for the failure to perform one of the conditions. What is meant by the expression "to keep and produce?" The word "keep" is a general term which is variously applied, and is often used in more than one sense in the same instrument or writing. It may mean to make or enter or to retain and preserve. It is plain that the meaning of the words "keep a set of books," as used in the second condition of the warranty, is that the insured shall make and enter in books a record of the business transacted by him. As there used, the words have no reference to the preservation and safety of the books when they are made.

In the third paragraph of the warranty the word has a definite signification. There it means to hold, care for, or preserve, which is the primary meaning of the word. It implies that the books when made and the inventories when taken shall be preserved as against destruction or loss, and to that end it is provided that they shall be placed or kept securely locked in a fireproof safe at night and when the store is not open for business, or, in the event that this is not done, that they shall be kept in a place not exposed to fire which would ignite or destroy the store building. The coupling of inventories with books in the third paragraph tends to strengthen the view that the word "keep" implies preservation, because the keeping of an inventory does not convey the idea of taking or making one, but rather the preserving of it from destruction. The keeping provided for in the third paragraph requires that the books and inventories shall be cared for and preserved so that they can be produced and, in case of loss, furnish some evidence as to the extent of the loss sustained by the insured and of the liability of the insurer.

Some comment is made on the action of the agent in including this clause in the policy without the knowledge of the insured. It is not contended that there was any fraud or deception practiced by the agent. The clause is one common in policies insuring merchandise, and it is conceded that it serves a useful purpose. In speaking of this clause it was said in Insurance Co. v. Knerr, 72 Kan. 385, 387, 83 Pac. 611, 612:

"It is not an unreasonable precaution; it is one with which the insured might very easily have complied. In any event, the parties making the contract agreed that it should be performed by the insured, and, since it is a part of the contract, it cannot be ignored or arbitrarily set aside. It is generally held that neglect on the part of the insured substantially to comply with a clause in an insurance policy to keep the books used in conducting the insured's business in an iron safe, or in some place where they will not be destroyed in case the place in which the insured stock is kept is consumed by fire, will avoid the policy." * * *

We think the trial court correctly interpreted the contract of insurance, and that the insured failed to keep and produce the books as he had agreed to do, and, further, that compliance with this requirement was essential to a recovery under the policy.

We find nothing in the testimony that would have warranted the court in reforming the contract by striking out the clause in question.

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the Justices concurring.[10]

SELMAN v. KING et al.

(In the King's Bench, 1607. Cro. Jac. 183.)

Assumpsit. Whereas upon a suit in the Star-Chamber between the defendant and others, a commission issued for the examination of witnesses; that the plaintiff at the time of the commission kept an inn in Beningham; and in consideration that she promised to find horse-meat and man's-meat for the defendant and his company during the time of the sitting of the commission, that the defendant assumed to pay to the plaintiff all such sums as that diet and horse-meat amoumted to, when he should be thereunto requested: and alledgeth in fact, that the commissioners sat there three days, and that she found the said horse-meat and man's-meat during the said time, which amounted to five pounds six shillings; and that the defendant, licet sæpius requisitus, hath not paid it.

The defendant pleads non assumpsit; and it was found against him: and now moved in arrest of judgment, that the promise being to pay when he should be requested, there ought to be a precise request alleged, and the year, day, and place of the request expressed; for the defendant is not otherwise chargeable in an assumpsit.

The whole Court was of that opinion; for when the defendant is chargeable upon a collateral promise, and not for a mere debt, there ought to be a request precisely alledged: but in an assumpsit for debt, where a duty was due before, that being but in nature of a debt, the general allegation, licet sæpius requisitus, is sufficient: and for that cause the judgment was stayed.[11]

[11] Where the defendant has promised to pay for certain goods or services or other executed consideration, a debt exists an action for which will lie without any demand for payment. Estrigge and Owles' Case, 3 Leon. 200 (1588), promise to pay in return for forbearance by the promisee; Case of an Hostler, Yelv. 66 (1605), promise to pay for food and lodging; Runball v. Ball, 10 Mod. 38 (1711), note for money loaned payable on demand; Gibbs v. Southam, 5 B. & Adol. 911 (1834), debt on bond to pay a stated sum with interest.

But if the defendant has expressly promised only to pay upon demand, there being no pre-existing debt, no action lies without demand. Banks and Thwait's Case, 3 Leon. 73 (1579); Harrison v. Mitford, 2 Bulst. 229 (1614); Hill v. Wade, Cro. Jac. 523 (1619); Lowe v. Kirby, Sir Wm. Jones, 56 (1624); Peck v. Mithwolde, Sir Wm. Jones, 85 (1625); Alcock v. Blofield, Latch. 209 (1627); Birks v. NEW ENGLAND CONCRETE CONST. CO. v. SHEPARD & MORSE LUMBER CO.

Action by the New England Concrete Construction Company against the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company. To certain rulings at the trial, plaintiff excepts. Exceptions overruled.

CROSBY, J. The contract upon which this action is brought arises from certain letters and an "order slip" delivered to the plaintiff by the defendant. By the terms of the contract the defendant agreed to manufacture and furnish the plaintiff 58,000 feet of No. 1 maple flooring, in accordance with certain specifications, for the sum of $37.50 per thousand, delivered at Salem, Massachusetts.

The defendant, in its letter to the plaintiff dated January 14, 1913, states: "We will forward the order to our Burlington, Vermont, mill and will make preparations to have it filled as requested."

The fair inference from this evidence is that the flooring so to be furnished by the defendant was to be manufactured by it at its mill in Burlington, Vermont; at least the presiding judge before whom the case was tried without a jury could have so found.

The contract contained a further provision that: "All contracts are contingent upon strikes, fires, breakage of machinery and other causes beyond our control."

The evidence shows that on February 19, 1913, and before any of the flooring had been manufactured or delivered to the plaintiff the defendant's mill at Burlington was destroyed by fire; that the defendant duly notified the plaintiff by letter of that fact and of its inability for that reason to carry out the contract.

The agreement is not an absolute contract by which the defendant agreed to furnish the flooring to the plaintiff, but was subject to certain conditions, including the condition that the contract was contingent upon fires; that is to say, the defendant was excused from performance in the event of the happening of any of the contingencies set forth in the contract. Davis v. Columbia Coal Mining Co., 170 Mass. 391, 49 N. E. 629.

The effect of this clause was not to extend the time of performance beyond the time limit, but wholly to relieve the defendant from the obligation to furnish the flooring called for by the contract. Metropolitan Coal Co. v. Billings, 202 Mass. 457, 462, 89 N. E. 115.

The plaintiff contends that the word "fires" in the clause in question is to be construed in connection with the phrase "and other causes beyond our control," and that the last clause qualifies the other causes enumerated so that the word "fires" means "fires beyond the control of the defendant," and that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to show that the fire which occurred was beyond its control. We do not agree with this construction of the fire and strike clause. The language used is clear and free from ambiguity, and interpreting the words according to their natural and ordinary meaning, we are of opinion that the contingency of fires is independent of and distinct from all other causes enumerated, and cannot be construed as "fires beyond the control of the defendant."

The mill having been destroyed by fire, the defendant is wholly relieved from performance; at least, in the absence of evidence to show that the fire was the result of its willful and intentional wrong, or of that of its servants or agents.

The case at bar is to be distinguished from such cases as Oakman v. Boyce, 100 Mass. 477, Garfield & Proctor Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal & Coke Co., 199 Mass. 22, 84 N. E. 1020, and Metropolitan Coal Co. v. Billings, 202 Mass. 457, 89 N. E. 115, all of which cases involved the construction of strike clauses in contracts for the sale and delivery of coal, but where the contracts, properly construed, did not excuse performance absolutely, and where it was held that coal companies were required to make reasonable efforts to fulfill the contracts notwithstanding strikes.

There was evidence to show that the defendant was a lessee of its mill in Burlington which its lessor was under no legal obligation to rebuild after the fire; that the defendant had no other mill where the flooring could have been manufactured, and that it could not have been furnished to the defendant, had the mill been rebuilt, until the latter part of June 1913.

Whether the contract is to be construed as requiring the defendant to deliver the flooring about June first, or "as required about June first," we are of opinion that upon all the evidence it could have been found that time was an essential part of the contract and was so contemplated by the parties; and the judge was warranted in finding that by reason of the destruction of the mill by fire it was impossible for the defendant to perform the contract according to its terms. Pickering v. Greenwood, 114 Mass. 479.

We perceive no error in the manner in which the presiding judge dealt with the requests for rulings, and are of opinion that the finding was warranted.

Exceptions overruled.[12]

AUDETTE v. L'UNION ST. JOSEPH.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1901. 178 Mass. 113, 59 N. E. 668.)

Action by Malvina Audette, administratrix of the estate of Louis Audette, deceased, against L'Union St. Joseph. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A by-law of the defendant association provided that no sick member should receive any benefits before producing a sworn certificate of a physician. The physician who attended plaintiff's intestate in his last sickness refused to give a sworn certificate because of conscientious scruples against making an oath.

LORING, J. This case comes within the rule that where one engages for the act of a stranger he must procure the act to be done, and the refusal of the stranger, without the interference of the other party, is no excuse. That rule has been applied in this commonwealth to the obligation of a person, insured under a fire insurance policy, to furnish to the fire insurance company a certificate, under the hand and seal of a magistrate, notary public, or commissioner of deeds, stating that he has examined the circumstances attending the loss, knows the character and circumstances of the assured, and believes that the assured has, without fraud, sustained loss on the property insured to the amount certified. Johnson v. Insurance Co., 112 Mass. 49. In that case it was held that the plaintiff was not excused from producing such certificate by showing that he applied to two magistrates for such a certificate in vain, and used his best efforts to procure it, accompanied by proof of the facts which were to be certified to. And this case was confirmed in Dolliver v. Insurance Co., 131 Mass. 39, 44. To the same effect, see Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. 507, 9 L. Ed. 512; Ætna Ins. Co. v. People's Bank, 8 U. S. App. 554, 10 C. C. A. 342, 62 Fed. 222; Kelly v. Sun Fire Office, 141 Pa. 10, 20, 21, 21 Atl. 447, 23 Am. St. Rep. 254; Daniels v. Insurance Co., 50 Conn. 551; Roumage v. Insurance Co., 13 N. J. Law, 110; Lane v. Insurance Co., 50 Minn. 227, 52 N. W. 649, 17 L. R. A. 197; Insurance Co. v. Duke, 43 Ind. 418; Leadbetter v. Insurance Co., 13 Me. 265, 29 Am. Dec. 505.

The defendant relies on the reference to Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648, in Beharrell v. Quimby, 162 Mass. 571, 575, 39 N. E. 407; and to O'Neill v. Association (Sup.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 22. The decision in O'Neill v. Association professes to be nothing more, and is nothing more, than the application to a right to recover "sick benefits" of a rule which is established in New York in case of building contracts. But Nolan v. Whitney is not law in this commonwealth. On the contrary, it is settled here that in contracts for erecting buildings or doing other work, where it is stipulated that the quantity or quality of the work to be done shall be determined by an engineer or architect, whose decision shall be final, it is not open to either party to show, when the engineer or architect has passed upon the question submitted to him, that he was in error, and ought not to have given a certificate where he in fact gave one (Flint v. Gibson, 106 Mass. 391; Robbins v. Clark, 129 Mass. 145); or that the certificate given by him was erroneous (Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373; and see White v. Railroad Co., 135 Mass. 216, 220; Trust Co. v. Abbott, 162 Mass. 148, 154, 38 N. E. 432, 27 L. R. A. 271). This action, therefore, was prematurely brought; but the plaintiff, on producing a sworn certificate, unless there is some objection to it not now disclosed, can bring a new writ, and recover the sick benefits now sued for.

LAPLEAU v. SUCCESSION OF LAPLEAU.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana, 1919. 144 La. 988, 81 South. 597.)

Suit by Philip Lapleau against the succession of Louis Victor Lapleau. From a judgment for defendant on exception to the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

PROVOSTY, J. The petition in this case alleges that plaintiff made advances to his son to enable him to study civil engineering, and that this was done under an agreement that the advances were to be repaid by the son when he should "have secured such a start in the pursuit of his profession of civil engineering as to be in a position, financially, to repay said advances; that thereafter he commenced the practice of his profession of civil engineering, but died before being able to acquire such a position financially as to enable him to repay any part of said advances." The suit is against the succession of the son, and we assume that the property of his succession consists in his inheritance from his mother, who died after the time at which the advances in question are alleged to have been made.

The petition was excepted to, as showing no cause of action, because there is no allegation that the son had attained his majority and was capable of contracting at the time the advances were made; and because, even if he was a major, the father was under obligation to support him; and, finally, because by the terms of the contract he was to repay these advances only when he should have secured such a start in his profession of civil engineering as to be in a position, financially, to repay these advances, and that he died before this time had arrived.

On this last ground, if not, also, on the others, the exception was properly sustained.

SCOTT v. MORAGUES LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1918. 202 Ala. 312, 80 South. 394.)

Suit by the Moragues Lumber Company, a corporation, against J. M. Scott, for damages for breach of an agreement of charter party. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Count 2 of the complaint as amended is as follows:

"The plaintiff claims of the defendant $13,000 as damages from breach of an agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 27th day of June, 1917, consisting of an offer by the defendant that, subject to his buying a certain American vessel, 15 years old, which he was then figuring on and which was of about 1,050 tons and then due in Chile, he would charter said vessel to the plaintiff for the transportation of a cargo of lumber from any port in the Gulf of Mexico to Montevideo or Buenos Aires, for the freight of $65 per thousand feet of lumber, freight to be prepaid, free of discount and of insurance, and the vessel to be furnished to the plaintiff within a reasonable time after its purchase by the defendant, which said offer was accepted by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff avers that although the defendant purchased said vessel, and although the plaintiff was at all times ready, willing, and able to comply with all the provisions of said contract on its part, the defendant without notifying the plaintiff of said purchase, and before said vessel was delivered to him, chartered said vessel to a third person, and thereby rendered himself unable to comply with the said contract." * * * [15]

SAYRE, J. * * * It is said, in the first place, that the alleged contract between the parties was conditioned upon the will of appellant, defendant, and was therefore void for want of consideration or mutuality of obligation. A valid contract may be conditioned upon the happening of an event, even though the event may depend upon the will of the party, who afterwards seeks to avoid its obligation. This principle is illustrated in McIntyre Lumber Co. v. Jackson Lumber Co., 165 Ala. 268, 51 South. 767, 138 Am. St. Rep. 66. Appellant was not bound to purchase the vessel; but, when he did, the offer—or the contract, if the offer had been accepted—thereafter remained as if this condition had never been stipulated, its mutuality or other necessary incidents of obligation depending upon its other provisions and the action of the parties thereunder. Davis v. Williams, 121 Ala. 546, 25 South. 704; 3 Page on Contracts, § 1358. * * *

The effect of appellee's acceptance, if communicated while the offer was yet open, was to convert it into a binding contract. 6 R. C. L. p. 605, § 27. In substance, it is alleged in the complaint that appellant's offer was accepted; that appellant purchased the vessel; that appellee was able, ready, and willing to perform the contract on its part; but that appellant disabled himself, or failed and refused to perform on his part. From the order in which the facts are alleged it is to be inferred that appellee accepted appellant's offer before the latter purchased the vessel, and there is no ground of demurrer questioning the sufficiency of the complaint to that effect. Thereupon the offer was converted into a binding contract to be performed, if not otherwise stipulated, within a reasonable time; the promise on either hand constituting the consideration of the promise on the other. Appellant's purchase of the vessel was a condition precedent to the existence of a binding contract, it is true; but that was alleged, as it was necessary that it should be. 13 C. J. p. 724, § 847, citing McCormick v. Badham, 191 Ala. 339, 67 South. 609; Long v. Addix, 184 Ala. 236, 63 South. 982; Flouss v. Eureka Co., 80 Ala. 30 And so with respect to appellee's acceptance of the offer. It was necessary that appellee communicate its acceptance to appellant. 1 Page, § 43. But this communication was a part of the acceptance and was covered by the general allegation of acceptance. * * *

MILNES v. GERY.

(In High Court of Chancery, 1807. 14 Ves. 400, 9 Rev. Rep. 307, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 684.)

Previous to the marriage of John Milnes and Mary Selina Gery, one third part of certain estates was settled in trust for them for life. By the agreement of settlement it was provided that the trustee should have a power to sell this one third interest with the approval of said John and Mary, and that the owner of the balance of the estates, one Hugh Wade Gery, should have the option to buy said one third interest, at a price to be determined by two appraisers, one of whom was to be named by John and Mary and the other by Hugh, and in case of disagreement by an umpire to be named by the two appraisers. John Milnes gave a bond in the penal sum of £12,000 to carry out the agreement, in case Hugh Wade Gery should give a certain six months notice of his intention to purchase. The notice was properly given by Hugh, and each party named an appraiser. The two appraisers differed greatly in their estimates, and they were utterly unable to agree upon a third person to act as umpire.

The plaintiff therefore filed this bill to have the agreement carried into execution, praying that the notice by the defendant may be considered binding, and that a proper person or persons may be appointed by the Court to make a valuation, or that the valuation should be ascertained in such other manner as the court should direct.[17]

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Sir WILLIAM GRANT). The more I have considered this case, the more I am satisfied, that independently of all other objections, there is no such agreement between the parties, as can be carried into execution. The only agreement into which the defendant entered, was to purchase at a price to be ascertained in a specified mode. No price having ever been fixed in that mode, the parties have not agreed upon any price. Where, then, is the complete and concluded contract, which this Court is called upon to execute? The price is of the essence of a contract of sale. In this instance the parties have agreed upon a particular mode of ascertaining the price. The agreement, that the price shall be fixed in one specific manner, certainly does not afford an inference that it is wholly indifferent in what manner it is to be fixed. The Court declaring that the one shall take, and the other shall give, a price fixed in any other manner, does not execute any agreement of theirs; but makes an agreement for them, upon a notion, that it may be as advantageous as that which they made for themselves. How can a man be forced to transfer to a stranger that confidence, which upon a subject, materially interesting to him, he has reposed in an individual of his own selection? No substantial difference arises from the circumstance, that in this case the decision may ultimately fall to an umpire, not directly nominated by the parties, as through the medium of the original nominees they had an influence upon the choice. No one could be chosen without the concurrence of the persons in whose judgment they reciprocally confided.

The case of an agreement to sell at a fair valuation is essentially different. In that case no particular means of ascertaining the value are pointed out; there is nothing, therefore, precluding the court from adopting any means adapted to that purpose. The case, in which the Court has modified particular, subordinate parts of an agreement falls far short of the decree, that is now demanded. Perhaps some of those cases may be thought rather to require defence for the length to which they have gone, than to furnish a justification for still farther extending the discretionary power, of which they are instances. The Court never professes to bind a man to any agreement, except that which he has made; but sometimes holds the agreement, which it executes, and that which he has made, to be substantially the same; when to common understandings there is a very perceptible difference between them. The Court, however, has never gone the length of compelling a party to buy or sell the whole subject of his agreement at a price that he has never fixed, and that was never fixed in any mode to which he has given his consent.

[17] The statement of facts has been rewritten and the arguments of counsel are omitted.

In the case of Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. 605, it was rather assumed, than proved, that if Warren was competent to enter into the agreement, some means might be found to carry it into execution. That was so little discussed, that the attention of the Court was not drawn to the point; and the doubt, recently thrown upon that point in the case of Cooth v. Jackson, 6 Ves. 12, was not at all adverted to. I state it as a doubt only, as the decision was ultimately upon a different ground; but neither Lord Rosslyn nor Lord Eldon conceived that the Court could be substituted for the arbitrators, to make a division of the estate. The division of an estate does not imply more personal confidence, or which other persons will be less capable of executing, than the ascertainment of value; and the admission there was, that the defendant was instrumental in preventing the award by private instructions to the arbitrator. Upon the principle, that a fixed price was an essential ingredient in a contract of sale, the ancient Roman lawyers doubted whether an agreement, that did not settle the price, was at all binding. Justinian's Institutes and the Code state that doubt;[18] and resolve it by declaring that such an agreement should be valid and complete, when and if the party to whom it was referred, should fix the price: otherwise it should be totally inoperative: "quasi nullo pretio statuto;" and such clearly is the law of England.

I do not know, that upon this point there can be any difference between decisions at law and in equity. If you go into a Court of Law for damages, you must be able to state some valid, legal contract, which the other party wrongfully refuses to perform; if you come to a Court of Equity for a specific performance, you must also be able to state some contract, legal or equitable, concluded between the parties, which the one refuses to execute. In this case the plaintiff seeks to compel the defendant to take this estate at such price as a master of this Court shall find it to be worth, admitting, that the defendant never made that agreement; and my opinion is, that the agreement he has made is not substantially, or in any fair sense, the same with that; and it could only be by an arbitrary discretion that the Court could substitute the one in the place of the other.

This bill must therefore be dismissed without costs.[19]

[19] The decision or approval of a third party is often made a condition. Old Colony St. Ry. Co. v. Brockton & P. St. Ry. Co., 218 Mass. 84, 105 N. E. 866 (1914); Thurnell v. Balbirnie, 2 M. & W. 786 (1837) to pay at a valuation made by M. and N.; Rogers v. Maloney, 85 Or. 61, 165 Pac. 357 (1917); Chapman v. Ferguson, 152 Mo. App. 84, 132 S. HAMILTON v. HOME INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of the United States 1890. 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was an action, brought June 26, 1886, upon a policy of insurance, numbered 3,190, by which the Home Insurance Company of New York insured Robert Hamilton for one year from February 23, 1886, on a stock of tobacco in his warehouse at 413 and 415 Madison street in Covington in the state of Kentucky, against loss or damage by fire to the amount of $5,000, "to be paid sixty days after due notice and proofs of the same shall have been made by the assured and received at the office of the company in New York."

The policy, after providing that in case of loss the assured should forthwith give notice, and as soon afterwards as possible furnish proofs of loss, with a magistrate's certificate, submit to examination on oath, and produce books and vouchers, and copies of lost books and invoices, further provided, among other things, as follows:

"When personal property is damaged, the assured shall forthwith cause it to be put in order, assorting and arranging the various articles, according to their kinds, separating the damaged from the undamaged, and shall cause an inventory to be made and furnished to the company of the whole, naming the quantity, quality, and cost of each article. The amount of sound value and of damage shall then be ascertained by appraisal of each article by competent persons (not interested in the loss as creditors or otherwise, nor related to the assured or sufferers) to be mutually appointed by the assured and the company, their report in writing to be made under oath before any magistrate, or other properly commissioned person, one-half of the appraisers' fees to be paid by the assured. The company reserves the right to take the whole or any part of the articles at their appraised value; and, until such proofs, declarations, and certificates are produced, and examinations and appraisals permitted by the claimant, the loss shall not be payable."

"But provided, in case differences shall arise touching any loss or damage, after proof thereof has been received in due form, the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the liability of the company under this policy."

"And it is hereby understood and agreed by and between this company and the assured that this policy is made and accepted in reference to the foregoing terms and conditions, and to the classes of hazards and memoranda printed on the back of this policy, which are hereby declared to be a part of this contract, and are to be used and resorted to in order to determine the rights and obligations of the parties hereto in all cases not herein otherwise specially provided for in writing."

The answer admitted the execution of the policy, and notice of loss; put in issue the amount of loss; denied that the plaintiff ever delivered due proofs of loss, or had performed the conditions of the policy on his part; and, after reciting the substance of the provisions above quoted, alleged as follows: "And the defendant says that differences having arisen touching the loss and damage sustained by said plaintiff under said policy and the amount thereof, the plaintiff claiming a loss of $40,000, and the defendant claiming and believing that it was slight and but a very small part of said sum, and being unable to agree upon the amount of said loss, this defendant requested and demanded in writing that the amount of such loss and damage should be submitted to and ascertained and determined by impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing should be binding upon the parties as to the amount of loss or damage, but should not decide the liability of the company under said policy. And the said defendant further says that the plaintiff wholly disregarded the terms and conditions of said policy in that respect, and neglected and refused to have such arbitration, and refused to choose or submit to arbitrators chosen in accordance with the terms and provisions of said policy the amount of the loss or damage by fire to the property covered by said policy, and refused to be governed in the ascertainment of said loss by any of the terms and conditions of said policy, and, against the protest of the defendant, proceeded to and did sell all of said property at auction. An arbitration and the ascertainment of the said loss thereby, as provided in said policy, became impossible, and this defendant was deprived of its rights and privileges under said policy with respect to said property and the appraisement thereof. This defendant further says that the damage done to the property insured was of such a nature as to require careful and scrutinizing examination to ascertain the injury thereto and loss thereon, and that an appraisement by arbitrators, as required by the terms and conditions of said policy, was of the greatest importance to the defendant, and the only means under said policy whereby the exact amount of damage and injury sustained by said plaintiff upon said property could be determined; and the said plaintiff, by the sale of said property, and in disregarding the terms and conditions of said policy in that respect, wholly deprived this defendant of the right to an arbitration, as provided in said policy, and all other rights in respect to the property so injured or damaged by said fire. The defendant further says that by reason of the failure and refusal of said plaintiff to agree upon arbitrators to determine the amount of the loss and damage so sustained as aforesaid, and his refusal to submit the amount of such loss to arbitration in accordance with the plain terms and provisions of said policy, and the sale of said property so injured as aforesaid against the written protest of the defendant, the said plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, nor to have or maintain this action against the said defendant." The plaintiff filed a replication, denying these allegations of the answer. * * * [20]

Upon the evidence, the court instructed the jury that, on the issues joined on the special defenses in the answer, the plaintiff could not recover, and that they should return a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff tendered a bill of exceptions to these instructions, and, after verdict and judgment for the defendant, sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Justice GRAY. This case resembles in some aspects that of Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419 (decided at the last term), but it is essentially different in important and controlling elements.

In that case, the effect of the provisions of the policy by reason of which it was held that the assured, having refused to submit to the appraisal and award provided for, could not maintain his action, was thus stated by the court: "The conditions of the policy in suit clearly and unequivocally manifest the intention and agreement of the parties to the contract of insurance that any difference arising between them as to the amount of loss or damage of the property insured shall be submitted, at the request in writing of either party, to the appraisal of competent and impartial persons, to be chosen as therein provided, whose award shall be conclusive as to the amount of such loss or damage only, and shall not determine the question of the liability of the company; that the company shall have the right to take the whole or any part of the property at its appraised value so ascertained; and that until such an appraisal shall have been permitted, and such an award obtained, the loss shall not be payable, and no action shall lie against the company. The appraisal, when requested in writing by either party, is distinctly made a condition precedent to the payment of any loss, and to the maintenance of any action." 136 U. S. 254, 255, 10 Sup. Ct. 949, 34 L. Ed. 419. That policy looked to a single appraisal and award, to be made as one thing, and by one board of appraisers or arbitrators, whenever any difference should arise between the parties, and to be binding and conclusive as to the amount of the loss, although not to determine the question of the liability of the company; and the policy contained, not only a provision that until such an appraisal the loss should not be payable, but an express condition that no action upon the policy should be sustainable in any court until after such an award.

In the case now before us, on the other hand, the appraisal and the award are distinct things, and to take place at separate times, and the effect assigned to each is quite different from that given to the appraisal and award in the other policy. The "appraisal," without which the loss is not payable, is required to be made not merely when differences arise as to its amount, but in all cases, and results in a mere "report in writing," which is not declared to be binding upon the parties in any respect, and is in truth but a part of the proofs of loss. It is only by a separate and independent provision, and when differences arise touching any loss "after proof thereof has been received in due form," that the matter is required, at the request of either party, to be submitted to "arbitrators, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss, but shall not decide the liability of this company under the policy;" and there is no provision whatever postponing the right to sue until after an award. The special defenses set up, with some tautology and surplusage, in the answer, reduce themselves, when scrutinized, to a single one, the plaintiff's refusal to submit to an award of arbitrators, as provided in the policy. This appears by the general frame of the answer, and by its speaking of the award as "an arbitration and the ascertainment of the said loss thereby," and as "an appraisement by arbitrators," as well as by the distinct averments that the defendant requested and the plaintiff declined a submission to arbitration, and by the omission of any specific allegation that the plaintiff neglected to procure a report of appraisers. The evidence introduced at the trial was to the same effect. Proofs of loss, sent by the plaintiff to the defendant, with a request that any defects in substance or form might be pointed out so that he might perfect the proofs to the defendant's satisfaction, were received by the defendant, without then or afterwards objecting to their form or sufficiency. The subsequent correspondence between the parties was evidently influenced in form by embracing insurances in different companies under policies with various provisions; but, as applied to the policy in suit, it manifestly related, and was understood by both parties to relate, not to a mere report of appraisers, but to an award of arbitrators which should bind both parties as to the amount of the loss. The instruction to the jury, therefore, that on the issues joined on the special defenses in the answer, and upon the evidence in the case, the plaintiff could not recover, was, in effect, a ruling that the plaintiff could not maintain his action because he had refused to submit the amount of his loss to arbitration.

A provision in a contract for the payment of money upon a contingency that the amount to be paid shall be submitted to arbitrators, whose award shall be final as to that amount, but shall not determine the general question of liability, is undoubtedly valid. If the contract further provides that no action upon it shall be maintained until after such an award, then, as was adjudged in Hamilton v. Insurance Co., above cited, and in many cases therein referred to, the award is a condition precedent to the right of action. But when no such condition is expressed in the contract, or necessarily to be implied from its terms, it is equally well settled that the agreement for submitting the amount to arbitration is collateral and independent; and that a breach of this agreement while it will support a separate action, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action on the principal contract. Roper v. Lendon, 1 El. & El. 825; Collins v. Locke, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 674; Dawson v. Fitzgerald, 1 Exch. Div. 257; Reed v. Insurance Co., 138 Mass. 572; Seward v. City of Rochester, 109 N. Y. 164, 16 N. E. 348; Insurance Co. v. Pulver, 126 Ill. 329, 338, 18 N. E. 804, 9 Am. St. Rep. 598; Crossley v. Insurance Co. (C. C.) 27 Fed. 30. The rule of law upon the subject was well stated in Dawson v. Fitzgerald, by Sir George Jessel, M. R., who said: "There are two cases where such a plea as the present is successful: First, where the action can only be brought for the sum named by the arbitrator; secondly, where it is agreed that no action shall be brought till there has been an arbitration, or that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the right of action. In all other cases where there is, first, a covenant to pay, and, secondly, a covenant to refer, the covenants are distinct and collateral, and the plaintiff may sue on the first, leaving the defendant" "to bring an action for not referring," or (under a modern English statute) "to stay the action till there has been an arbitration." 1 Exch. Div. 260. Applying this test, it is quite clear that the separate and independent provision, in the policy now before us, for submitting to arbitration the amount of the loss, is a distinct and collateral agreement, and was wrongly held by the circuit court to bar this action.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict, and to take such further proceedings as may be consistent with this opinion.[21]

GRAHAM et al. v. GERMAN AMERICAN INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1907. 75 Ohio St. 374, 79 N. E. 930, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1055, 9 Ann. Cas. 79.)

Action by Graham and others against the German American Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.[22]

[21] Promises to submit to arbitration are generally held to be collateral and independent; the award will not be a condition precedent, unless so provided in express terms. Mecartney v. Guardian Trust Co., 274 Mo. 224, 202 S. W. 1131 (1918); Brocklehurst & Potter Co. v. Marsch, 225 Mass. 3, 113 N. E. 646 (1916); Aktieselskabet Korn-Og Foderstof Kompagniet v. Rederiaktiebolaget Atlanten (D. C.) 232 Fed. 403 (1916); Flavelle v. Red Jacket Consol. Coal & Coke Co., 82 W. Va. 295, 96 S. E. 600 (1918), "while a breach of the agreement will support a separate action, it cannot be pleaded in bar." See, also, Lowndes v. Earl of Stamford, 18 Q. B. 425 (1852).

But compare Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54 (1880); President, etc., of Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250 (1872).

[22] Two other cases were considered at the same time. Statements in regard to them are omitted.

In this case the policy contained provisions as follows:

"This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such actual cash value, with proper deduction for depreciation however caused, and shall in no event exceed what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with material of like kind and quality; said ascertainment or estimate shall be made by the insured and this company, or, if they differ, then by appraisers, as hereinafter provided; and, the amount of loss or damage having been thus determined, the sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of the loss have been received by this company in accordance with the terms of this policy. * * *

"In the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers, the insured and this company each selecting one, and the two so chosen shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire; the appraisers together shall then estimate and appraise the loss, stating separately sound value and damage, and, failing to agree, shall submit their differences to the umpire; and the award in writing of any two shall determine the amount of such loss; the parties thereto shall pay the appraisers respectively selected by them and shall bear equally the expenses of the appraisal and umpire.

"This company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition of this policy or any forfeiture thereof by any requirement, act, or proceeding on its part relating to the appraisal or to any examination herein provided for; and the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers when appraisal has been required. * * *

"No suit or action on this policy, for the recovery of any claim, shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire. * * * This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions. * * *"

DAVIS, J.[23] (after stating the facts). These cases have been the subject of unusual and protracted consideration, not only on account of the intrinsic importance of the questions involved, but also because there is a divergence of views in the lower courts, and a variance between two reported decisions of this court. * * *

In several reported cases, not "in numerous cases and supported by the great weight of authority," it has been assumed, rather than demonstrated by a proper course of reasoning, that the effect of the clause quoted above is that the conditions relating to arbitration and appraisal do not become obligatory on the insured until appraisal has been required, in the sense of having been requested or demanded by the insurer, notwithstanding a stipulation in the policy, as in those now before the court, that: "No suit or action on this policy, for the recovery of any claim, shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements." The contrary view is supported by several courts of high standing in carefully considered and well-reasoned opinions, which will be cited further on. It also logically results from the ruling in Insurance Co. v. Carnahan, supra, upon like policies, although in those cases there had been a demand for appraisal, by the insurers, that the condition as to arbitration or appraisement is a condition precedent and to entitle the insured to maintain an action to recover under the policy, he must show that he has either performed the condition or has a legal excuse for nonperformance thereof. To state it in another form, in case of a disagreement between the insurer and the insured as to the amount of the loss, the contract gives to the insured no right of action upon the policy, but only the right to enforce an award, unless the insurer has waived the condition by refusal to proceed under it, when requested, or otherwise. Carroll v. Girard Fire Ins. Co., 72 Cal. 297, 13 Pac. 863.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co. of N. Y., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708, held that "if a contract of insurance provides that no action upon it shall be maintained until after an award by arbitrators is made as to the amount due upon it, the award is a condition precedent to a right of action on the contract." See, also, Hamilton v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419; Old Saucelito L. & D. Co. v. Com. Union Assur. Co., 66 Cal. 253, 5 Pac. 232; Scottish Union & National Ins. Co. v. Clancy, 71 Tex. 5, 8 S. W. 630. The last paragraph of these policies, respectively, contains this clause: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions." A little above that occurs the following: "No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements." It should be noted that the "requirements" here mentioned are requirements by the terms of the contract, not requests by the insurer, for they are requirements already made and "foregoing." At the very beginning of the statement of the conditions of the policy is the following: "This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such cash value * * * said ascertainment or estimate shall be made by the insured and this company, or, if they differ, then by appraisers, as hereinafter provided; and the amount of loss or damage having been thus determined, the sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of loss have been received by this company in accordance with the terms of this policy."

Now, could a condition precedent be more express than this? In case of difference or disagreement the "ascertainment" of the amount for which the insurer shall be liable "shall be made" by appraisers, and, the amount "having been thus determined," the same, not some other sum, shall be payable "sixty days after due notice, ascertainment and satisfactory proofs of loss have been received by the insurer in accordance with the terms of the policy," not in accordance with demand or request of the insurer. Beyond all reasonable dispute, this is an agreement to pay only after an award. * * *

When is an appraisal required or "made necessary" ex vi termini within this contract? An award is not called for or required by this agreement in every case, because in many cases, doubtless in most cases, there may be no dispute over the loss, but, by the express agreement of the parties, in the strongest terms, it is required "if they differ" and "in the event of a disagreement." By the terms of the contract it is provided that, in case of disagreement, the loss does not become payable unless an appraisal has taken place; the "policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions," one of which is that "no suit or action on the policy shall be sustainable * * * until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements."* It is very clear that the foregoing requirements are the requirements or conditions of the contract, and that the phrase cannot fairly be applied to some future and contingent demand or request by one of the parties.

In a given state of circumstances, these policies plainly and definitely make the obtaining of an award, or at least an attempt in good faith to obtain an award, a condition precedent to a right of action on the policy, and it is elementary that the obligation of taking the initiative, or of showing an excuse for not doing so, is upon the party who has the affirmative in the action. "Where the parties, in their contract, fix on a certain mode by which the amount to be paid shall be ascertained, as in the present case, the party that seeks an enforcement of the agreement must show that he has done everything on his part which could be done to carry it into effect. He cannot compel the payment of the amount claimed, unless he shall procure the kind of evidence required by the contract or show that by time or accident he is unable to do so." United States v. Robeson, 34 U. S. (9 Pet.) 319, 327, 9 L. Ed. 142. See, also, 4 Encyc. Pl. & Prac. 632; 5 Id. 368; 1 Cyc. 692. So that, from all the foregoing considerations, our conclusion is that the clause "including an award when appraisal has been required" is very far from meaning "when appraisal has been requested by the insurer."

Yet, by the construction which is urged upon us now, and which has been once adopted by this court, a condition precedent which has been so clearly expressed is declared to be no condition precedent, and it is not available to the insurer even as a collateral condition unless upon its own demand. As we have already said, the courts which have adopted this construction have assumed, rather than demonstrated, its correctness. It has been fully discussed and its weakness, as we think satisfactorily shown in Murphy v. Northern British & Mercantile Company, 61 Mo. App. 323; and again in McNees v. Southern Ins. Co., 69 Mo. App. 232; and these cases have become the settled law of the state of Missouri on that subject. We need not extend the discussion further. In accord with the later view are the opinions of the courts in Minnesota, Tennessee, and Illinois, as follows: Mosness v. German-American Ins. Co. of New York, 50 Minn. 341, 52 N. W. 932; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Morton-Scott-Robertson Co., 106 Tenn. 558, 61 S. W. 787; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Lorton & Co., 109 Ill. App. 63.

Having the strong convictions as to the proper construction and legal effect of these policies, which we have endeavored to concisely express above, we are of the opinion that the former ruling of this court in Grand Rapids Ins. Co. v. Finn, 60 Ohio St. 513, 54 N. E. 545, 54 L. R. A. 555, 71 Am. St. Rep. 736, was wrong and the same is now expressly overruled.

It follows that the judgment of the circuit court of Stark county should be, and it is, affirmed.[24]

SECTION 2.—IMPLIED AND CONSTRUCTIVE CONDITIONS PRECEDENT[25]

(a) Their Historical Development—Dependent and Independent Promises

(Early Cases, Particularly Sales of Goods and of Land)

ANDREW v. BOUGHEY.

(In the Court of King's Bench, 1552. 1 Dyer, 75 a.)

The declaration was that the defendant "on such a day, year, and at such a place, undertook for twenty marks (the moiety of which was in hand, paid, and the residue agreed between them to be paid within a certain time) that he would deliver at such a place, within four days after such a Feast, four hundred pounds weight of good and merchantable wax; but the defendant, not regarding his promise and undertaking, and intending to defraud the plaintiff * * * did deliver to the plaintiff at the said place three hundred and seventy three pounds weight of wax, falsely and deceitfully mixed with resin and turpentine." [To this declaration there was a plea of accord and satisfaction, which was held good.] And it seems for another cause, that although the plea were not good, still the plaintiff shall not recover; for if it appear to the Court that the plaintiff in any action had not good cause to have his action, the Court will never give judgment for him; here it appears in the beginning of the count, that for twenty marks, the moiety of which was in hand paid, and the other moiety was to be paid at a certain time agreed on between them; non constat whether that time was past, or to come, at the time of this action brought; and if it was past, as it shall be intended most strongly against the plaintiff, and the money not paid or legally tendered, then the contract and undertaking is void, for this word "for" makes the contract conditional; as for a marriage to be had I covenant to make an estate, etc.; if the marriage do not take effect I shall be discharged from this covenant. * * * [26]

[24] An award was held a condition precedent in Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. C. 811 (1856); Eyre-Shoemaker v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co., 193 Fed. 387, 113 C. C. A. 313 (1912); President, etc., of Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250 (1872); Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54 (1880).

BROCAS' CASE.

Brocas, lord of a manor, covenanted with his copyholder, to assure to him and his heirs, the freehold and inheritance of his copyhold; and the said copyholder in consideration of the same performed, covenanted to pay such a sum: it was the opinion of the whole Court, that the said copyholder is not tyed to pay the said sum, before the assurance made, and the covenant performed: but if the words had been, In consideration of the said covenant to be performed, then he is bounden to pay the mony presently; and to have his remedy over by covenant.[27]

ceptions of justice' is quite indistinct. The distinction should constantly be borne in mind; but no grouping of cases into the two classes seems to be desirable. Neither will Express Conditions be excluded from this section.

[26] Part of the report is omitted.

[27] If a promise was stated to be in consideration of or "for" (pro) the performance promised by the other party, this was believed to make the promise expressly conditional. Y. B. 15 Hen. VII, f. 10 b, pl. 7; Thorpe v. Thorpe, 12 Mod. 455 (1701); Peeters v. Opie, 2 Wms. Saunders, 350 (1671). Similar fine verbal distinctions were drawn in Anon., 4 Leon. 50 (1590); Slater v. Stone, Cro. Jac. 645 (1622); Lock v. Wright, 1 Strange, 569 (1723); Thomas v. Cadwallader, Willes, 496 (1744).

LEA v. EXELBY.

(In the Queen's Bench, 1602. Cro. Eliz. 888.)

Assumpsit. Whereas the defendant was possessed of such a lease for years, the inheritance being the plaintiff's, in consideration the plaintiff promised to pay unto him such a sum of money such a day and place, that the defendant promised super solutionem inde to surrender unto him his lease: and alledgeth, that he at the day and place tendered the money, and that the defendant had not surrendered his lease. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and found against him: and it was moved in arrest of judgment, that the defendant was not to make the surrender but upon the payment of the money, or an express tender and refusal. And the plaintiff here hath alledged quod obtulit; but he saith not that the defendant refused, which is material, and issuable; and he might have taken issue upon the refusal, if it had been alledged: and although he hath pleaded non assumpsit, yet, the declaration being ill in substance, the defendant may well take advantage thereof.—Coke, Attorney-General, moved, that the declaration was good, and there needed not any tender and refusal to have been alledged; for it sufficeth to alledge that in consideration he assumed to pay such a sum, the defendant assumed to surrender; so there being an assumpsit against an assumpsit, it had been well enough.—But all the Court held, that if the promise had been in consideration he assumed to pay such a sum, that the defendant had assumed to surrender, that had been sufficient; for then he is to make his surrender, and he ought to take his remedy against the other for the nonperformance of his promise: but here it is, that he assumed to pay, and the other assumed to surrender it upon the payment, so as he would not trust to his promise; but when he had paid, he would then surrender it. And in the first case, he needed not alledge the performance of the promise; but here in this he ought. And when he saith quod obtulit, and saith not that the other accepted it or refused it, his allegation of the tender is not to any purpose; for he shall never say quod obtulit only, but he ought to plead further that none was there to receive it, or that he refused; or he ought to alledge payment; and here it is matter of substance, for want whereof the declaration is not good. Wherefore it was adjudged for the defendant.—And afterwards COKE said, that Willenhall's Case was adjudged, that tender without alledging a refusal was not good.

RAYNAY v. ALEXANDER.

(In the King's Bench, 1606. Yelv. 76.)

The plaintiff declar'd, that whereas the defendant was possessed of seventeen tod of wool, and whereas colloquium fuit betwixt them for fifteen tod of the seventeen tod, to be chosen by the plaintiff; the defendant in consideration of £6 to be paid on such a day, &c. promised to deliver the plaintiff prædictas fifteen tod of wool, and said in facto, that he was ready at the day to pay the defendant £6 yet the defendant had not deliver'd the plaintiff the fifteen tod of wool, to his damage, &c. And upon non assumpsit pleaded, it was found for the plaintiff; and it was shewn in arrest of judgment, that the declaration was not good, because the plaintiff had not shewn, that he had chosen fifteen tod out of the seventeen, and that is quasi a condition precedent; and an act to be first performed by the plaintiff before the defendant is bound by his promise to do anything: quod fuit concessum per totam curiam. But, per POPHAM, Chief Justice, if the defendant had sold one of the tods of wool before election made by the plaintiff, that had destroy'd the election, and made the promise absolute, and had been the breach of it: the same law if the defendant would not have permitted the plaintiff to see the wool that he might make election; for that had excused the act to be done by the plaintiff, and had been a default in the defendant. And the matter aforesaid is much enforced by the word prædictas in the declaration; for that can be referr'd to nothing but the communication, by which the plaintiff of his own shewing ought to make election: then the plaintiff omitting it in his declaration shews the fault is in himself, which ought to be removed before he can charge the defendant: but if the communication had been, that the plaintiff should chuse fifteen tod of seventeen, and the plaintiff had declar'd the promise to be to deliver fifteen tod generally, without saying prædictas, there, if the promise had been found, the plaintiff should have judgment; for the colloquium might be conditional, and the promise absolute. Quod nota. But the judgment was, nil capiat per billam.[28]

[28] In accord, where the plaintiff or some third party must do an act before it is possible for the defendant to perform as promised: Thomas v. Cadwallader, Willes, 496 (1744), defendant promised to repair with timber to be furnished by plaintiff; Armitage v. Insole, 14 Q. B. 728 (1850), defendant promised to deliver coal free on board ship at Cardiff; plaintiff must first name the ship; Cadwell v. Blake, 6 Gray (Mass.) 402 (1856), post, p. 722; Coombe v. Greene, 11 M. & W. 480 (1843), covenant to repair as directed by a surveyor to be appointed by the plaintiff.

NICHOLS v. RAYNBRED.

(In the King's Bench, 1615. Hob. 88.)

Nichols brought an assumpsit against Raynbred, declaring that in consideration, that Nichols promised to deliver the defendant to his own use a cow, the defendant promised to deliver him 50 shillings: adjudged for the plaintiff in both Courts, that the plaintiff need not to aver the delivery of the cow, because it is promise for promise. Note here the promises must be at one instant, for else they will be both nuda pacta.[29]

PORDAGE v. COLE.

(In the King's Bench, 1669. 1 Wms. Saund. 319.)[30]

Debt upon a specialty for £774 15 s. The plaintiff declares that the defendant, by his certain writing of agreement made at, &c. by the plaintiff by the name, &c. and the defendant by the name, &c. and brings the deed into Court, &c., it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant in manner and form following, (viz.) that the defendant should give to the plaintiff the sum of £775 for all his lands, with a house called Ashmole-House thereunto belonging, with the brewing vessels remaining in the said house, and with the malt-mill and wheel-

For a modern throwback to this ancient law, see Prest v. Cole, 183 Mass. 283, 67 N. E. 246 (1903).

In Thomas v. Cadwallader, Willes, 496 (1744), it was said by Willes, J.: "I expressed my dislike of those cases, though they are too many to be now overruled, where it is determined that the breach of one covenant, though plainly relative to the other, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action brought for the breach of the other. * * * If therefore this were a new point, I should be inclined to be of opinion that though, where there are mutual covenants relative to one another in the same deed, a plaintiff is not obliged, in an action brought for the breach of them, to aver the performance of the covenant which is to be performed on his part, yet that the defendant in such action may in his plea insist on the non-performance of the covenant to be performed on the part of the plaintiff; but this has been so often determined otherwise, that it is too late now to alter the law in this respect."

barrow; and that in pursuance of the said agreement, the defendant had given to the plaintiff 5s. as an earnest; and it was by the said writing further agreed between the plaintiff and defendant, that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the residue of the said sum of £775 a week after the Feast of St. John the Baptist the next following (all other moveables, with the corn upon the ground, except). And although the defendant has paid five shillings, parcel, &c. yet the said defendant, although often requested, has not paid the residue to the damage, &c. The defendant prays oyer of the specialty, which is entered in hæc verba, to wit: "11 May, 1668. It is agreed between Doctor John Pordage and Bassett Cole, Esquire, that the said Bassett Cole shall give unto the said doctor £775 for all his lands, with Ashmole-House, thereunto belonging, with the brewing-vessels as they are now remaining in the said house, and with the malt-mill and wheelbarrow. In witness whereof we do put our hands and seals: mutually given as earnest in performance of this 5s.; the money to be paid before Midsummer 1668; all other moveables, with the corn upon the ground, excepted." And upon oyer thereof the defendant demurs. And Withins, of counsel with the defendant, took several exceptions to the declaration: * * * 3. The great exception was, that the plaintiff in his declaration has not averred that he had conveyed the lands, or at least tendered a conveyance of them; for the defendant has no remedy to obtain the lands, and therefore the plaintiff ought to have conveyed them, or tendered a conveyance of them, before he brought his action for the money. And it was argued by Withins, that if by one single deed two things are to be performed, namely, one by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant, if there be no mutual remedy, the plaintiff ought to aver performance of his part: Trin. 12 Jac. 1, between Holder v. Tayloe, 1 Rol. Abr. 518 (C) pl. 2, 3; Ughtred's case, and Sir Richard Pool's case, there cited, and Gray's case: and that the word "pro" made a condition in things executory. And here in this case it is a condition precedent which ought to be performed before the action brought; wherefore he prayed judgment for the defendant.

But it was adjudged by the Court, that the action was well brought without an averment of the conveyance of the land; because it shall be intended that both parties have sealed the specialty. And if the plaintiff has not conveyed the land to the defendant, he has also an action of covenant against the plaintiff upon the agreement contained in the deed, which amounts to a covenant on the part of the plaintiff to convey the land; and so each party has mutual remedy against the other. But it might be otherwise if the specialty had been the words of the defendant only, and not the words of both parties by way of agreement as it is here. And by the conclusion of the deed it is said, that both parties had sealed it; and therefore, judgment was given for the plaintiff which was afterwards affirmed in the Exchequer-Chamber, Trin. 22 of King Charles the Second.[31]

[31] In accord: Mattock v. Kinglake, 10 Adol. & El. 50 (1839), time named for payment, but not for conveyance; Wilks v. Smith, 10 M. & W. 355 (1842), same; Dicker v. Jackson, 6 C. B. 103 (1848); Sibthorp v. Brunel, 3 Exch. 826 (1849). Contra; Marsden v. Moore, 4 H. & N. 500 (1859).

Where the plaintiff has made no promise or covenant, so that the defendant would have no affirmative remedy, the courts were astute to import a condition precedent to the defendant's duty. See Lock v. Wright, 1 Str. 569 (1723); Collins v. Gibbs, 2 Burr. 899 (1759); Austin v. Jervoyse, Hob. 69 (1615), plaintiff's promise voidable for infancy.

Footnote by the reporter, Serjeant Williams:

"Almost all the old cases, and many of the modern ones on this subject, are decided upon distinctions so nice and technical, that it is very difficult, if not impracticable, to deduce from them any certain rule or principle by which it can be ascertained, what covenants are independent, and what dependent; and of course, when it is necessary to aver performance in the declaration, and when not. Thus if A covenant with B to serve him for a year, and B covenant with A to pay him £10, it is held that these are independent covenants, and A may maintain an action against B for the money before any service; but if B had covenanted to pay him £10 for the service, these words make the service a condition precedent, and A cannot enforce payment of the money until he has performed the service. So where A covenants with B to marry his daughter, and B covenants to convey an estate to A and the daughter in special tail, it is said that though A marry another woman, or the daughter another man, still A may have an action against B on the covenant; but if B had covenanted to convey the estate for the cause aforesaid, the marriage is a condition precedent, and no action will lie until it be solemnized. 15 H. 7, 10, pl. 17; Bro. Covenant, 22; 12 Mod. 460, Thorpe v. Thorpe; Hob. 106, Lampleigh v. Brathwait. * * * So where B covenanted with C his copyholder, to assure to him and his heirs the freehold and inheritance of his copyhold, and C, in consideration of the same performed, covenanted to pay such a sum, it was adjudged that this was a condition precedent, and B must make the assurance before he is entitled to the money; but if the words had been, in consideration of the said covenant to be performed, B might bring an action for the money before he made the assurance. 3 Leon. 219, Brocas's case. And lastly, where articles of agreement were made between A and B and a covenant by A, that, for the consideration thereafter expressed, he should convey certain lands to B in fee, and B, on his part, for the consideration aforesaid, covenanted to pay a sum of money to A; it was held, that these were independent covenants, and A might bring an action for the money before any conveyance of the lands. 1 Rol. Abr. 415, pl. 8 S. C. cited 12 Mod. 463, Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Ld. Raym. 665, 666, 1 Lutw. 251, 252. There are many other authorities of a similar nature which I refer the reader to. 1 Rol. Rep. 336, Spanish Ambassador v. Gifford; Yelv. 133, 134, Bettisworth v. Campion; Hob. 88, Nichols v. Raynbred; 1 Lev. 293, Beany v. Turner; Hard. 102, 103, Gibbons v. Prewde; 1 Str. 535, Blackwell v. Nash; Ibid. 712, Dawson v. Myer; 1 Wils. 88, Martindale v. Fisher. Hence it appears that the Judges in these cases seem to have founded their construction of the independency or dependency of covenants or agreements on artificial and subtle distinctions, without regarding the intent and meaning of the parties. For the rule which is contained in them all seems clear and indisputable; that where there are several covenants, promises, or agreements, which are independent of each other, one party may bring an action against the other for a breach of his covenants, &c. without averring a performance of the covenants, &c. on his, the plaintiff's part; and it is no excuse for the defendant to allege in his plea a breach of the covenants, &c. on the part of the plaintiff; according to Justinian's rule in the civil law, 'Qui actionem habet ad rem recuperandum, ipsam rem habere, videtur.' Justin. de Regulis Juris, 361. But where the covenants, &c. are dependent, it is necessary for the plaintiff to aver and prove a performance of the covenants, &c. on his part, to entitle himself to an action for the breach of the covenants on the part of the defendant; and so are also 7 Rep. 10 a. b. Ughtred's case; Doug. 690, 3d ed. Kingston v. Preston, cited in Jones v. Barkley. The difficulty lies in the application of this rule to the particular case. It is justly observed, that covenants, &c. are to be construed to be either dependent or independent of each other, according to the intention and meaning of the parties, and the good sense of the case; and technical words should give way to such intention. 1 T. R. 645, Hotham v. East India Company; 6 T. R. 668, Porter v. Shepard; Ibid. 571, Campbell v. Jones; 7 T. R. 130, Morton v. Lamb. In order therefore to discover that intention, and thereby to learn, with some degree of certainty, when performance is necessary to be averred in the declaration, and when not, it may not be improper to lay down a few rules, which will perhaps be found useful for that purpose.

1. If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money, or other act, is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that, which is the consideration of the money or other act. Dyer, 76 a. in margine; 1 Salk. 171, Thorpe v. Thorpe; S. C. 1 Ld. Raym. 665, 1 Lutw. 250, 12 Mod. 461; 1 Vent. 177, Peters v. Opie, per Hale C. J.; 2 Saund. 350, S. C.; 1 Salk. 113, Callonel v. Briggs; 2 H. Black, 389, Terry v. Duntze; 6 T. R. 572, Campbell v. Jones. This seems to be the ground of the judgment in this case of Pordage v. Cole, the money being appointed to be paid on a fixed day, which might happen before the lands were, or could be, conveyed. * * * [Rule 1 is often approved today. See Mass. Biog. Soc. v. Russell, 229 Mass. 524, 118 N. E. 662 (1918); Glaser v. Donnelley (N. M.) 170 Pac. 63 (1918); Allard v. Belfast, 40 Me. 369 (1855); Powers Reg. Co. v. Hoffmann, 169 Ill. App. 657 (1912). But cf. Roberts v. Brett, 11 H. L. C. 337 (1865)].

But, 2. When a day is appointed for the payment of money, &c. and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration of the money, &c. is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, &c. before performance. 1 Salk. 171, Thorpe v. Thorpe, 2d Resolution, 12 Mod. 462, 1 Ld. Raym. 665, 1 Lutw. 251; Dyer 76 a. pl. 30.

3. Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant, without averring performance in the declaration. [The cases of Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, and Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570, were here discussed.] Hence it appears that the reason of the decision in these and other similar cases, besides the inequality of the damages, seems to be, that where a person has received a part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, it would be unjust that because he has not had the whole, he should therefore be permitted to enjoy that part without either paying or doing any thing for it. Therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves him to his remedy to recover any damage he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration. * * *

4. But where the mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, and performance must be averred. 1 Vent. 147, Large v. Cheshire; 1 H. Black. 270, Duke of St. Albans v. Shore.

5. Where two acts are to be done at the same time, as where A covenants to convey an estate to B on such a day, and in consideration thereof B covenants to pay A a sum of money on the same day, neither can maintain an action without shewing performance of, or an offer to perform his part, though it is not certain which of them is obliged to do the first act: and this particularly applies to all cases of sale. 1 Salk. 112, 113, Callonel v. Briggs; Ibid. 171, Thorpe v. Thorpe; 2 Salk. 623, Lancashire v. Killingworth; Doug. 691, 3d Ed., Kingston v. Preston; Ibid. 684, Jones v. Barkley; 4 T. R. 761, Goodisson v. Nunn; 6 T. R. 665, Porter v. Shephard; 7 T. R. 125, Morton v. Lamb; 8 T. R. 366, Glazebrook v. Woodrow; 2 Saund. 352, Peeters v. Opie, note

CALLONEL v. BRIGGS.

(In the Court of King's Bench, 1703. 1 Salk. 112.)

An agreement was, that the defendant should pay so much money six months after the bargain, the plaintiff transferring stock. The plaintiff at the same time gave a note to the defendant to transfer the stock, the defendant paying, &c. Et per HOLT, C. J. If either party would sue upon this agreement, the plaintiff for not paying, or the defendant for not transferring, the one must aver and prove a transfer or a tender, and the other a payment or a tender; for transferring in the first bargain was a condition precedent; and though there be mutual promises, yet if one thing be the consideration of the other, there a performance is necessary to be averred, unless a certain day be appointed for performance: 1 Saund. 319. If I sell you my horse for £10 if you will have the horse I must have the money; or, if I will have the money, you must have the horse; therefore he obliged the plaintiff either to prove a transfer, or a tender and refusal within the six months

KINGSTON v. PRESTON.

(In the King's Bench, 1773. 2 Doug. 689, Quoted in Jones v. Barkley, 2 Doug. 684.)

"It was an action of debt, for non-performance of covenants contained in certain articles of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The declaration stated:—That, by articles made the 24th of March, 1770, the plaintiff, for the considerations therein-after mentioned, covenanted, with the defendant, to serve him for one year and a quarter next ensuing, as a covenant-servant, in his trade of a silk-mercer, at £200 a year, and in consideration of the premises, the defendant covenanted, that at the end of the year and a quarter, he would give up his business of a mercer to the plaintiff, and a nephew of the defendant, or some other person to be nominated by the defendant, and give up to them his stock in trade, at a fair valuation; and that, between the young traders, deeds of partnership should be executed for 14 years, and from and immediately after the execution of the said deeds, the defendant would permit the said young traders to carry on the said business in the defendant's house.—Then the declaration stated a covenant by the plaintiff, that he would accept the business and stock in trade, at a fair valuation, with the defendant's nephew, or such other person, &c., and execute such deeds of partnership, and, further, that the plaintiff should, and would, at, and before, the sealing and delivery of the deeds, cause and procure good and sufficient security to be given to the defendant, to be approved of by the defendant, for the payment of £250 monthly, to the defendant, in lieu of a moiety of the monthly produce of the stock in trade, until the value of the stock should be reduced to £4,000.—Then the plaintiff averred, that he had performed, and been ready to perform, his covenants, and assigned for breach on the part of the defendant, that he had refused to surrender and give up his business, at the end of the said year and quarter.—The defendant pleaded, 1. That the plaintiff did not offer sufficient security; and, 2. That he did not give sufficient security for the payment of the £250, &c.—And the plaintiff demurred generally to both pleas.—On the part of the plaintiff, the case was argued by Mr. Buller, who contended, that the covenants were mutual and independent, and therefore, a plea of the breach of one of the covenants to be performed by the plaintiff was no bar to an action for a breach by the defendant of one of which he had bound himself to perform, but that the defendant might have his remedy for the breach by the plaintiff, in a separate action. On the other side, Mr. Grose insisted, that the covenants were dependent in their nature, and therefore, performance must be alleged: the security to be given for the money, was manifestly the chief object of the transaction, and it would be highly unreasonable to construe the agreement, so as to oblige the defendant to give up a beneficial business, and valuable stock in trade, and trust to the plaintiff's personal security, (who might, and, indeed, was admitted to be worth nothing,) for the performance of his part.—In delivering the judgment of the Court, Lord MANSFIELD expressed himself to the following effect: There are three kinds of covenants: 1. Such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other, for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favour, and where it is no excuse for the defendant, to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. 2. There are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. 3. There is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and, in these, if one party was ready, and offered to perform his part, and the other neglected, or refused, to perform his, he who was ready, and offered, has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act.—His Lordship then proceeded to say, that the dependence, or independence, of covenants, was to be collected from the evident sense and meaning of the parties, and that, however transposed they might be in the deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time in which the intent of the transaction requires their performance. That, in the case before the Court, it would be the greatest injustice if the plaintiff should prevail: the essence of the agreement was, that the defendant should not trust to the personal security of the plaintiff, but, before he delivered up his stock and business, should have good security for the payment of the money. The giving such security, therefore, must necessarily be a condition precedent.—Judgment was accordingly given for the defendant because the part to be performed by the plaintiff was clearly a condition precedent."

In Thorpe v. Thorpe, 12 Mod. 455 (1701), Holt, C. J., constructed similar rules, and said: "What is the reason that mutual promises shall bear an action without performance? One's bargain is to be performed according as he makes it. If he make a bargain, and rely on the other's covenant or promise to have what he would have done to him, it is his own fault. If the agreement be, that A shall have the horse of B and A agree that B shall have his money, they may make it so; and then there needs no averment of performance to maintain an action on either side; but if it appear by the agreement that the plain intent of either party was to have the thing to be done to him performed before his doing what he undertakes of his side, it must be then averred; as where a man agrees to give so much money for a horse, it is plain he meant to have the horse first, and, therefore, he says the money shall be given for the horse."

CLARK v. GULESIAN.

Action by F. Warren Clark against Moses H. Gulesian for breach of contract. From a judgment for defendant, entered on sustaining a demurrer to the declaration, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The following is plaintiff's amended declaration: "And the plaintiff says that on or about the 16th day of February, A. D. 1907, the defendant requested the plaintiff to estimate the cost of erecting and completing and requested the plaintiff to make an offer of a price for which the plaintiff would erect and complete a building on the corner of Harcourt and Irvington streets in the city of Boston in accordance with certain plans and specifications then and there shown by the defendant to the plaintiff. And the defendant promised and agreed that if the said offer of a price for erecting and completing said building was accepted by the defendant the defendant would execute and deliver to the plaintiff a good and sufficient bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars conditioned on the performance in all respects on the part of the defendant of a contract for the erection and completion of said building in accordance with plans and specifications at the price named in said offer. And the plaintiff says that he estimated the cost of said building and made an offer of a price, to wit, the sum of $77,500, for which the plaintiff would erect and complete said building. And the plaintiff says that the defendant then and there duly accepted said offer, and the defendant made an oral contract with the plaintiff under the terms of which contract the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant to erect and finish said building in accordance with said plans and specifications, and the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of seventy-seven thousand five hundred dollars ($77,500) for the erection and completion of said building from time to time as the work progressed and to execute and deliver a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $20,000 conditioned on the performance on the part of the defendant of all the obligations of said contract. And the plaintiff says that he has been always ready and willing to carry out said contract, but the defendant thereafter neglected and refused to execute and deliver any bond in accordance with his aforesaid contract, promise and agreement, and by reason of said neglect he has been unable to carry out said contract and prevented from carrying out said contract to the great damage of the plaintiff."

Braley, J. The declaration after allegations of preliminary negotiations, sets forth the oral building contract into which the parties entered. By its terms, the plaintiff contracted to erect and complete a building according to certain plans and specifications, for which the defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum "from time to time as the work progressed," and to furnish a bond to secure the performance of his promise. The contract having contained no provisions as to the time within which the building was to be begun and finished, or the bond given, the plaintiff became entitled to a reasonable time within which to perform, while the delivery of the bond was intended to be concurrent with the making of the contract. It evidently was the intention of the parties that full compensation was not to be made until completion, even if installments were to be advanced as the work progressed, and the contract being indivisible, performance by one party was conditioned, upon performance by the other. Fullam v. Wright & Colton Wire Cloth Co., 196 Mass. 474, 82 N. E. 711. But while the principal purpose was the erection of the building, yet the giving of security for the payment of the price, was intended to be a precedent condition, before performance by the plaintiff could be demanded. Cadwell v. Blake, 6 Gray, 402. The plaintiff alleges his readiness to have gone forward, but it is averred that the defendant absolutely refused to execute and deliver the bond, and this refusal prevented him from performance. By his unqualified refusal the defendant placed himself in default, and the plaintiff had the right either to rescind the contract, leaving him without any cause of action, or to treat it as terminated, and bring suit for such damages as he had suffered from the breach. Earnshaw v. Whittemore, 194 Mass. 187, 80 N. E. 520, 521, and cases cited.

The necessary averments, upon proof of which the plaintiff is entitled at least to nominal damages having been stated with substantial certainty, the declaration is sufficient, and the demurrer not well taken. Rev. Laws, c. 173, § 6.

Judgment reversed. Demurrer overruled.

MORTON v. LAMB.

(In the Court of King's Bench, 1797. 7 Term R. 125.)

In an action on the case the plaintiff declared against the defendant, for that whereas on the 10th Feb. 1796, at Manchester, in the county of Lancaster, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, had then and there bought of the defendant 200 quarters of wheat at £5 0s. 6d. per quarter, such price to be therefore paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, he, the defendant, undertook and then and there promised the plaintiff to deliver the said corn to him (the plaintiff,) at Shardlow, in the county of Derby, in one month from that time, viz. of the sale; and then he alleged that although he (the plaintiff) always, from the time of making such sale for the space of one month then next following and afterwards, was ready and willing to receive the said corn at Shardlow, yet the defendant not regarding his said promise, &c. did not in one month from the time of the making of such sale as aforesaid, or at any other time, deliver the said corn to the plaintiff at Shardlow, or elsewhere, although he (the defendant) was often requested so to do, &c. The defendant pleaded the general issue; and at the trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict.

Holroyd obtained, in the last term, a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment should not be arrested, because it was not averred that the plaintiff had tendered to the defendant the price of the corn, or was ready to have paid for it on delivery. He said this was necessary on the principle established in many cases, particularly in Thorpe v. Thorpe, Salk. 171, Callonel v. Briggs, Ib. 113, Kingston v. Preston, 2 Dougl. 689, Jones v. Barkley, 2 Dougl. 684, and Goodison v. Nunn, 4 T. R. 761, that when something is to be done by both parties to a contract at the same time, as in this case the tendering of the money and the delivery of the corn, there the party suing the other for non-performance of his part, must aver an offer at least at the same time to perform what was to be done by himself.

Law, Wood, and Scarlett, now shewed cause. The covenants here are mutual and independent, and each party has a remedy by action against the other for non-performance of his part. But if there be any precedence between them, the delivery of the goods ought, in the regular order of things, to precede the payment of the price. In neither case can the averment contended for be necessary. The distinction is taken in many cases, that where two things are to be done, and the time of doing it is mentioned for one and not for the other, there the thing for doing which the time is stipulated must be done first, and so averred to be. * * * Here the first act to be done was by the defendant, namely, the carrying of the corn to Shardlow; by not doing which he broke his agreement, and a cause of action accrued to the plaintiff according to that class of cases, wherein agreements of this sort have been construed to give mutual remedies to the parties. But admitting that he was not bound to deliver the corn there until the plaintiff was prepared to pay for it; still that ought to come from the defendant by way of excuse, and the tender of payment was not necessary to be averred by the plaintiff as a condition precedent to the right of action. * * *

Holroyd, contra.[32]

Lord KENYON, C. J. If this question depended on the technical niceties of pleading, I should not feel so much confidence as I do: but it depends altogether on the true construction of this agreement. The defendant agreed with the plaintiff for a certain quantity of corn, to be delivered at Shardlow within a certain time, and there can be no doubt but that the parties intended that the payment should be made at the time of the delivery. It is not imputed to the defendant that he did not carry the corn to Shardlow, but that he did not deliver it to the plaintiff: to this declaration the defendant objects, and says "I did not deliver the corn to you (the plaintiff), because you do not say that you were ready to pay for it; and if you were not ready, I am not bound to deliver the corn;" and the question is, whether that should or should not have been alleged. The case decided by Lord Holt in Salk. 112 [Callonel v. Briggs], if indeed so plain a case wanted that authority to support it, shews that where two concurrent acts are to be done, the party who sues the other for non-performance must aver that he had performed, or was ready to perform, his part of the contract. Then the plaintiff in this case cannot impute to the defendant the non-delivery of the corn, without alleging that he was ready to pay the price of it. A plaintiff, who comes into a Court of Justice, must shew that he is in a condition to maintain his action. But it has been argued that the delivery of the corn was a condition precedent, and some cases have been cited to prove it: but they do not appear to me to be applicable. In the one in Saunders [2 Saund. 250] the party was to pull down a wall, and was then to be paid for it; there is no doubt but that the pulling down of the wall was a condition precedent to the payment; the act was to be done, and then the price was to be paid for it. So in the case in Salk. 171, where work was to be done, and then the workman was to be paid. And in ordinary cases of this kind the work is to be done before the wages are earned: but those cases do not apply to the present, where both the acts are to be done at the same time. Speaking of conditions precedent and subsequent in other cases only leads to confusion. In the case of Campbell v. Jones [6. T. R. 570] I thought, and still continue of that opinion, that whether covenants be or be not independent of each other must depend on the good sense of the case, and on the order in which the several things are to be done: but here both things, the delivery of the corn by one, and the payment by the other, were to be done at the same time; and as the plaintiff has not averred that he was ready to pay for the corn, he cannot maintain this action against the defendant for not delivering it.

[32] Arguments of counsel have been abridged and the concurring opinions of Grose and Lawrence, JJ., omitted.

Rule absolute.[33]

GOODISSON v. NUNN.

(In the Court of King's Bench, 1792. 4 Term R. 761.)

This was an action of debt to recover £21 on certain articles of agreement, the substance of which was stated in the declaration. The defendant craved oyer of the agreement by which the plaintiff agreed that he would on or before the 2d of September then next, "by such conveyances, surrenders, assurances, ways, and means in the law, shall reasonably devise, advise, or require, well and sufficiently grant, sell and release, assign and surrender, or otherwise convey to the defendant all that copyhold tenement lying," &c. In consideration whereof the defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £210 on or before the 2d day of September next ensuing; on failure of complying with the before mentioned agreement the defendant was to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £21; and if the plaintiff did not deliver the estate according to the before-mentioned agreement, then he was to pay to the defendant the sum of £21. It was further agreed between the parties, that the plaintiff should take up the copyhold as follows: (that is to say) "That the plaintiff should take it up either for the defendant or his wife, as they should agree at the time; that the plaintiff should take it up for himself; that each party should pay share and share alike towards the expences attending the taking it up." The defendant then pleaded, 1st, Non est factum; 2dly, That the plaintiff did not on or before the 2d day of September next, &c., by such conveyances, assurances, surrenders, ways and means in the law rea-[33] Unless a contract for the sale of goods expressly sets the time of delivery and the time of payment, it is normally to be implied that they are to be performed concurrently, and a tender of performance by one is a condition precedent to the duty of the other. E. 246 (1903)]); Diem v. Koblitz, 49 Ohio St. 41, 29 N. E. 1124, 34 Am. St. Rep. 531 (1892).

If a time is set for delivery earlier than the time set for payment the promise to deliver is independent and the promise to pay is dependent. Staunton v. Wood, 16 Q. B. 638 (1851); Dey v. Dox, 9 Wend. (N. Y) 129, 24 Am. Dec. 162 (1832).

sonably devised, advised, and required, well and sufficiently grant, sell, and release, assign and surrender, or otherwise convey to the defendant the said premises in the said articles of agreement mentioned, &c. 3dly, That the plaintiff did not on or before the 2d day of September, &c., or at any time since, well and sufficiently grant, sell, and release, assign and surrender, or otherwise convey, to the defendant, the said premises, &c. 4thly, That the plaintiff at the time of the making of the articles, &c. had nothing in the said premises, whereby he could be enabled to grant, &c., to the defendant the said premises, &c.

To the last three pleas the plaintiff demurred generally.

Lord KENYON, C. J. This case is extremely clear, whether considered on principles of strict law or of common justice. The plaintiff engaged to sell an estate to the defendant, in consideration of which the defendant undertook to pay £210; and, if he did not carry the contract into execution, he was to pay £21; and now not having conveyed his estate, or offered to do so, or taken any one step towards it, the plaintiff has brought this action for the penalty. Suppose the purchase-money of an estate was £40,000 it would be absurd to say that the purchaser might enforce a conveyance without payment, and compel the seller to have recourse to him, who perhaps might be an insolvent person. The old cases, cited by the plaintiff's counsel, have been accurately stated; but the determinations in them outrage common sense. I admit the principle on which they profess to go: but I think that the Judges misapplied that principle. It is admitted in them all that where they are dependent covenants, no action will lie by one party unless he have performed, or offered to perform his covenant. Then the question is, Whether these are, or are not, dependent covenants? I think they are; the one is to depend on the other; when the one party conveyed his estate he was to receive the purchas-money; and when the other parted with his money he was to have the estate. They were reciprocal acts, to be performed by each other at the same time. It seems, from the case in Strange [Blackwell v. Nash, 1 Strange, 535], that the Judges were surprized at the old decisions; and in order to get rid of the difficulty, they said that a tender and refusal would amount to a performance: it is true they went farther, and said that "in consideration of the premises," meant only in consideration of the covenant to transfer, and not in consideration of the actual transferring of the stock: but to the latter part of that judgment I cannot accede. It is our duty, when we see that principles of law have been misapplied in any case, to over-rule it. The principle is admitted in all the cases alluded to, that, if they be dependent covenants, performance, or the offer to perform, must be pleaded on the one part, in order to found the action against the other. The mistake has been in the misapplication of that principle in the cases cited; and I am glad to find that the old cases have been over-ruled; and that we are now warranted by precedent as well as by principle to say that this action canot be maintained.

Judgment for the defendant.[34]

SHERMAN v. LEVERET et al.

(Superior Court of Connecticut, 1790. 1 Root, 169.)

Action declaring that the defendants, on the 2nd of October, A. D. 1786, made a written contract and bargain with the plaintiff, which is in the words following, viz. October 2d, A. D. 1786, agreed that David Leveret, Jr. and Co. give Peter Sherman £170 lawful money for his store, land and barn, in Washington; half to be paid next spring, in cash when Sherman is to quit said store, and half the spring after, in good neat, saleable cattle, with interest after next spring until paid. Peter Sherman, David Leveret, Jr. and Co.—and the plaintiff says that by said store, land and barn, mentioned in said writing, was meant the store then occupied by the plaintiff, and a small tract of land on which it stood and lay contiguous to it, and a small barn standing thereon: and the plaintiff says that the defendants entered upon said land sometime in April, A. D. 1787, in pursuance of said written bargain and agreement, and improved the same, and the plaintiff quitted said store upon the request of the defendants, pursuant to said agreement, and fulfilled everything on his part to complete and carry the same into execution; but the defendants have wholly neglected to fulfill said bargain and contract on their part, and have never made said payments, promised in said agreement, although often requested—Damage £200, dated 15th November, A. D. 1788.

Plea—Not guilty. Issue to the court—Judgment that the defendants are not guilty.

LEVERET AND BELLAMY v. SHERMAN.

Action declaring that on the 2d of October, A. D. 1786, they purchased of the defendant a piece of land, lying in Washington, containing about three-quarters of an acre, together with a store and barn thereon standing, and that the plaintiffs and the defendant did enter into the following agreement, viz. Washington, October 2d, 1786, agreed that David Leveret, Jr. and Co. give to Peter Sherman £170, lawful money, for his store, land and barn, in said Washington, one-half to be paid next spring, in cash, when said Sherman is to quit said store and execute a warranty deed of the same to said Leveret and Co. and half the spring following, in good neat cattle, on interest from the first payment till paid; and the plaintiffs say that the defendant did not quit said store nor execute a warranty deed to the plaintiffs in the spring succeeding October, A. D. 1786, according to said agreement, but continued in possession of said premises, and utterly refused to quit or convey the same to the plaintiffs, whereby an action has accrued to the plaintiffs to recover of the defendant their just damages, which is £100, lawful money, writ dated 15th November, A. D. 1788. Plea—Not guilty. Issue to the court.

Judgment—That the defendant is not guilty.

The two preceding cases were heard and tried by the court together, and upon the evidence, the court found that neither of the parties had performed or made any tender of performing their parts of the agreement. The question then came up, whether, as they were mutual covenants, one was the consideration of the other; and so a performance not necessary to be laid in the declaration, nor to be proved on the trial.

The defendants, in the first action, insisted that the plaintiff, by the stipulations in the agreement, was to do the first act, viz. was to quit the store, etc. and to give a deed of the premises the then next spring; when, and not till that was done, did the duty of paying arise; but it was the opinion of the court, that by the terms of the contract; the quitting the store, etc., and giving a deed of the premises, the then next spring, when half of the price was to be paid, were concurrent, concomitant acts, to be performed by each of the parties at the same time; and that neither had right to recover, without a performance of his or their part of the agreement, or at least an offer to perform it

GREEN v. REYNOLDS.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1807. 2 Johns. 207.)

This was an action of covenant. By articles of agreement entered into between the parties, the plaintiff, for the consideration therein after-mentioned, covenanted to execute and deliver to the defendant a good and sufficient deed for eighty-four acres of land, in Pittstown, in the county of Rensselaer, on the first day of May, 1806. The defendant, on his part, covenanted to pay to the plaintiff, one thousand dollars, on the first day of May, 1806, and the further sum of eight hundred and seventy-five dollars, on the first day of May, 1812. The declaration was for the non-payment of the one thousand dollars, but did not aver that the plaintiff had tendered a deed on the first day of May, 1806. There was a general demurrer to the declaration, and joinder in demurrer.

Allen, in support of the demurrer.[35]

[35] Allen here cited Jones v. Barkley, Doug. 689 (1781); Goodisson v. Nunn, 4 T. R. 761 (1792); Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570 (1796); Kingston v. Preston, Doug. 688 (1773); Callonel v. Briggs, 1 Salk. 113 (1705); Morton v. Lamb, 7 T. R. 130 (1797).

KENT, C. J. It has been decided in this court, in regard to a contract for the delivery of stock, that the delivery, and payment of the money were dependent covenants, and that the plaintiff must aver a performance, or an offer to perform, before he could bring his action.

Allen was stopped by the court, who desired to hear the other side.

Foot, contra. The principle laid down in the authorities cited by the counsel, on the other side, apply to cases where the whole consideration is to be paid, not where a part of the money is to be paid, on the day the deed is to be delivered, and the residue afterwards. In the present case, a part only of the money was to be paid, so that the covenants are not mutual and dependent conditions, but each party has his remedy without averring a performance.

PER CURIAM. The covenants in this case are clearly dependent. The one thousand dollars, being in part of the consideration for the deed, and to be paid on the same day the deed was to be delivered, the fair intent, and good sense of the contract is, that the money is not to be paid, until the deed is ready for delivery. The declaration, therefore, is defective in not averring a tender of the deed by the plaintiff. We are of opinion, that the defendant is entitled to judgment; but the plaintiff may amend his declaration on payment of the costs.

Judgment for the defendant.[36]

NOYES v. BROWN et al.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1919. 142 Minn. 211, 171 N. W. 803.)

Action by Williard L. Noyes against Edward Richard Brown and others, with answer only by defendant Brown. Verdict directed for defendant Brown and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order reversed.

LEES, C. This action was brought to recover all deferred payments of the purchase price of 40 acres of land in Saskatchewan, Canada,

Where a contract has been made for the sale of land, the continued existence of the buildings thereon is generally held not to be a condition precedent to the buyer's duty to pay the price. Especially is this true if the time for performance has arrived, or if the buyer has taken possession before the loss. The rule is explained partly on the theory that in equity the buyer is the owner, and res perit domino. See Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349 (1801); Ames' Cases on Equity, 227, citing many cases; Sewell v. Underhill, 197 N. Y. 168, 90 N. E. 430, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 233, and note, 184 Am. St. Rep. 863, 18 Ann. Cas. 795 (1910). The contrary rule is adopted in a few jurisdictions. Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 134 (1838); Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, 9 Am. Rep. 65 (1871). See, also, post, 8̣2.

sold to defendants by one Upton under a written contract thereafter assigned to plaintiff.

The answer interposed by defendant Brown, upon whom alone the summons was served, was a general denial.

There was a trial by jury and a directed verdict for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Defendant has not appeared in this court, and the case has been submitted on the brief and oral argument of plaintiff's counsel.

The motion for a directed verdict was based on three grounds, which may be stated as follows: That an action at law on a contract for the sale of land to recover the purchase price will not lie; that plaintiff failed to plead or prove that he had tendered a deed to defendant or was able and willing to convey the land to him; and that defendant was entitled to a deed from Upton, his immediate vendor, who had disabled himself from conveying by transferring his interest in the land to plaintiff.

Unaided by brief or argument by defendant's counsel, we have attempted to discover a theory upon which the ruling of the trial court might be sustained.

1. In Freeman v. Paulson, 107 Minn. 64, 119 N. W. 651, 131 Am. St. Rep. 438, it was held that a vendor of land is not entitled to recover the purchase price from his vendee in an ordinary action at law, but is limited to a recovery of the damages he has sustained by reason of the breach of the contract, if legal, as distinguished from equitable, relief is sought.

In that case, the vendee was to make an initial payment when the contract was executed, and final payment upon the delivery of the deed. In the case at bar the contract provides for the payment of $1,000 on the day of its execution and of $4,000 in four equal semi-annual installments. It recites that the times of such payments shall be "a condition precedent and of the essence of this agreement"; that the vendee will "punctually pay the sums of money above specified as each of the same becomes due"; that if he makes the payments as stipulated then "upon request at the office of the vendor * * * at the city of Saskatoon, and the surrender of this agreement, [he] shall be entitled to a conveyance of said land in fee simple"; that if he fails in the strict performance of his part of the agreement, the vendor shall have the right to declare the contract null and void by notice in writing to that effect, "but that no forfeiture shall take away the right of the vendor to recover the purchase money"; that the vendee "accepts title of the vendor, and the said vendor, * * * or assigns, as the case may be, shall not be bound to furnish any abstract of title nor to produce any title deeds nor other evidence of title whatever, or to answer any requisition on title"; and that the vendee, after the execution of the contract, shall have the right of possession of the land.

Appellant contends that these provisions distinguish this contract from the one considered in Freeman v. Paulson, supra. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained.

In the Freeman Case final payment of the purchase price and the execution of the deed were to be concurrent acts. Here payment of the purchase price is expressly made a condition precedent to the right of the vendee to a conveyance. In the ordinary contract for the sale of land the vendee's covenant to pay and the vendor's to convey are mutual and dependent, but here the covenant to pay is to be performed before the vendor's covenant to convey becomes operative. When final payment is made, the vendee is to get his deed "upon request at the office of the vendor" and the surrender of the contract.

In a contract to convey as soon as the vendor obtained title to the land, this court held that "where, by the terms of a contract, the time to perform the covenant on the one side is to happen * * * before the time for the performance of the covenant on the other side, the former is not dependent on the latter." State v. Winona, etc., Co., 21 Minn. 472.

Where the contract provided that the time for paying the consideration was a date prior to that for the transfer of the property, it held that the payment of the consideration was intended to be a condition precedent to the obligation to transfer. Robson v. Bohn, 27 Minn. 333–344, 7 N. W. 357. It has also held that "the question whether covenants are to be held to be dependent on or independent of each other turns upon the intention of the parties, to be ascertained from the subject-matter and terms of their contract. Such intention is paramount, to which, when once discovered, all technical forms of expression must yield." Reynolds v. Lynch, 98 Minn. 58, 107 N. W. 145.

The doctrine of these three cases is fully supported by the decisions of other courts. Early cases recognized nice and refined distinctions in determining the character of covenants. The rule is now thoroughly settled that the intention of the parties is the vital thing, that it is to be ascertained from the sense of the entire contract rather than from any particular form of expression, and that the order of time in which it is intended that performance shall take place is a controlling circumstance. Rules were formulated long ago in a note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319 i. This is one of them:

"If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it * * * and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money * * * is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money * * * before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration of the money."

In Paine v. Brown, 37 N. Y. 228, this rule was cited with approval.

Following the lead of New York, the courts in many other states have since given their approval to the rule. It is unnecessary to rehearse the cases here. They are collected in 13 C. J. § 540.

The following language quoted from Collins v. Schmidt, 126 Wis. 227, 105 N. W. 671, exactly fits the case at bar: "Under a contract like this, where conveyance is only to be made upon demand after completed payment, the promise of payment is absolute and may be enforced by suit without tender of conveyance. The duty of the vendor to convey is neither a condition precedent to payment nor an act which may be demanded concurrently therewith."

2. The consideration which led to the adoption of the rule that an action at law to recover the purchase price in an executory contract for the sale of land will not lie was first stated in the early case of Laird v. Pim, 7 M. & W. 474, as follows: "The question is: How much worse off is the plaintiff by the diminution of the value of the land, or the loss of the purchase money in consequence of the non-performance of the contract? It is clear that he cannot have the land and its value, too."

We find this thought expressed in substantially the same language in subsequent cases and by text-writers. Porter v. Travis, 40 Ind. 556; Prichard v. Mulhall, 127 Iowa, 545, 103 N. W. 774, 4 Ann. Cas. 789; Hogan v. Kyle, 7 Wash. 595, 35 Pac. 399, 38 Am. St. Rep. 910; Bensinger v. Erhardt, 74 App. Div. 169, 77 N. Y. Supp. 577; 2 Warv. Vnd. § 937; 2 Suth. Dam. § 569. It would be manifestly unjust to give the vendor the purchase money and allow him to keep the land. If such were the result of permitting a recovery of the purchase price we should hesitate to sanction a recovery. The situation which has troubled the courts and which is presented in this case may be thus stated:

A vendor whose contract entitles him to receive the purchase price before he can be called upon to convey, or who is to have a reasonable time after he gets his money within which to convey, cannot logically be denied the right to sue for and recover the purchase price after it falls due; but, if he may get judgment and collect it before conveying, a vendee whose contract is not recorded and who is not in possession may be deprived of the land through a wrongful conveyance to another, or through judgments against the vendor, and, if his vendor is contumacious, he may be put to the expense of a suit in equity to get title to the land after paying for it. The situation has been met in various ways by different courts. Some have cast logic aside, and while permitting a recovery of all but the last installment of the purchase price, have refused to allow it to be recovered in an action at law, no matter how trifling it may be. The rule adopted in these cases is that the vendor may sue for each installment as it falls due except the last. If he waits until all the installments are due, and then sues for the whole obligation, or, having been paid all but the last installment, he sues for that, he must first tender a deed, and cannot recover in the absence of such tender. Biddle v. Coryell, 18 N. J. Law, 377; 38 Am. Dec. 521; Robinson v. Harbour, 42 Miss. 795, 97 Am. Dec. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 671; First Nat. Bank v. Agnew, 45 Wis. 131; Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126.

Another line of cases holds that there may be a money judgment for the entire purchase price, but that its enforcement will be stayed until the vendor deposits in court a deed, to be delivered to the vendee upon payment of the judgment. There is little practical difference between a judgment with execution stayed until a vendor deposits a deed and a judgment for the purchase money at the end of a suit for specific performance. The right to the latter remedy is well established. Freeman v. Paulson, supra; O. W. Kerr Co. v. Nygren, 114 Minn. 268, 130 N. W. 1112, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 538.

The former course of procedure has been termed an "irregular expedient to give a judgment at law the effect of specific performance, * * * of doubtful propriety in jurisdictions where * * * the distinction between actions at law and in equity is still preserved." Prichard v. Mulhall, supra. The expedient may be irregular, but its adoption is sanctioned in cases entitled to the highest consideration. Loud v. Pomona Co., 153 U. S. 564, 14 Sup. Ct. 928, 38 L. Ed. 822; Rindge v. Baker, 57 N. Y. 209–224, 15 Am. Rep. 475. The following statement is found in Freeman on Executions, § 32, and appears to be well fortified by numerous decisions:

"The power of courts to temporarily stay the issuing of execution is exercised in an almost infinite variety of circumstances, in order that the ends of justice may be accomplished. In many cases this power operates almost as a substitute for proceedings in equity, and enables the defendant to prevent any inequitable use of the judgment or writ"—citing among other cases Blair v. Hilgedick, 45 Minn. 23, 47 N. W. 310.

See, also, Richardson v. Merritt, 74 Minn. 354, 77 N. W. 234, 407, 968, and Eaton v. Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co. (C. C.) 41 Fed. 421.

Our conclusion is that if a vendor in such an action as is now before us, obtains judgment for the purchase price, it is the duty of the trial court to stay execution thereon until the deed is deposited with the clerk of court, to be delivered to the vendee on payment of the judgment, and that, the stay should be continued long enough to give the vendee a reasonable opportunity to ascertain whether the deed conveys the title in compliance with the terms of the contract. The views expressed in Knoblauch v. Foglesong, 37 Minn. 320, 33 N. W. 865, point to the conclusion we have reached on this phase of the case.

3. The complaint does not plead a tender of a deed, or ability and willingness on the part of the vendor to convey.

It would seem that such allegations have no place in an action to recover the purchase price when the covenant to pay it is independent of the covenant to convey.

Lewis v. Prendergast, 39 Minn. 301, 39 N. W. 802; one of the first cases to refer to the necessity of pleading an offer to perform, was a case where the covenants were held to be concurrent and dependent. That was an action for specific performance. In Blunt v. Egeland, 104 Minn. 351, 116 N. W. 653, an action for damages for breach of a contract for the sale of land, it was said by the present Chief Justice that, "generally speaking, where the stipulations of the contract are concurrent and dependent, a tender of performance before suit is necessary, * * * and in those cases where the time of performance is past an allegation of the failure and refusal by defendant to perform, the first act of performance being by the terms of the contract cast upon him, sufficiently states a right of action."

The language quoted precisely fits the case at bar, and the rule there laid down dispenses with necessity of pleading an offer to perform in such a case as we have here. The same rule was laid down in Gale v. Best, 20 Wis. 48, and in Shenners v. Pritchard, 104 Wis. 287, 80 N. W. 458.

There is nothing inconsistent in Freeman v. Paulson, supra. Had the contract in that case been similar in its terms to the contract now in question, the practice we have sanctioned here would have been applicable.

4. The provisions of the contract relating to the title defendant was to receive have been sufficiently pointed out. They do not entitle him to a deed with personal covenants by his vendor. If he receives a conveyance of title in fee, he will get all that the contract provides for. Such title may come from his vendor's assignee, or from any other source, provided it conveys the fee to him. The case does not fall within the rule stated in McNamara v. Pengilly, 64 Minn. 543, 67 N. W. 661, but is governed by Meyers v. Markham, 90 Minn. 230, 96 N. W. 335, 787, and McManus v. Blackmarr, 47 Minn. 331, 50 N. W. 230.

Order reversed.

McRAVEN v. CRISLER.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi, 1876. 53 Miss. 542.)

CHALMERS, J.[37] * * * By the defendant's sixth plea she averred "that the original note was given by her in consideration that the plaintiff would sell and convey to her by proper deed of conveyance the land," &c.; and that no deed had been tendered before suit brought. A deed was filed with the declaration, which, by the judgment of the court, was ordered to remain on file, and be delivered on payment of the judgment. Was there any obligation to tender it before the institution of the suit? There was no written contract to convey the land, nor any proof of a parol promise to do so. The question must therefore be tested by the averments of the plea.

[37] The statement of facts and a part of the opinion have been omitted.

It will be observed that there is no allegation that the deed was to be made at or before the payment of the note, nor is any time specified when the execution of the deed was to take place. The note was payable one day after date. While it is true that the courts will hold the covenant to pay and the covenant to make title as dependent, unless a contrary intention clearly appears, it is no less true that the covenants must be regarded as independent, where the time of payment precedes the time fixed for delivering the deed, or where no time for making title is specified. Gibson v. Newman, 1 How. 341; Leftwich v. Coleman, 3 How. 167; Rector v. Price, 3 How. 321; Robinson v. Harbour, 42 Miss. 795, 97 Am. Dec. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 671.

The case of Gibson v. Newman, supra, was much like the one at bar. In that case, as in this, there was no written obligation to convey, and the question was determined by the language of the plea. There, as here, the plea failed to aver any period when the deed was to be made; and upon this ground the covenants were held to be independent. That case is cited and approved in Robinson v. Harbour, ubi supra, the latest authoritative exposition of this court on the much-vexed question of dependent and independent covenants.

The demurrer to the plea in the case at bar was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

NORTHRUP v. NORTHRUP.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1826. 6 Cow. 296.)

On demurrer to the defendant's plea. The plaintiff declared on a covenant, which, on oyer, was as follows: The defendant covenanted to pay a certain rent due and in arrear, to one D. Tomlinson, on a certain farm, and all which should become due on the 25th of March, 1825; the whole to be paid on that day; and the plaintiff covenanted, that on the defendant's so paying the rent, he, the plaintiff, would give up and discharge a certain bond and mortgage. The action was for not paying the rent at the day.

Plea, that the plaintiff did not, on the 25th day of March, 1824, give up and discharge the bond and mortgage, nor tender, nor offer to do so, on that day, or before or since.

General demurrer and joinder.

CURIA per SAVAGE, C. J. The plea is bad. The payment of the money to Tomlinson, on the day specified, is clearly a condition precedent. The performance by the plaintiff of his part of the agreement is not necessarily simultaneous; but was naturally to be subsequent. A general averment of his readiness to perform, is all that can be necessary or proper. To aver a tender was certainly not necessary.

Lord Mansfield, in Jones v. Barkley, Doug. 690, makes three classes of covenants; 1. Such as are mutual and independent, where separate actions lie for breaches on either side; 2. Covenants which are conditions, and dependent on each other, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of the other; 3. Covenants which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time, as to which the party who would maintain an action must, in general, offer or tender performance. I consider the plaintiff's covenant as clearly belonging to the second class. The defendant's covenant was absolute. The cases cited by the defendant's counsel relate to the third class.

The plaintiff must have judgment, with leave to the defendant to amend on payment of costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff.[38]

INTERNATIONAL TEXT-BOOK CO. v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1915. 221 Mass. 1, 108 N. E. 469.)

Action by the International Text-Book Company against Charles D. Martin, to recover the balance due on a written contract between plaintiff and defendant's minor son, which contract the defendant had guaranteed in writing. Verdict directed for the plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

LORING, J.[39] By the written agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant's son, the son subscribed "for a scholarship in the International Correspondence Schools, covering a course of correspondence instruction in telephone engineering," and he promised to "pay for said scholarship the sum of" $78.40, in installments of $5 each, the first installment to be paid at the time of signing the subscription and the remaining installments "within each and every period of four weeks hereafter until said price is paid in full." It was further agreed that in case of default in the payment of any one of said installments when due and payable the whole of the amount remaining unpaid should thereupon at the option of the plaintiff become due and payable. The contract contained these further provisions:

"It is agreed as follows: First: That the price hereinafter agreed to be paid for said scholarship shall include: (a) All charge for instruction in all subjects of the course for which said scholarship calls until I am qualified to receive a diploma or certificate of proficiency, provided I complete said course within five years from the date hereof. * * * Fourth: That this subscription, when accepted by you, shall not be subject to cancellation, and that you shall not be required to refund any part of the money paid for said scholarship."

[38] In accord: Morris v. Sliter, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 59 (1845), plaintiff covenanted to convey "after defendant shall have paid."

[39] That part of the opinion dealing with the second defense is omitted.

In addition to the foregoing the following words were printed at the bottom of the contract: "We do not refund money paid for scholarship."

The defendant guaranteed "the payment to you [the plaintiff] of the price agreed to be paid for the within-mentioned scholarship in accordance with the terms of the within subscription." Both contracts were dated August 22, 1910.

The son pursued his studies under the plaintiff's instruction for some four months and paid four installments in addition to that paid when the contract was signed. He then (on or about January 1, 1911) stopped studying and refused to make any further payments. This action on the guaranty was brought on January 5, 1912, to recover the unpaid installments amounting to $53.40.

The defendant admitted that he signed the contract and that he read it before he signed it. That included the plaintiff's contract with the son, which by the terms of the contract of guaranty was incorporated into the guaranty contract. Two defenses were set up: First, that on or about January 1, 1911, when he was not in default in the payment of the installments due from him, the son elected not to go on with the instructions called for by the contract; and, second, that certain misrepresentations were made by the agent of the plaintiff when the contract was signed by the son.

The first defense is in effect based on the assumption that the contract sued on was a contract to pay $5 a month for instructions to be given to the son by the plaintiff until the sum of $78.40 had been paid, or, if that contention be not sound, that under the circumstances we have stated the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the contract price but is entitled to recover damages only for breach of the contract by the son. The latter defense is stated in the fourth and fifth rulings asked for by the defendant, and set forth in the note.[40]

It is plain that the contract is not a contract for instruction by the month, to be paid for and furnished until $78.40 should have been paid. By the terms of the contract between the son and the plaintiff, the son subscribed "for a scholarship in the International Correspondence Schools covering a course of correspondence instruction in telephone engineering" to be given until he was qualified to receive a diploma or certificate of proficiency, provided he completed the course [40] "4. Although the performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff was prevented by the refusal to perform on the part of Walter G. Martin, subscriber, yet the plaintiff is not entitled to the entire contract price less the amount paid, but only to the amount of damages caused by the breach of contract on the part of the subscriber, Walter G. Martin.

"5. By the terms of the written agreement, the plaintiff had to make expenditures for stamps, typewriting, corrections on papers, etc. The facts as to these expenditures are especially within the knowledge of the plaintiff, but as the plaintiff has not offered the necessary evidence to show what these expenses will amount to, it will be impossible for you to fix the damages and therefore you will find for the defendant."

within five years from the date of the agreement. That is to say, the son had five years in which to complete the course and the plaintiff was bound to carry on the instruction agreed to be given for that period, or until the son should be qualified to receive a diploma within that period. The payments to be made by the son were to be made in 16 installments (15 of which were for the sum of $5 each and the sixteenth for the sum of $3.40), and these installments were to be paid every four weeks, beginning with the date of the signing of the contract. The case comes within the first rule of Sergeant Williams in his note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saunders, 319, 320. That rule is in these words:

"If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money, or other act, is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent."

This again was founded upon the judgment of Chief Justice Holt in Thorp v. Thorp, 12 Mod. 455, 461. In other words the promise contained in this contract which the plaintiff now seeks to enforce was an independent, not a dependent, promise.

In case of independent promises the promisor has to perform his promise and if he does not get what he pays for his remedy is by a cross-action. In the case at bar the plaintiff has been ready and willing at all times to go on with the son's instruction, but the son has refused to study. The plaintiff has not been guilty of any breach of its agreement. Under these circumstances the defendant's contention comes to this: The maker of an independent promise who renounces his right to the thing paid for by him can show that fact in reduction of the sum the promisee is entitled to recover under the independent promise. The case of International Text-Book Co. v. Martin, 82 Neb. 403, 117 N. W. 994, seems in effect to be a decision that there is such a right to reduce the amount to be recovered in such a case. It was there held that the burden was on the defendant to prove the benefit ensuing to the plaintiff by the defendant's renunciation, and in the absence of proof of such a benefit that the sum stipulated for had to be paid.

If that be so ordinarily, or if ordinarily there is a question as to that, it is disposed of in the case at bar by the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the son, which was guaranteed by the defendant and by reference made part of the contract of guaranty. It is there expressly provided that: "This subscription, when accepted by you [the plaintiff], shall not be subject to cancellation, and that you will not be required to refund any part of the money paid for said scholarship," and "We [the plaintiff] do not refund money paid for scholarship."

The direct effect of these two provisions is confined to the return of money paid by the scholar. But indirectly they affect the construction of the contract. If money paid for the "scholarship" is not to be returned under any circumstances, it is plain that as matter of construction the contract between the plaintiff and the son was a contract by which the son bought a "scholarship," that is to say a right to be instructed in telephone engineering for a period of five years or until he became qualified to receive a diploma before the expiration of that time. He was not bound to study at all if he did not wish to. On the other hand although he was at liberty to study when he wished at any time during the five years, he was bound to pay for the "scholarship" in installments the last of which came due in one year and three months after the signing of the contract. What he paid for was the right to the instruction, and the sum to be paid for that right was to be paid whether the son did or did not exercise his right to be instructed.

The defendant has placed great reliance on International Text-Book Co. v. Schulte, 151 Mich. 149, 151, 114 N. W. 1031; International Text-Book Co. v. Jones, 166 Mich. 86, 88, 131 N. W. 98, 99; International Text-Book Co. v. Marvin, 166 Mich. 660, 668, 132 N. W. 437; International Text-Book Co. v. Roberts, 168 Mich. 501, 506, 134 N. W. 460. The doctrine established by the first two of these cases and recognized by the other two is stated in these words in the second case: "It is the rule in this state that a party to an executory contract may always stop performance by the other party by an explicit direction or renunciation of the contract, and refusal to perform further on his part, and that he is thereafter liable only upon the breach of the contract. The contract price is recoverable only upon the theory of performance, never upon the theory of inability to perform" brought on by the refusal of either party to go on.

It was accordingly held in the first two cases that the only sum which could be recovered was the damage proved by the plaintiff; and there being no affirmative proof of damages suffered by the plaintiff in those cases it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages only. That doubtless is the rule in case of dependent promises. For example where A. agrees to buy of B. a chattel and to pay a specified sum for it. If A. refuses to go on with the contract before the title to the chattel passes all that B. can recover is damages. See for example Barrie v. Quimby, 206 Mass. 259, 92 N. E. 451. But see in this connection White v. Solomon, 164 Mass. 516, 42 N. E. 104, 30 L. R. A. 537; National Cash Register Co. v. Dehn, 139 Mich. 406, 102 N. W. 965, where it was held that even in case of sales of chattels the rule does not apply in case it is agreed that payment is to be made before the title passes. The case at bar does not come within the rule stated in the Michigan cases because in the contract here in question the promise to pay was an independent promise.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the exceptions taken to the refusal to give the fourth and fifth rulings asked for must be overruled. This conclusion was reached in International Text-Book Co. v. Anderson, 179 Mo. App. 631, 162 S. W. 641. * * *

Exceptions overruled.[41]

(b) Partial Failure of Performance

BOONE v. EYRE.

(In the King's Bench, 1777. 1 H. Bl. 273, note.)

Covenant on a deed, whereby the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant the equity of redemption of a plantation in the West Indies, together with the stock of the negroes upon it, in consideration of £500 and an annuity of £160 per annum for his life; and covenanted that he had a good title to the plantation, was lawfully possessed of the negroes, and that the defendant should quietly enjoy. The defendant covenanted, that the plaintiff well and truly performing all and everything therein contained on his part to be performed, he the defendant would pay the annuity. The breach assigned was the non-payment of the annuity. Plea, that the plaintiff was not, at the time of making the deed, legally possessed of the negroes on the plantation and so had not a good title to convey.

To which there was a general demurrer.

Lord Mansfield. The distinction is very clear, where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other. But where they go only to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent. If this plea were to be allowed, any one negro not being the property of the plaintiff would bar the action.

PICKENS v. BOZELL.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1858. 11 Ind. 275.)

DAVISON, J.[48] Bozell brought this action against Pickens, upon a written agreement, which bears date October 6, 1854, and is as follows:

"This agreement made, &c., between Joseph Bozell and Henry Pickens, witnesseth: That Bozell has leased, and by these presents doth lease, to said Pickens, for the term of two years from the first of March, 1855, twenty-five acres of upland, and forty acres of bottom land, described, &c.; and is to furnish house and garden, pasture for one cow, and firewood off the place; and is to put the farm in good repair. Pickens is to farm the land as follows: The upland is to be put in oats, and he is to pay Bozell one-third of the same in the shock. The bottom land, he, Pickens, is to farm in corn, and pay Bozell twenty-two and one-half bushels of corn per acre, to be delivered on the premises. Pickens is to have all the pasture of the corn ground, and two-thirds of the pasture of the oats ground," &c.

In the complaint, it is averred that the defendant failed to deliver to the plaintiff, on the premises or elsewhere, any of said rent corn for the year 1856, except six hundred and twenty bushels—leaving unpaid and undelivered two hundred and eighty bushels, which was, at the time the same should have been delivered on the premises, worth forty cents per bushel—wherefore, &c.

Defendant demurred to the complaint, but his demurrer was overruled, and thereupon he answered by a general denial, and also by way of counterclaim. * * *

Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $10.58, upon which the Court rendered judgment, &c.

The only point made in the argument of the cause relates to the action of the Court in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. That pleading is said to be defective because it fails to allege the performance of certain stipulations which the plaintiff agreed he would perform, namely, that he would "furnish the defendant a house and garden, and pasture for one cow, and put the farm in good repair." This construction does not seem to be correct. In the agreement before us, the promises are evidently mutual. Those of which the plaintiff has failed to allege performance, constitute only a part of the consideration of the defendant's contract; and where, in such case, he has actually received a partial benefit from the consideration of the engagement on his part, and the plaintiff's failure to perform may be compensated in damages, the stipulations of the parties will be construed independently; and the result is, that an action for a breach may be maintained against the defendant without alleging performance. 1 Chit. Pl. 323,a; Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320,b; Bennet v. Executors of Pixley, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 249; Tompkins v. Elliot, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 496; Obermyer v. Nichols, 6 Bin. (Pa.) 159, 6 Am. Dec. 439; Bream v. Marsh, 4 Leigh (Va.) 21; Gourdin v. Davis, 2 McCord (S. C.) 514. And this doctrine is plainly consistent with the new rules of pleading; because, under them, the defendant may, in every such case, set up in his defense, by way of counterclaim, the plaintiff's failure to perform, in reduction of damages. 2 R. S. 1852, p. 41, § 59. True, where the mutual promises go to the whole consideration on both sides, performance must be averred; but in the case at bar, the main consideration of the defendant's stipulation to pay rent, was not the furnishing of the house, &c., but the use and occupation of the leased premises for a stated term. The record, in this instance, sufficiently shows that he took possession, and occupied under the lease; hence, it would be unequal and unjust to hold that the plaintiff cannot sue for the rent without alleging performance. Bryan v. Fisher, 3 Blackf. 316.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is affirmed, with 10 per cent. damages and costs.[44]

[44] In Oscar Barnett Foundry Co. v. Crowe, 219 Fed. 450, 135 C. C. A. 162 (1915), a breach by the plaintiff, for which judgment had been obtained against him, was held not to privilege the defendant not to perform his part. The court said: "These questions are controlled by the principle of law that a breach of a covenant, which goes to the whole consideration of a contract, gives to the injured party the right to rescind the contract or to recover damages for the breach; or, stated conversely a breach of a covenant, which does not go to the whole consideration of a contract, but which is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract or warrant its rescission by the injured party. Kauffman v. Raeder, 108 Fed. 172, 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247 (1901); Howe v. Howe & Owen Ball Bearing Co., 154 Fed. 820, 83 C. C. A. 536 (1907); Neenan v. Otis Elevator Co. (C. C.) 180 Fed. 997, 1000 (1910). While every breach of a contractual obligation confers a right of action upon the injured party, it is thus seen that every breach does not operate as a discharge. A breach which permits a rescission of the contract, discharging the other party, must be of an absolute part of the obligation—that is, a breach of that part of the obligation which goes to the whole consideration, and may be made, first, when the party renounces his liabilities under it; second, when by his own act he makes it impossible to perform; or, third, by failing fully to do what he promised. When this occurs, the party offended against may consider the contract rescinded and himself exonerated, or sue upon the contract for such damages as he has thereby sustained." See, also, Krebs Hop Co. v. Livesley, 51 Or. 527, 92 Pac. 1084 (1908).

In McAllister-Coman Co. v. Matthews, 167 Ala. 361, 52 South. 416, 140 Am. St. Rep. 43 (1910), the court said: "Every breach of a contract is, of course, inconsistent with the contract; but every breach by one party does not authorize the other to renounce it in toto."

Topp did not nor would faithfully serve the plaintiff according to the tenor and effect, true intent and meaning of the said indenture, but on the contrary thereof, the said Richard Topp, during the said term of five years in the said indenture mentioned, to wit, on the said 22nd of July, 1849, did unlawfully absent himself from the service of the plaintiff, and hath from thence hitherto remained and continued absent from the service of the plaintiff, contrary to the tenor and effect of the said indenture and of the said covenant of the defendant in that behalf made as aforesaid, to the plaintiff's damage, &c.

The defendant, after setting out the indenture on oyer, pleaded, that the plaintiff, at the time of the making of the said indenture, as in the declaration mentioned, exercised the art and carried on the business of an auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, as therein mentioned; and that the apprenticeship and covenants aforesaid were made with the plaintiff as such auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, and not otherwise; and that, after the making of the said indenture, and before the accruing of the cause of action, &c., to wit, on &c., the plaintiff voluntarily and of his own free will gave up, relinquished, abandoned, and ceased to exercise and carry on, and hath not, at any time since, exercised and carried on the art and business of a corn-factor as aforesaid. Verification.

Replication, that the plaintiff relinquished his business as a corn-factor aforesaid with the full knowledge and consent of the defendant in that behalf; and that, from the time of such relinquishment continually until the accruing of the cause of action in the declaration mentioned, the said Richard Topp, with full knowledge of such relinquishment as aforesaid, continued, with the consent of the defendant in that behalf, to serve the plaintiff under the said indenture. Verification.

Special demurrer to the replication, inter alia, on the grounds that the consent of the defendant to the relinquishment by the plaintiff of his business of a corn-factor aforesaid, and to the continuing of the said Richard Topp to serve the plaintiff as in the replication mentioned, is not alleged to have been given or contained by or in any deed or instrument under the seal of him the defendant; and that the contract in the declaration mentioned could not in law be varied or altered by parol, or by any consent other than a consent given or contained in some deed or instrument under seal; and that the replication is a departure from the declaration; that the contract relied upon in the declaration is a contract to employ and serve in the art and mystery of an auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor; and the replication sets up some new alleged contract to employ and serve in the art and mystery of an auctioneer and appraiser only.

Joinder in demurrer.

The demurrer was argued in Easter Term last (April 26th, 1850), before Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Rolfe, B., and Platt, B., by Macnamara for the defendant, in support of the demurrer, and by Taprell for the plaintiff; and the Court took time to consider their judgment; but afterwards Pollock, C. B., said that, as a difference of opinion existed among certain members of the Court, they wished to hear the case reargued. The case was accordingly re-argued in Hilary Term last (Jan. 20), before Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Alderson, B., and Platt, B., by Macnamara for the defendant, in support of the demurrer. * * *

Thirdly. The exercise of the trades, or rather the non-abandonment of any one of them by the master, is a condition precedent to the service of the apprentice, or, in other words, they are dependent covenants. The non-exercise of the trade for a few days merely would not justify the apprentice in leaving; but the relinquishment of any of them would. The doctrine of dependent covenants is fully discussed in the notes to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320 b.; and Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 9; where the most important cases bearing upon the subject are cited. The principle was laid down by Lord Mansfield in Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bla. 273, n.; 2 W. Bla. 1312, which has been often recognized and acted upon. "The distinction is very clear," said that learned Judge; "where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other. But where they go only to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent." The question seems to be, whether, notwithstanding the breach, the contract can be substantially carried out, and whether adequate compensation can be obtained for such breach. The reason of the rule is, that the damages would be unequal if a breach of a comparatively unimportant part of the contract afforded a ground for rescinding it altogether. The chief tests to be applied appear to be the materiality and importance of the covenants broken, and the difficulty of assessing damages thereupon. There is a close analogy between these questions and those which relate to penalties and liquidated damages. In the latter instance, the importance of the matter, the performance of which is secured by a penalty, and the difficulty of estimating the damages for its breach, are the main points to be considered: Galsworthy v. Strutt (1 Exch. 659). The rule adopted for the construction of covenants as dependent or independent is this:—That the good sense of the case, the nature of the instrument, and the intention of the parties, are to decide the question. * * *

Taprell contra. * * * [46]

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by

POLLOCK, C. B. This was an action on an indenture of apprenticeship by the master against the father of the apprentice, the father having been party to the indenture. The breach assigned is, that the apprentice did not nor would faithfully serve the plaintiff according to the tenor and effect of the indenture; but, on the contrary, did on the 22nd of July, 1849, unlawfully absent himself from the service of the plaintiff, and has thenceforth continued absent from such service. [The Lord Chief Baron, after stating the pleadings, proceeded:] On the part of the plaintiff it was scarcely contended that the replication could be supported. It is obviously bad. Such parol consent cannot entitle the plaintiff to maintain an action of covenant in this form, which is founded entirely on the deed under seal. The case therefore resolves itself into the only question really argued before us, which was, whether the plea was good.

On the part of the plaintiff it was contended, that the plea afforded no answer to the plaintiff's cause of action, on two grounds: first, Mr. Taprell contended, that all which the plaintiff undertook to do was to teach three trades; and that he might continue to do this, although he had ceased to carry on one of them; and that the plea contained no averments that he was unable so to do.

But this objection is ill founded. The breach complained of is, that the apprentice did not nor would serve the plaintiff according to the tenor and effect and true intent and meaning of the indenture. Now, looking to the indenture, we see that the real engagement was this—the son Richard, with the consent of the defendant, his father, "put himself apprentice to the plaintiff," described in the indenture as "auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, to learn his art, and with him after the manner of an apprentice to serve;" and then the defendant, at the end of the deed, bound himself to the plaintiff for the due performance of that engagement. What then was it which the defendant covenanted that his son should do? To become the plaintiff's apprentice to learn his art, i. e. the act of an auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, and to serve with him after the manner of an apprentice. Now, service with a man after the manner of an apprentice imports, according to the meaning of those words as ordinarily understood, that the party served should be carrying on the trade which the apprentice is to learn; otherwise the one is teaching and the other learning the trade, not as master and apprentice but as instructor and pupil. When therefore the one party ceases to carry on the trade, he by his act makes it impossible for the other to serve him after the manner of an apprentice; and he cannot be heard to complain that the other party has not done that which he has wilfully made it impossible that he should do.

The other objection taken by Mr. Taprell was, that the carrying on all the three trades was not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover, but that his omission or refusal to carry on any one must be the subject of a cross action.

This objection is founded on one of the rules for determining when covenants are dependent on each other; which is laid down in Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, n. (a), and followed in Campbell v. Jones, 6 T.

R. 570, and other cases collected in the note to 1 Wms. Saund. 320 c. That rule is, that when a covenant goes to part of the consideration on both sides, that is, forms a part of the consideration on the plaintiff's side for the defendant's covenant on the other, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, and the whole of the remaining consideration has been had by the defendant, the covenant is independent, and the performance of it is not a condition precedent.

"The reason of the decision in these cases is," as is observed by the learned editor, "that where a person has received a part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, it would be unjust that, because he had not had the whole, he should therefore, be permitted to enjoy that part without either paying or doing anything for it. Therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves him to his remedy to recover any damages he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration."

It is remarkable that, according to this rule, the construction of the instrument may be varied by matter ex post facto; and that which is a condition precedent when the deed is executed may cease to be so by the subsequent conduct of the covenantee in accepting less: as in the cases referred to, the defendant, in the first, might have objected to the transfer, if the plaintiff had no good title to the negroes and refused to pay; in the second, he might have objected to the payment if the plaintiff had refused to transfer the patent, though he had been willing to teach the art of bleaching. But this is no objection to the soundness of the rule, which has been much acted upon. But there is often a difficulty in its application to particular cases, and it cannot be intended to apply to every case in which a covenant by the plaintiff forms only a part of the consideration, and the residue of the consideration has been had by the defendant. That residue must be the substantial part of the contract; and if, in the case of Boone v. Eyre, two or three negroes had been accepted, and the equity of redemption not conveyed, we do not apprehend that the plaintiff could have recovered the whole stipulated price, and left the defendant to recover damages for the non-conveyance of it.

Whether the rule can be applied to the present case has been a matter of great doubt in the minds of some of us: but, after much consideration, we agree that it is not applicable. If this had been an action on a covenant to pay an apprentice fee at the end of the term, and the apprentice had served the whole period, and had had the benefit of instruction as such in two of the trades, it would, we are disposed to think have been no answer to the action that the plaintiff had discontinued one. But this is an action for not continuing to serve as an apprentice; and although the later services of an apprentice are much more valuable than the early, and are in part a compensation to the master for his instruction in the commencement of the apprenticeship, and so are analogous in some degree to an apprentice fee payable in futuro, yet the immediate cause of action is the breach of the contract to serve, and the obligation to serve depends upon the corresponding obligation to teach as an apprentice; and, if the master is not ready to teach in the very trade which he has stipulated to teach, the apprentice is not bound to serve. To this particular covenant to serve, the relative duty to teach seems to us to be directly a condition precedent; and we are not able to distinguish between the three trades of auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, so as to say that one is more the substantial part of the contract than another.

As the plaintiff by his own fault has disabled himself from acting as a master in all the three trades, he has no right to complain of the defendant's son refusing to continue to serve in any.

Our judgment will therefore be for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.[47]

GRAVES v. LEGG et al.

(In the Court of Exchequer, 1854. 9 Exch. 709, 156 Eng. Rep. 304.)

The declaration stated, that it was on the 19th of May, 1853, through Messrs. H. & R., brokers at Liverpool, agreed between the plaintiff and defendants in manner following, that is to say, the plaintiff then agreed to sell to the defendants, and the defendants to buy of the plaintiff, about 300 to 350 bales white-washed Donskoy fleece wool, to arrive at 10½d. per pound, laid down either at Liverpool, Hull, or London, deliverable at Odessa during August then next, old style, to be shipped with all despatch, warranted fair average quality; but should they prove otherwise, to be taken with a fair allowance; which it was mutually agreed between buyer and seller should be assessed by the said Messrs. H. & R., subject to the safe arrival of the wool in good condition at any of the ports stated, and the names of the vessels to be declared as soon as the wools were shipped; customary allowances, payment cash in fourteen days, less 1½ per cent. discount from the date of finishing loading. Which agreement being made, afterwards, the said wool, being 333 bales of wool of the quality and description in the said agreement mentioned, was, during the said month of August, old style, delivered, to wit, by the growers thereof at Odessa, to wit, to the agents of the plaintiff in that behalf, and was with all despatch then shipped there on board a certain vessel called the "Science," which said vessel

Leese, 4 M. & W. 296, 5 M. & W. 698 (1838), plaintiff agreed that defendant might make and sell under several patents; one patent was void; the defendant was held privileged to repudiate the whole, nothing having as yet been done under the contract; Jansen v. then sailed from Odessa with the said wool on board thereof, and afterwards, to wit, on the 22nd of November, 1853, arrived at Liverpool with the said wool on board safe and in good condition, and according to the terms of the said contract; and the plaintiff says, that the defendants have had notice of all the said premises, and that a reasonable time for the defendants to accept the said wools after the same arrived, and to fulfil their part of the contract, and pay for the said wools, has long since elapsed; and that he, the plaintiff, has at all times performed and fulfilled and been ready and willing to perform and fulfil all conditions precedent to his right to have the said wools accepted and paid for, and to his right to maintain this action. Yet the defendants would not at any time accept nor pay for the said wools, or any part thereof.

Plea, that the defendants agreed with the plaintiff to buy the said wool in the declaration mentioned for the purpose of reselling the same in the way of their, the defendants' trade and business of wool dealers, and thereby acquiring gains and profits. And further, that wool is an article that fluctuates greatly in price in the market; and that the defendants could only resell the said wool as aforesaid when, and not before, the defendants had notice of the same being shipped, and when, and not before, the name of the vessel in which it was so shipped had been declared, according to the said contract in the declaration mentioned; of all which premises the plaintiff, at the time of the making of the said agreement, had notice; and further, that, although the plaintiff had such notice, yet the plaintiff did not declare to the defendants or either of them, the name of the vessel in which the said wool was shipped, or within the time at or within which he was by the agreement bound to declare the same, that is to say, as soon as such wool was so shipped, but omitted so to do, and delayed and omitted so to declare the name of the said vessel in which the said wool was so shipped as in the said declaration mentioned, or to give the defendants any notice of the same being so shipped, for a long and unreasonable time after the same was so shipped; and the defendants had not notice of the shipment of the said wool, or of the name of the vessel in which the same had been shipped, until after the expiration of a long and unreasonable time after the same had been so shipped, and after the plaintiff was bound and ought to have given and declared the same, and might and could have done so; and further, that, between the time when the name of the said vessel ought to have been declared according to the said agreement in the said declaration mentioned, and the time when it was first declared to the defendants, or when they first had any notice of the said ship having sailed with the said wool on board thereof, the price of wool in the market had greatly fallen, and the said wool thence continually remained so fallen in price, and the same, when the name of the said vessel was first declared, and when the defendants first had notice or knowledge of the same having been so shipped, would sell or could be sold only for a much less sum of money than it would have done at the time when the plaintiff ought to and could have declared the name of the said vessel, or given the defendants such notice as aforesaid. Wherefore the defendants did not nor would accept or pay for the said wool, as in the said declaration mentioned.

Demurrer, and joinder.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by

PARKE, B. The pleadings in this case are these: [His Lordship stated them, and proceeded:] The question raised by these pleadings is, whether the provision, that the names of the vessels should be declared as soon as the wools were shipped, was a condition precedent to the defendants' obligation to accept and pay for the wools according to the contract stated in the declaration, and under the circumstances stated in the plea.

This contract, we think, is to be construed with reference to some of those circumstances. It is stated in the plea, that the wool was bought, with the knowledge of both parties, for the purpose of re-selling it in the course of the defendants' business; that it is an article of fluctuating value, and not saleable until the names of the vessels in which it was shipped should have been declared according to the contract.

The declaration having averred, according to the 57th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, the performance of conditions precedent generally, the defendant proceeds in this plea to specify this condition of declaring the names of the vessels, as one on the breach of which he insists. The loss which he avers to have sustained by that breach is immaterial. The only question is, whether the performance of the agreement was a condition precedent or not to the defendants' contract to accept and pay for the goods.

In the numerous cases on the subject, in which it has been laid down that the general rule is, to construe covenants and agreements to be dependent or independent according to the intent and meaning of the parties to be collected from the instrument, and of course to the circumstances legally admissible in evidence with reference to which it is to be construed, one particular rule well acknowledged is, that where a covenant or agreement goes to part of the consideration on both sides, and may be compensated in damages, it is an independent covenant or contract, and an action might be brought for the breach of it without averring performance in the declaration, under the old system of pleading; and under the new, the denial of such performance would be bad; and the cases of Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570, and Boone v. Eyre, 2 Black. Rep. 1312 and 1315, are instances of the application of the rule. But then it appears, as Mr. Serjt. Williams observes in 1 Saund. 320 d. (and the Lord Chief Baron, in delivering the judgment of this court in Ellen v. Topp, 6 Exch. 441, adopts the observation), the reason of the decision in that and similar cases, besides the inequality of damages, seems to be, that where a person has received part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, it would be unjust, that, because he had not the whole, he should therefore be permitted to enjoy that part without either payment or doing anything for it. Therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, leaving him to his remedy to recover any damage he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration. Mr. Serjt. Williams goes on to observe, that it must appear upon the record that the consideration was executed in part. This may appear by the instrument declared on itself, whereby a valuable right, part of the consideration, is conveyed, as in Campbell v. Jones, or Boone v. Eyre, or by averment in pleading. When that appears, it is no longer competent for the defendant to insist upon the non-performance of that which was originally a condition precedent; and this is more correctly expressed, than to say it was not a condition precedent at all.

In this case, if the stipulation, that the names of the vessels should be stated as soon as the wools were shipped, was originally a condition precedent, it is so still. No other benefit was taken under the contract itself, as the consideration for the promise to pay the money, than the shipment and delivery of the goods by the named vessels; nor was any subsequently received by the acceptance of the goods or any part thereof. After such acceptance, the defendants would have been bound to pay the price, or the residue of it, and could not have insisted on the neglect to name in due time, but, if there had been any such neglect, would nevertheless have had their remedy for the damage by cross action on the contract to declare the names. In the state of things on this record, the simple question is, whether this contract was originally a condition precedent or not. Looking at the nature of the contract, and the great importance of it to the object with which the contract was entered into with the knowledge of both parties, we think it was a condition precedent, quite as much, indeed, as the shipping of the goods at Odessa with all dispatch after the end of August. And with respect to the shipment itself, Mr. Blackburn did not venture to contend that the performance of the plaintiff's contract in that respect was not a condition precedent.

The defendants, therefore, have a right to object to fulfil the contract on their part, as the plaintiff did not fulfil his, though they could no longer object to the plaintiff's non-performance, had they afterwards taken any benefit under the contract.

Judgment for the defendants.[48]

KELSO & CO. v. ELLIS et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 224 N. Y. 528, 121 N. E. 364.)

Action by Kelso & Company against Charles H. Ellis, Sr., and another, copartners doing business under the firm name of Charles H. Ellis & Son. Judgment on directed verdict for plaintiff affirmed by Appellate Division (171 App. Div. 912, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1117), and defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

POUND, J. Thomas Howard, under the name of Thomas Howard Company, dealt in advertising specialties in Brooklyn, N. Y. He had a plan for a piano contest whereby a merchant would offer a piano to be voted for by his customers and given to the contestant receiving the highest number of votes; the right to vote being dependent upon the purchases made at the store where the contest was being conducted, during a given period. The idea was so to stimulate trade beyond its usual activity as to enhance the sales of the merchant and thus put money in his purse. Careful and voluminous instructions for arousing public interest in the contest were an essential part of the plan. Other prizes were offered to contestants, but the interest centered around the piano. Howard did not deal in pianos himself, but when he obtained a customer for his scheme he placed an order with a manufacturer for a piano to be shipped to such customer. The plaintiff herein was a piano manufacturer. The defendants were merchants in Port Chester, N. Y. On October 24, 1913, they entered into a contract with Howard for the delivery at his earliest convenience of one T. Howard Company $750 player piano, mahogany finished, warranted and guaranteed for 10 years; five $500 certificates good on a T. Howard Company $750 piano, mahogany finished, warranted and guaranteed for 10 years; 20 dozens assorted pieces of flat silverware, permanently warranted. To be distributed by defendants the following: 200 nomination letters, 500 follow-up letters, 1,500 circulars, 1,000 postal cards, 40 posters, 50 bulletins, 150 $1, 100 $2, and 300 $5 trading books, 1 voting register, 1 Howard Company's instruction book, 2 sets of "Display Card" signs, instructions for newspaper advertising, to be done without expense to vendor, 54,000 certificates in four colors for piano votes in denominations of 5 to 25,000 votes; all the foregoing to be used in a piano advertising contest to open November 3, 1913, and close May 3, 1914.

In consideration therefor they gave their six negotiable promissory notes payable to Howard and due two, three, four, five, six, and seven months after date, aggregating $650. The defendants agreed to "keep the piano well displayed in my store," and it is a fair inference that it was the intention of the parties that the piano should be delivered for that purpose before the opening of the contest on November 3, 1913.

On December 4, 1913, Howard sent an order to plaintiff to deliver a player piano at once to the defendants. He had previously delivered to them some of the silverware and all of the printed matter which they made use of in a voting contest. But the contest without a piano was like the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out. Plaintiff had sold pianos to Howard for over two years and had shipped many pianos to merchants for him, and had received from him notes of merchants to whom it had shipped pianos on his order. He had previously told it that he had an advertising plan; that he was supplying merchants with pianos all over the country and he had thus obtained from it a line of credit. It stenciled the name "T. Howard Company" on such pianos. But plaintiff did not ship the piano to defendants. Howard owed it upwards of $2,000 for pianos actually shipped and further credit was refused. On December 22, 1913, prior to the maturity of the first note in suit, Howard transferred the Ellis notes to it, and it gave him credit therefor on his general account as cash, knowing at the time that no piano had been delivered by it to defendants. It does not appear that plaintiff then had actual knowledge of the terms of the contract between Howard and defendants.

This action is brought to recover on the notes. The answer sets up many defenses and a counterclaim, none of which are substantial except the defense that the plaintiff was not a holder in due course; that it did not take the notes in good faith and did not take them for value. This defense calls for careful examination.

In the hands of Howard, the notes were subject to the defense that the contract was entire, that there had been no full performance by Howard, and that there was no obligation to pay until performance was complete. Defendants were constantly demanding performance by Howard on his contract to furnish the piano, and it cannot be said as matter of law that there was a waiver on their part of this condition of the contract. They therefore did not become liable to pay for or return even the articles received in part performance. "A party may retain, without compensation, the benefits of a partial performance, where, from the nature of the contract, he must receive such benefits in advance of a full performance, and by its terms or just construction is under no obligation to pay until the performance is complete." Avery v. Willson, 81 N. Y. 341, 344 (37 Am. Rep. 503). The agreement to deliver the piano and the other articles and the agreement to pay the notes, being concurrent in time, were dependent, and Howard could not maintain an action against defendants without tendering full performance on his part. Where a promissory note is given for the purchase money on an executory contract for the sale of lands or chattels the law is the same as obtains in a case where the only promise to pay is found in the contract of sale itself, provided the action is between the original parties. Ewing v. Wightman, 167 N. Y. 107, 60 N. E. 322. * * * [49]

Judgment reversed and new trial granted.

[49] The court then held that there was evidence sufficient to go to the jury that the plaintiff received the note with knowledge of the defense as against Howard.

(c) Installment Contracts

HUNT'S CASE.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1588. Owen, 42.)

Hunt brought an action on the case against Torney, and declared that he being seised of lands in Swainton in Norf. in fee, secundum consuetudinem mannerii; the defendant did promise to the plaintiff, in consideration the plaintiff would permit him to occupy the same for the space of five years, that he would pay him at the Feast of All-Saints next coming, and so yearly twenty pounds at the Feasts of the Annunciation, and All-Saints by equall portions, during the terme aforesaid, and alledged that he had injoyed the lands by the space of a year and half, and so brought his action on the assumpsit. And Anderson was of opinion that untill the five years were expired, no money was to be paid, because the contract was intire. But all the other justices on the contrary, for the consideration was to pay a certain summe yearly, which made severall duties and so severall actions. For by Periam, if a man be bound to pay J. S. twenty pounds in manner and forme following, viz. ten pounds at such a day, and ten pounds at such a day, in this case the obligee cannot have an action of debt for the first, before the day of payment of the last ten pounds be past, because the duty in itself is an intire duty, but if a man be bound to pay J. S. ten pounds at such a day, and ten pounds at such a day, here the obligee shall have his action for the first, because the duty was in itself severall.

Anderson at another day said, that if a man makes a lease for ten years, rendring rent, in that case he may have an assumpsit for the rent due every year: so if I covenant with you to build you twenty houses, the covenantee shall have a severall action for each default.

Periam. That case of the assumpsit is much to the purpose, for an assumpsit is in the nature of a covenant, and is indeed a covenant without writing.

Rhodes cited this case: Gascoigne promised in consideration of a marriage of his daughter with such a man's son, to give seven hundred marks, and to pay a hundred marks every year, untill all the summ were paid, and it was held clearly in this Court, that a severall action might be brought upon every hundred pounds, but because the action was brought for all the seven hundred marks before the seven years were out, judgment was given against him, for if a man be bound in a bond of a hundred pounds to pay twenty pounds for so many years, he shall not have an action of debt until the last year expired. And after judgment was given for the plaintiff, viz. Mich. 29 Eliz. Rot. 2248.[50]

[50] S. c., sub nom. Hunt v. Sone, Cro. Eliz. 118.

GRANT v. JOHNSON.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1851. 5 N. Y. 247.)

Covenant on articles of agreement for the sale of land, between the plaintiff (Grant) of the first part, and the defendant (Johnson) of the second part. "The party of the first part for the consideration of nine hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid as follows, to wit: two hundred dollars on the first day of April next, two hundred dollars on the first of April, 1847, the remainder in two annual payments of equal amount, to be paid on the first of April of the two succeeding years, together with interest from the first of April next, agrees to sell to the party of the second part a certain piece of land lying in the town of Neversink" (describing it.) "And the party of the first part, agrees to give to the party of the second part, the quiet and peaceable possession of said premises on the first of November next, with the exception of certain privileges granted to Nicholas Wakeley, and certain other privileges granted to Teunis Misener," &c. "And the said party of the first part further agrees to give to the said party of the second part a good and sufficient deed for the same on the first of May next, if the above conditions are complied with."

The agreement contained a further stipulation, which it is unnecessary to mention, and was executed under the hands and seals of the parties, on the twenty-fourth day of August, 1845.

The declaration assigned as a breach, the non-payment of the second instalment of two hundred dollars, payable on the first of April, 1847; but it contained no averment of the tender of a deed of the premises, before, on, or subsequent to the first day of May, 1846, or a readiness or willingness to execute one, in accordance with the covenant of the plaintiff.

The defendant interposed several pleas, which, as no question arose upon them, it is unnecessary to mention more particularly.

At the trial the plaintiff proved the agreement, and rested. The defendant moved for a non-suit, on the ground that the plaintiff was bound to show the delivery or tender of a deed before he could recover the second instalment.

The judge decided that the covenants were independent, and that the plaintiff could recover without showing either a delivery or tender of a deed. To this decision the defendant excepted.

It was then admitted that the defendant had received possession of the premises according to the contract, and had paid the first instalment. He then offered to prove, that no deed of the premises in question had been tendered to him up to the fifteenth of July, 1846. The court rejected the evidence as not constituting a legal defence, and the defendant excepted. The jury, under the direction of the judge, found a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the second instalment, and interest. Upon a bill of exceptions presenting the above facts, a motion for a new trial was made before the supreme court in the third district, and denied. An issue of law arising upon a demurrer to the replication of the plaintiff presenting the same question, had previously been decided by the same court in favor of the plaintiff. The new trial was denied, and the defendant's demurrer overruled, upon the ground that the covenants were independent, and that the plaintiff could recover without averring or proving performance, or an offer to perform the covenant on his part. See 6 Barb. 337. From this decision the defendant appealed to this court.

GARDINER, J.[51] The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff can sustain an action for the second installment of the purchase-money secured by the agreement, without averring and proving the delivery, or an offer to deliver a deed of the premises.

The parties have declared that certain payments were to be made, and certain acts performed by them respectively, at the times specified in the agreement. They must be held to have intended the performance of these acts, when, and of course in the order of time indicated in their covenants. The plaintiff was to give the defendant possession on the 1st of November, 1845. The performance of this requirement preceded any thing to be done by the defendant, and it might consequently have been enforced without any offer upon the part of the defendant; but, if no possession had been given, the plaintiff could not have recovered the $200 to be paid by the vendee on the 1st of April, 1846.

The possession, however, was given, and the first $200 paid, and on the 1st of May, 1846, the vendee was entitled to his deed as the thing next to be done in the order prescribed by the parties in their agreement. It was not executed, nor a willingness to execute it either averred or proved. The payment of the $200 for which the suit is brought was fixed upon a day subsequent to that agreed upon for the delivery of the deed. The case is, therefore, brought directly within the letter and spirit of the 2d rule suggested by Sergeant Williams in his note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320b, that, "when a day is appointed for the payment of money, etc., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration is to be performed, no action for the money can be sustained without averring performance."

The plaintiff relies upon the 3d rule of Sergeant Williams in his note to the case above cited, that "where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained, without averring performance." The rule is not free from obscurity. It was given by Lord Mansfield originally in Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note a. The defendants in that suit, after having received a conveyance of the equity of redemption of a plantation, and the negroes upon it, when sued for a part of the consideration, set up a breach of a collateral covenant on the part of the plaintiff, relating to the title and possession of the negroes, in bar of the action. The warranty extended both to the estate and negroes. 4 Mees. & W. 311. The covenant of the plaintiff, it will be perceived, embraced the whole and every part of the subject conveyed. If the title failed to a single negro, or the defendant was evicted from an acre of the land, the covenant was intended to afford redress, and enable a jury to apportion the damages according to the agreement of the parties. A "breach of the plaintiff's covenant might be paid for in damages," because a failure of title as to any part of the consideration could be compensated according to the standard fixed by the parties. In other words, the consideration for the defendant's promise was divisible, and the damages arising from a breach of the covenant of warranty were apportioned to each parcel of that consideration, by the agreement itself. This, it is supposed, is what is meant by the expression above quoted, that the breach may be paid for in damages. 5 Mees. & W. 701. Accordingly it is stated in the note to Pordage v. Cole, supra, that "when the consideration for the payment of the money is entire and indivisible, so that the money payable is neither apportioned by the contract, nor capable of being apportioned by a jury, an action is not maintainable."

The doctrine is thus stated in Chanter v. Leese, 4 Mées. & W. 311, "The party contracting to pay his money is under no obligation to pay for a less consideration than that for which he has stipulated. If, indeed, he does accept a partial performance, and to a certain extent enjoys the benefit of that for which he has stipulated, it may become a question whether he may not be liable upon an implied contract to pay for what he has had. And when the consideration is in its nature capable of being divided, and the payment apportioned by the terms of the contract, there may be still a right to recover the portion due on the original contract." This decision was affirmed in the exchequer chamber (5 Mees. & W. 701), in 1839, and may be considered as the established doctrine in England at that day.

The rule of Lord Mansfield, according to its original application, and as expounded in the decision above mentioned, is reasonable. It brings us back to the contract to learn the intention of the parties. Courts are not required to speculate upon the inequality of loss to the parties, or to look beyond the agreement to its performance, in order to ascertain its character, as suggested by some judges and commentators. 1 Saund. 320a. These inquiries are proper where the question arises, whether the plaintiff has any remedy for what he has done, or parted with, or whether the defendant is not estopped by his acts subsequent to the agreement, from insisting upon a condition precedent in his favor. Much of the confusion in the books, it is believed, arises from confounding the doctrine of waiver by matters ex post facto, with a rule of construction applicable to the agreement as it came from the hands of the parties. Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555. A defendant may waive the performance by the plaintiff, in case of a covenant clearly dependent, and thus render himself liable in some form of action (Mitchell v. Darthez, 2 Bing. N. C. 555; Lucas v. Godwin, 3 Id. 737), but it is only when the consideration is divisible, and the payments are apportioned by the agreement to the different parts of the consideration, that the covenant becomes independent, and a recovery can be had upon the original contract without averring performance, or an excuse for non-performance.

A covenant, therefore, which goes only to a part of the consideration, is not necessarily independent. Nor is it conclusive upon this point that the consideration is divisible in its own nature, or that a part of it has been received by the defendant; nor will the circumstance that one or any number of covenants in an agreement are independent, render others so. * * *

The question then returns, was the consideration in this case divisible, and were the payments apportioned by the agreement to the different parts of the consideration within the principles above stated? According to the contract, the $950 to be paid by the defendant, as therein stipulated, was the entire consideration for a complete title to the premises. The possession was incident to the title, the whole of which the defendant was to receive as the consideration for his payments. He received one element of a complete title, to-wit, the possession, on the 1st of November, 1845. He then paid on the 1st of the following April all that he was to advance by the terms of the agreement, until the fee should be added to the possession by a conveyance from the plaintiff, and the title of the defendant be then perfected. The plaintiff refuses or neglects to convey, and yet by this action claims the purchase-money of the defendant.

If we assume that the consideration of the defendant's undertaking was divisible, yet by the terms of the agreement he was to receive both the possession and a deed of the premises before he could be called upon for the payment of the installment in controversy. These things were "to be done to him" according to the rule of Lord Holt, adopted in Cunningham v. Morrell, 10 Johns. 206, 6 Am. Dec. 332. He was not to trust to the personal responsibility of the plaintiff. Dey v. Dox, 9 Wend. 134, 24 Am. Dec. 137. The plaintiff had covenanted that the thing stipulated should be performed before the defendant could be required to pay. Nor by the contract were the payments to be made by the defendant apportioned to any particular part of the consideration. He was not to pay any thing for the possession as distinguished from the fee of the land, but a gross sum for both by separate installments. If he had refused to accept a deed, all that the plaintiff could have recovered would have been the balance of the purchase-money with interest. On the contrary had the plaintiff refused to convey, the recovery on the part of the defendant would have been confined to the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the land with interest. In a word, the covenant sought to be enforced against the defendant in this action went to the whole consideration on the other side, and depended on it.

The judgment of the supreme court should be reversed.

HILL v. GRIGSBY et al.

(Supreme Court of California, 1868. 35 Cal. 656.)

This was an action upon nine promissory notes made jointly by defendants to plaintiff, dated June 1st, 1865. The complaint was in the usual form.

The answer of the defendants admitted the execution of the notes, and as a defense to the action alleged, that at the time the notes were executed, the plaintiff as vendor, and the defendants as vendees, entered into a contract for the sale and purchase of one undivided half interest in a quartz mill and certain real property in the State of Nevada; that the defendants agreed to pay the sum of eighteen thousand dollars for the property, to be paid by installments, and that the notes sued on were given for the last nine installments; that plaintiff executed a bond conditioned for the conveyance of the property upon full payment of the purchase money; that the whole amount of purchase money was due at the time this action was commenced, and that this action was brought to recover the unpaid portion of the purchase money, including the note given for the last installment; that about ten thousand dollars of the purchase money had been paid; that the notes and bond were executed and delivered contemporaneously, and are parts of one contract for the sale and purchase of said property.

The answer further alleged that plaintiff, before the commencement of this action, executed and delivered to one William G. Hill a deed of conveyance of the identical property described in said bond; that plaintiff had not performed, or offered to perform, on his part, the conditions of said bond; that neither plaintiff nor said William G. Hill had tendered a deed for said property, and that they had not offered to convey the same upon payment of the purchase money or otherwise. * * *

On the plaintiff's motion, the court struck out of the answer all the defensive matter alleged therein, upon the ground that it is redundant and immaterial. To which ruling the defendants duly excepted.

The plaintiff had judgment as demanded, and the defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

By the Court, RHODES, J.[52] The leading question is, whether plaintiff is entitled to recover upon certain promissory notes representing the unpaid portion of the purchase money for certain real estate, sold by the plaintiff to the defendants, without conveying or offering to convey the property. The solution of the question depends upon the construction to be given to the bond or covenant of the plaintiff. The bond, after reciting the purchase and terms of payment, proceeds as follows:

[52] Part of the statement of facts and part of opinion have been omitted.

"Now, therefore, the said Hill agrees and binds himself, on condition that the said Grigsby and Smittle shall pay the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, less eight thousand two hundred dollars heretofore paid, with interest, as aforesaid, to execute and deliver to the said Smittle and Grigsby a good deed, conveying all his right, title, and interest of, in, and to the one undivided half interest in said mill and premises herein as aforesaid, which if he shall well and truly do, the above obligation to be null and void and of no effect; otherwise, the above obligation to be and remain in full force and effect. The said deed to be executed by the said Hill as soon as the full sum of eighteen thousand dollars and interest, as above provided, is paid, and to be sufficient to convey to said Grigsby and Smittle one undivided half interest in and to said mill, free from all incumbrance."

In the first clause the plaintiff covenants to convey on condition that the defendants pay the price. These acts were plainly intended to be simultaneous, that is to say, the payment in full and the conveyance. The words "on condition" are susceptible of no other interpretation. The second clause was added as if to put the matter beyond question. There the covenant is, to convey as soon as the full sum is paid. The conveyance must, of necessity, be executed concurrently with or before payment in full, or it will not be executed as soon as such payment is made.

Neither argument nor illustration will make the meaning of the covenants in respect to the time for their performance more apparent.

When the meaning of the terms employed in the covenants is ascertained, the application of the rules of law governing the performance of the covenants is not difficult. In a contract for the sale of real estate, where the purchaser covenants to pay the purchase money, and the vendor covenants to convey the premises at the time of payment, or upon the time of payment of the money, or as soon as it is paid—and they all mean the same thing—the covenants are mutual and dependent, and neither can sue without showing a performance, or an offer to perform, on his part; and performance, or the offer to perform, on the one part, is a condition precedent to the right to insist upon a performance on the other part. Barron v. Frink, 30 Cal. 488.

When the purchase money is payable in installments, and the conveyance is to be executed on the last day of payment, or upon the payment of the whole price, or at any previous day, the covenants to pay the installments falling due before the time appointed for the execution of the conveyance are independent covenants, and suit may be brought thereon without conveying or offering to convey.

The covenants to pay the installments falling due on or after the day appointed for the conveyance are dependent covenants, and the vendor, in his suit to recover the same, whether he sues for those alone or joins installments that became due before the time, must show a conveyance or offer to convey. In these respects, contracts of all kinds are governed by the same rule as covenants.

Questions covering the greater portion, if not the entire ground occupied by those presented here, were considered at an early day in this Court, and the decisions accord with the views here expressed. Osborne v. Elliott, 1 Cal. 337; Folsom v. Bartlett, 2 Cal. 163. See, also, Barron v. Frink, 30 Cal. 486. It is very correctly said in Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. Ed. 219, that "in contracts of this description the undertakings of the respective parties are always considered dependent unless a contrary intention clearly appears"; and the reason assigned, as well as the rule, would be applicable here were the words of the covenant of doubtful import. "A different construction would in many cases lead to the greatest injustice, and a purchaser might have payment of the purchase money enforced upon him, and yet be disabled from procuring the property for which he paid it." The authorities in support of these principles are very numerous, and there is a greater degree of uniformity among them than is usual on a question presented, as this has been, in so many different aspects. Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wm. Saund. 320; Jones v. Gardner, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 266; Gazley v. Price, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 267; Parker v. Parmele, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 130, 11 Am. Dec. 253; Williams v. Healey, 3 Denio (N. Y.) 367; Johnson v. Wygant, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 48; Bean v. Atwater, 4 Conn. 3, 10 Am. Dec. 97; Lester v. Jewett, 11 N. Y. 453; Hunt v. Livermore, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 395; Kane v. Hood, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 281; 1 Pars. on Cont. 42; 2 Smith L. C. 17. * * *

We are of opinion that the portion of the answer setting up the contract of sale, and alleging the failure of the plaintiff to convey, or offer to convey, to the defendants the interest in the premises sold to them, is a good defense to the action, and that the order striking it out was erroneous.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.[53]

GRAY v. MEEK.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1902. 199 Ill. 136, 64 N. E. 1020.)

This suit was brought in the circuit court of Cook county by S. M. Meek, defendant in error, against Adolph Gray, plaintiff in error, on a certain written contract and supplemental contract between the parties. The original contract of October 25, 1890, provided: That Gray was to act as the agent of Meek in selling about 80 lots that Meek owned in a certain subdivision. That Gray was to have the exclusive right of selling these lots for one year, and no longer, at prices averaging $130.50 per lot for all inside lots, and $175 for corner lots and lots fronting on Milwaukee avenue; the first payment to be not less than $5 down, and monthly payments to be not less than $2.50, all deferred payments to draw 6 per cent. interest per annum. That Meek agreed to convey the lots when paid for according to the agreement. That, of the cash paid in on the contracts of sale, one-half should go to Meek, and one-half to Gray, as his commission, less 10 per cent. on such half (the ten per cent. to be kept back until final settlement), and all amounts over and above the stipulated prices for the lots realized on the sales should go to Gray in full payment for his services in making such sales. That, in case any lots remained unsold at the end of the year, Gray was to buy such remaining lots, and Meek to sell them to him, at the above prices, and to allow the 10 per cent. kept back to apply on the purchase price of the lots so remaining, and Gray to pay the balance on the same terms and at the same prices as provided on sales to others. After the expiration of the year provided in this contract, * * * the plaintiff sued for the agreed price of the lots remaining unsold. The plea was the general issue. The jury found a verdict for $5,468.03 for the plaintiff below, being the total amount claimed by him to be due on the contract, and judgment was entered for the same. The appellate court affirmed the judgment, and the defendant below has brought the case before us on writ of error.[54]

CARTER, J. * * * It is next urged by plaintiff in error that the defendant in error is not entitled to a recovery on the basis of the agreed price of the lots, but that the true measure of damages is the difference between the agreed price and the fair market value at the Wightman, 167 N. Y. 107, 111, 60 N. E. 322 (1901) the court said: "Some learned text-writers have asserted the doctrine that promises contained in unilateral contracts cannot be dependent, though each is given in consideration of the other, and have criticised the cases in this country holding a contrary rule. Whatever may be the force of the arguments of those writers, or whatever the rule in England, the general current of authority in this and other states is opposed to that doctrine." Where a note is given for a return promise, it should not be called a "unilateral contract," even though the promises are contained in separate instruments.

[54] The terms of a supplemental contract and a small part of the opinion are omitted.

time Gray agreed to take and pay for the lots in question. This contention is not tenable. Meek sued on the contract, by which Gray agreed to pay the stipulated prices for the lots unsold at the expiration of the contract. When this contract was extended, he again agreed to take the lots unsold at the expiration of the extension, and to pay the stipulated prices, and both contracts contained specific directions as to the application of moneys received towards paying for these lots to be taken by Gray.

It is also urged that there was no tender of a deed for these lots from Meek to Gray pleaded or proved. There was no tender pleaded, but no advantage was taken of this in apt time. The only proof in regard to a tender is the evidence of Meek that he offered Gray a deed for these lots, and the further offer he made in a letter to give him a deed and take a mortgage back. Nothing further was elicited in regard to the tender. No tender was necessary, under the terms of the contract, until the last payment became due, as Meek did not agree to make a conveyance until the lots were paid for. But demanding the whole amount due on these lots, he should have tendered a deed. A purchaser of property to be paid for in installments, where there is no time fixed for the delivery of the deed, is not entitled to receive his deed until the last payment is made; nor is a purchaser obliged to part with his money before he receives the deed. Duncan v. Charles, 4 Scam. 561; Weiss v. Binnian, 178 Ill. 241, 52 N. E. 969. The lots were to be paid for, $5 down, and monthly payments of not less than $2.50. The time for all payments by Gray had elapsed when suit was brought. The obligation to pay all but the last installment was absolute and unconditional. By neglecting to enforce payment on these installments as they became due. and by waiting until the last one became due and the time for making the conveyance had elapsed, the promise to pay the previous installments, once absolute and independent, did not become mutual and dependent. Duncan v. Charles, supra; Sheeren v. Moses, 84 Ill. 448. To remedy this error respecting the failure to tender a deed, defendant in error offers to enter a remittitur in this court for the amount of the last payment on these lots, 33 in number, and interest thereon, namely $94.87. * * *

As the judgment below was too large by the amount of the last payment and interest thereon, to wit, $94.87, and as the defendant in error remits that amount, the judgment will be affirmed as to the balance, except as to costs in the appellate court. The judgment for such costs will be reversed, and all costs incurred in this court up to the time of entering the remittitur will be taxed against the defendant in error. Remittitur allowed and judgment affirmed.[55]

WITHERS v. REYNOLDS.

(In the Court of King's Bench, 1831. 2 Barn. & Adol. 882.)

Assumpsit for not delivering straw to the plaintiff pursuant to agreement. At the trial before Lord Tenterden, C. J., at the sittings in Middlesex after last Hilary term, the agreement proved was as follows:

"John Reynolds undertakes and agrees to supply Joseph Withers with wheat straw of good quality sufficient for his use as a stablekeeper, and delivered on his premises as above" (i. e. at Long Acre, London) "till the 24th of June 1830, at the sum of thirty-three shillings per load of thirty-six trusses, to be delivered at the rate of three loads in a fortnight, in a dry state and without damage. And the said J. W. hereby agrees to pay to the said J. R. or his order the sum of thirty-three shillings per load for each load of straw so delivered on his premises from this day till the 24th of June 1830, according to the terms of this agreement.

"[Signed] Joseph Withers, John Reynolds."

The straw was regularly sent in from the 20th of October 1829, when this agreement was made, till the end of January 1830. At that time, the plaintiff being in arrear for several loads of straw, the defendant called upon him for the amount, and he thereupon tendered to the defendant £11. 11s., being the price of all the straw delivered except the last load, saying that he should always keep one load in hand. The defendant objected to this; but was at length obliged to take the sum offered: and he then told the plaintiff that he would send no more straw unless it was paid for on delivery: and accordingly no more was sent. On the part of the defendant it was submitted that there must be a nonsuit, inasmuch as the plaintiff, on his own shewing, had not performed his own part of the contract, which was, in effect, to pay for each load on delivery. Lord Tenterden C. J. was of this opinion: but directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving the point. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained for entering a nonsuit.

Campbell and R. V. Richards now shewed cause. Two things independent of each other were stipulated by this contract to be done by the respective parties: the defendant was to deliver straw; the plaintiff to pay the price. No time of payment was specified. There appears nothing which could entitle the defendant to insist on receiving his money till the whole quantity of straw was delivered. Payment, then, was not a condition of the defendant's performance of his contract. His promise was given in consideration that the plaintiff promised to pay, not in consideration of performance. If the plaintiff was bound to pay for each load on delivery, still it does not follow that a refusal to pay for one load excused the defendant from any future performance of his contract. Weaver v. Sessions

(6 Taunt. 154) And, according to that case, he ought at least to have shewn that he subsequently made a tender of executing his part of the agreement, which the plaintiff rejected. The defendant, therefore, upon his construction of the agreement, may be entitled to bring a cross action, but has no defence to this.

Platt, contra. The only question is upon the construction of this agreement. It is true, no time of payment was specified, but in the absence of any express stipulation, the money would be payable on demand as often as it became due; and here the words, "to pay thirty-three shillings per load for each load so delivered," intimate that the price of each load was to be due as soon as it was delivered. [Here he was stopped by the Court.]

Lord TENTERDEN, C. J. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. There is, I think, no doubt that by the terms of this agreement the plaintiff was to pay for the loads of straw as they were delivered. If that were not so, the defendant would have been liable to the inconvenience of giving credit for an indefinite length of time, and, in case of non-payment, bringing an action for a very large sum of money, which does not appear to have been intended by the contract. Then the only question is, whether upon the plaintiff's saying, "I will not pay for the goods on delivery" (for that was the effect of his communication to the defendant), it was incumbent on the defendant to go on supplying straw; and he clearly was not obliged to do so.

PARKE, J. The substance of the agreement was, that the straw should be paid for on delivery. The defendant clearly did not contemplate giving credit. When, therefore, the plaintiff said that he would not pay on delivery, (as he did, in substance, when he insisted on keeping one load on hand,) the defendant was not obliged to go on supplying him.

TAUNTON, J. The contract does not say merely that so much straw shall be supplied at thirty-three shillings a load, but it adds, that the plaintiff shall pay that sum "for each load of straw delivered on his premises," from the date of the agreement till the 24th of June 1830. That prima facie imports that each load was to be paid for as delivered.

PATTESON, J. If the plaintiff had merely failed to pay for any particular load, that, of itself, might not have been an excuse to the defendant for delivering no more straw: but the plaintiff here expressly refuses to pay for the loads as delivered; the defendant, therefore, is not liable for ceasing to perform his part of the contract.

Rule absolute.[56]

[56] In accord: Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6 (1875). Cf. West v. Bechtel, 125 Mich. 144, 84 N. W. 69, 51 L. R. A. 791 (1900).

GILL v. JOHNSTOWN LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1892. 151 Pa. 534, 25 Atl. 120.)

Action by John L. Gill against the Johnstown Lumber Company for services for driving logs. Verdict was directed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

HEYDRICK, J. The single question in this cause is whether the contract upon which the plaintiff sued is entire or severable. If it is entire, it is conceded that the learned court below properly directed a verdict for the defendant; if severable, it is not denied that the cause ought to have been submitted to the jury. The criterion by which it is to be determined to which class any particular contract shall be assigned is thus stated in Parsons on Contracts, 29–31: "If the part to be performed by one party consists of several and distinct items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable. * * * But if the consideration to be paid is single and entire, the contract must be held to be entire, although the subject of the contract may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items." The rule thus laid down was quoted with approval and applied in Oil Co. v. Brewer, 66 Pa. 351, and followed in Rugg v. Moore, 110 Pa. 236, 1 Atl. 320. It was also applied in Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295, a case not unlike the present. There the master and freighter of a vessel of 400 tons mutually agreed that the ship should proceed to St. Petersburgh, and there load from the freighter's factors a complete cargo of hemp and iron, and deliver the same to the freighter at London on being paid freight, for hemp £5 per ton, for iron 5s. per ton, and certain other charges, one half to be paid on delivery and the other at three months. The vessel proceeded to St. Petersburgh, and when about half loaded was compelled by the imminence of a Russian embargo upon British vessels to leave, and returning to London delivered to the freighter so much of the stipulated cargo as had been taken on board. The freighter, conceiving that the contract was entire, and the delivery of a complete cargo a condition precedent to a recovery of any compensation, refused to pay at the stipulated rate for so much as was delivered. Lord ELLENBOROUGH said: "The delivery of the cargo is in its nature divisible, and therefore I think it is not a condition precedent; but the plaintiff is entitled to recover freight in proportion to the extent of such delivery; leaving the defendant to his remedy in damages for the short delivery."

Applying the test of an apportionable or apportioned consideration to the contract in question, it will be seen at once that it is severable. The work undertaken to be done by the plaintiff consisted of several items, viz., driving logs, first, of oak, and, second, of various other kinds of timber, from points upon Stony creek and its tributaries above Johnstown to the defendant's boom at Johnstown, and also driving cross-ties from some undesignated point or points, presumably understood by the parties, to Bethel, in Somerset county, and to some other point or points below Bethel. For this work the consideration to be paid was not an entire sum, but was apportioned among the several items at the rate of $1 per 1,000 feet for the oak logs; 75 cents per 1,000 feet for all other logs; 3 cents each for cross-ties driven to Bethel; and 5 cents each for cross-ties driven to points below Bethel. But while the contract is severable, and the plaintiff entitled to compensation at the stipulated rate for all logs and ties delivered at the specified points, there is neither reason nor authority for the claim for compensation in respect to logs that were swept by the flood to and through the defendant's boom, whether they had been driven part of the way by plaintiff, or remained untouched by him at the coming of the flood. In respect to each particular log the contract in this case is like a contract of common carriage, which is dependent upon the delivery of the goods at the designated place, and, if by casus the delivery is prevented, the carrier cannot recover pro tanto for freight for part of the route over which the goods were taken. Whart. Cont. § 714. Indeed, this is but an application of the rule already stated. The consideration to be paid for driving each log is an entire sum per 1,000 feet for the whole distance, and is not apportioned to parts of the drive.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo is awarded.[57]

KELLY CONST. CO. v. HACKENSACK BRICK CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1918. 91 N. J. Law, 585, 103 Atl. 417, 2 A. L. R. 685.)

Action by the Kelly Construction Company against the Hackensack Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

TRENCHARD, J.[58] The plaintiff below brought this action to recover damages for the refusal of the defendant to perform a contract to deliver brick. A verdict was directed for the plaintiff at the Bergen circuit and the defendant appeals. We are of the opinion that the judgment must be affirmed.

No objection is made to the amount of the verdict directed. The defendant's contention is that it was legally justified in its refusal to complete its contract. We think that contention is unsound, and we find no error in record.

[57] In Leonard v. Dyer, 26 Conn. 172, 68 Am. Dec. 382 (1857), the plaintiff was given judgment at the contract rate for transporting 49,000 feet of lumber, where the contract was to transport a lot of about 75,000 feet at the rate of $2.25 per thousand, a flood having prevented the loading of the balance. See, further, Snook v. Fries, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 313 (1855); Ming v. Corbin, 142 N. Y. 334, 37 N. E. 105 (1894); Barnes v. Leidigh, 46 Or. 43, 79 Pac. 51 (1905); Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736 (1892).

[58] Part of the opinion is omitted.

The plaintiff had a contract for the building of a high school at Englewood. It placed a written order with the defendant for the "furnishing and delivering and stacking on the job all the common hard brick required by the plans and specifications for the Englewood High School at $7 per thousand; brick to be delivered as required by us and sufficient brick to be kept on the job so that we will always have approximately 50,000 brick stacked until the completion of the job." This order the defendant accepted in writing. Neither the order nor the acceptance fixed any time for payment. The defendant after delivering some of the brick, refused to complete the contract, and a verdict was directed on the basis of the difference between the contract price and that which the plaintiff was required to pay in the market for the remainder of the brick contracted for. The defendant's contention is that it was legally justified in refusing to complete its contract by reason of the admitted fact that the brick already delivered in part performance of the contract had not been paid for. But that contention is unsound in law. Where, as here, the sale is of a specified quantity of brick (i. e., sufficient to complete a building according to stated specifications), the contract is entire, and a failure to pay when a part delivery has been made does not excuse the seller from completing delivery; no time for payment being stated in the contract. Baker v. Higgins, 21 N. Y. 397.

And this is so notwithstanding section 42 of the Sale of Goods Act (C. S. p. 4657), enacting that "unless otherwise agreed, delivery of the goods and payment of the price are concurrent conditions," etc. This section does not require payment with each delivery where, as here, such deliveries are made pursuant to an entire contract for goods the quantity and character of which necessitates delivery in installments. * * *

The judgment will be affirmed, with costs.[59]

MINTURN, J., dissents.

POLLAK v. BRUSH ELECTRIC ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1888. 128 U. S. 446, 9 Sup. Ct. 119, 32 L. Ed. 474.)

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment in favor of the Brush Electric Association of St. Louis, plaintiff below, against the plaintiff in error for the sum of $6,458.10. Besides the common count for goods and merchandise sold to the defendant, Pollak, the complaint contains a special count, based on a written agreement between the parties, executed November 13, 1883. By the first article of that agreement Pollak agreed to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $7,942, as follows: "Seven thousand dollars in cash on the execution of this agreement, and the sum of nine hundred and forty-two dollars on the 1st day of January, 1884, in full settlement and satisfaction of [59] Certain installment contracts were held "entire" in Consumers' Bread Co. v. Stafford Mills Co., 152 C. C. A. 527, 239 Fed. 693 (1917); Karales v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 36 Cal. App. 171, 171 Pac. 821 (1918).

all claims and demands due by Pollak & Co. and the Brush Electric Light and Power Company of Montgomery, Ala., to the said Brush Electric Association of St. Louis; and the Brush Electric Association agrees to transfer, or cause to be transferred, to said Ignatius Pollak, without recourse, all the shares now held by the said Brush Electric Association and the Brush Electric Company of Cleveland, Ohio, in the said Brush Electric Light and Power Company of Montgomery, Ala."

The remaining articles of the agreement are in these words:

"Second. The said Brush Electric Association of St. Louis agrees to furnish to the said Ignatius Pollak one number 8 dynamo-electric machine, one automatic dial for said machine, and forty arc lamps of two thousand candle power each, of different styles, for which the said Ignatius Pollak agrees to pay to the said Brush Electric Association of St. Louis by the 1st day of January, 1885, twelve per cent. of the cost of said machinery, as per card-rate hereto attached, signed by the parties, and made a part of this agreement, which card-rate is agreed by the parties to be the cost of said machinery. This twelve per cent., it is agreed by the parties, is to be considered a rental of said machinery, dial, and lamps for the term of one year, and which are furnished to enable the said Ignatius Pollak to comply with his contract with the city council of Montgomery to light the streets of the city of Montgomery with electric lights.

"Third. It is further agreed that in case the city council of Montgomery shall conclude to adopt the Brush electric light for the future lighting of the streets of the said city of Montgomery, Ala., after the expiration of the time of the present contract between said Pollak and Company and the city council of Montgomery, that the said Ignatius Pollak will pay to the said Brush Electric Association of St. Louis, Mo., by the 1st day of January, 1885, the cost of said machinery, dial, and lamps, as fixed and ascertained by said card-rate hereto attached." [This card-rate fixed the total cost at the sum of $6,180.]

[There were further provisions not material to the point now under consideration. The city council did in fact adopt the Brush light for a future period thus fulfilling the express condition of article Third.]

Mr. Justice HARLAN. * * * [60] 4. It is also contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, except upon averment or proof that it had transferred or offered to transfer to the defendant the shares of stock held by it and by the Brush Electric Company of Cleveland, Ohio, in the Brush Electric Light & Power Company of Montgomery. This cannot be, unless, as insisted, his promise to pay, in the contingency named in the third article of the agreement of November 13, 1883, the sum of $6,180, was in consideration of the plaintiff's promise to transfer, or have transferred to him, the above shares.

[60] The statement of facts has been abridged and part of the opinion omitted.

In support of this position the case of Bank v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, 465, 7 L. Ed. 219, is cited. It was there said that the inclination of the courts strongly favors as obviously just that construction of contracts which makes the covenants or promises of the parties dependent, rather than independent. After observing that the seller ought not to be compelled to part with his property without receiving the consideration, nor the purchaser to part with his money, without an equivalent in return, the court said: "Hence, in such cases, if either a vendor or a vendee wish to compel the other to fulfill his contract, he must make his part of the agreement precedent, and cannot proceed against the other without an actual performance of the agreement on his part, or a tender or refusal."

But it is clear, as said in Railroad Co. v. Howard, 13 How. 307, 339, 14 L. Ed. 157, that covenants are to be considered dependent or independent, according to the intention of the parties, to be deduced from the whole instrument. It is manifest that the covenant of the plaintiff in relation to the transfer of stock in the Brush Electric Light & Power Company is wholly independent of the agreement in relation to the machine, dial, and lamps in question. The consideration for such transfer, and for the settlement and satisfaction of all claims due by Pollak & Co. and by the Brush Electric Light & Power Company to the plaintiff, was the payment by Pollak of a certain amount, part in cash on the execution of the agreement of November 13, 1883, and the balance on the 1st of January, 1884. On the other hand, the consideration for Pollak's agreement to pay, in a certain contingency, a specified sum for the machine, dial, and lamps, was his becoming the absolute owner of those articles, upon the happening of that contingency. The cost of the articles was fixed by the agreement at a certain aggregate sum, without reference to the transfer of the above-mentioned stock. There is nothing whatever in the contract indicating that the payment for the machine, dial, and lamps was to depend, in any degree, upon the transfer of the stock, or that the transfer of the stock was to depend upon the adoption of the Brush electric light by the city. The covenants were wholly independent; and therefore it was not essential to the plaintiff's right to recover that it should allege or prove that its agreement to transfer or have transferred to the defendant the above-described stock had been performed. That may be the subject of a separate suit.

As the court below correctly interpreted the agreement between the parties, and as the evidence showed that the contingency happened which entitled the plaintiff to recover the sum specified in the agreement as the value of the property, the direction to the jury to find for the plaintiff was right. Goodlet v. Railroad Co., 122 U. S. 391, 7 Sup. Ct. 1254, 30 L. Ed. 1230; Kane v. Railroad Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. 16, 32 L. Ed. 339. The judgment is affirmed.[61]

[61] Where the parties have made two separate contracts for the sale of coal, the breach of one does not justify the injured party in refusing to perform the other. Hanson & Parker v. Wittenberg, 205 Mass. 319, 91 N. E. 383 (1910).

SIMPSON et al. v. CRIPPIN et al.

(In the Court of Queen's Bench, 1872. L. R. 8 Q. B. Cas. 14.)

Declaration on a contract to supply from 6,000 to 8,000 tons of coal, to be delivered in equal monthly quantities during the period of twelve months, from the 1st of July, 1871. Breach, that the defendants did not deliver the coal monthly, and had refused wholly to deliver the coal and to perform the contract.

Plea, inter alia: that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to accept the coals, and that the defendants were prevented from delivering the coals, and performing the agreement, by the acts, neglects, and defaults of the plaintiffs.

At the trial before Lush, J., at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1872, it appeared that the defendants were coal proprietors, and the plaintiffs were coal merchants. On the 10th of June 1871, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants the following letter: "We agree to take from you about 6,000 to 8,000 tons of your best Wigan four-feet coal, at 5s. 6d. per ton of 21 cwt. to the ton, put into our wagons at the colliery. Delivery to commence from the 1st of July next, and to be taken in about equal monthly quantities over the next twelve months. It is understood that you are not bound to supply in case of accidents or strikes. Terms, cash monthly, less 2½% discount."

The defendants, by letter also dated the 10th of June, replied as follows: "We agree to supply you from 6,000 to 8,000 tons of our best four-feet Wigan coal, properly screened, and free from slack, to be delivered into your wagons at our collieries, in equal monthly quantities during the period of twelve months from the 1st of July next—strikes of our workmen, accidents, and other circumstances beyond our control excepted—at 5s. 6d. per ton of 21 cwt. Terms, cash monthly, less 2½% discount."

On the 8th of July the defendants wrote, complaining that the first week for the fulfilment of the contract had terminated without the plaintiffs sending wagons or orders for coals. The correspondence continued, the defendants requesting that wagons might be sent and the plaintiffs promising to comply. During the month of July the plaintiffs took from the defendants only 158 tons of coal. On the 1st of August the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs, that inasmuch as the latter had only taken 158 tons during the month of July, and as the sole inducement for the defendants to entertain the contract was the regular and punctual withdrawal by the plaintiffs of the stipulated quantity during the summer months, which they had failed to perform, the defendants gave notice that the contract was cancelled. On the 2nd of August the plaintiffs replied, stating that they would not allow the contract to be cancelled.

On these facts the learned judge told the jury, that as the plaintiffs did not intend to break the contract month by month, and only broke it for the first month's delivery, that did not justify the defendants, in point of law, in cancelling the contract, and left the question of damages to them.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for £475, leave being reserved to move to enter a verdict for the defendants.

A rule was afterwards obtained upon the ground that under the circumstances the plaintiffs had disentitled themselves to sue for the breach of the contract, and that the defendants were entitled to cancel the contract, and refuse to deliver the residue of the coal.

BLACKBURN, J. I think that the rule ought to be discharged. It cannot be denied that the plaintiffs were bound in every month to send wagons capable of carrying at least 500 tons, and that by failing to perform this term they have committed a breach of the contract; and the question is, whether by this breach the contract was determined. The defendants contend that the sending of a sufficient number of wagons by the plaintiffs to receive the coal was a condition precedent to the continuance of the contract, and they rely upon the terms of the letter of the 1st of August. No sufficient reason has been urged why damages would not be a compensation for the breach by the plaintiffs, and why the defendants should be at liberty to annul the contract; but it is said that Hoare v. Rennie, 5 H. & N. 19, is in point, and that we ought not to go counter to the decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. It is, however, difficult to understand upon what principle Hoare v. Rennie was decided. If the principle on which that case was decided is that, wherever a plaintiff has broken his contract first he cannot sue for any subsequent breach committed by the defendant, the decision would be opposed to the authority of many other cases. I prefer to follow Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 319. No reason has been pointed out why the defendants should not have delivered the stipulated quantity of coal during each of the months after July, although the plaintiffs in that month failed to accept the number of tons contracted for. Hoare v. Rennie was questioned in Jonassohn v. Young, 4 B. & S. 296.

Rule discharged.[62]

MERSEY STEEL & IRON CO., Limited, v. NAYLOR, BENZON & CO.

Appeal from an order (dated June 13th, 1882) of the Court of Appeal (Jessel, M. R., Lindley and Bowen, L. JJ.) reversing an order of Lord Coleridge, C. J.

[62] The concurring opinions of Mellor and Lush, JJ., are omitted. See in accord, Samuels v. W. H. Miner Chocolate Co., 235 Mass. 312, 126 N. E. 771 (1920).

EARL OF SELBORNE, L. C.[63] * * * Upon the other point, I do not think it desirable to lay down larger rules than the case may require, or than former authorities may have laid down for my guidance, or to go into possible cases differing from the one with which we have to deal. I am content to take the rule as stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr [L. R. 9 C. P. 208], which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part; and I think that nothing more is necessary in the present case than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here. Before doing so, however, I must say one or two words in order to show why I cannot adopt Mr. Cohen's argument, as far as it represented the payment by the respondents for the iron delivered as in this case a condition precedent, and coming within the rules of law applicable to conditions precedent. If it were so of course there would be an end of the case; but to me it is plain beyond the possibility of controversy, that upon the proper construction of this contract it is not and cannot be a condition precedent. The contract is for the purchase of 5,000 tons of steel blooms of the company's manufacture; therefore it is [63] Part of the opinion of Lord Selborne and also the concurring opinions of Lords Blackburn, Bramwell, and Watson are omitted. Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Adol. 882 (1831), was expressly distinguished on the ground that there was a repudiation in that case.

In Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208, (1874), there was a contract to sell 250 tons pig iron, price payable 14 days after delivery of each instalment. The seller was very dilatory and the buyer feared that the later instalments would not be delivered. The buyer therefore withheld payment on the first instalment to secure himself against loss to be caused by future non-delivery, thinking erroneously that he was privileged to do this. The seller at once repudiated the contract, prices of iron having risen greatly. The buyer sued for damages for non-delivery and was given judgment, the court holding that his failure to pay on time did not "evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract" and that a mere partial failure of performance without any abandonment or repudiation of the contract does not terminate the duty of the other party.

Of this case Sir Frederick Pollock (Wald's Pollock on Contracts [Williston's Ed.] 330) says: "As a positive test the rule of Freeth v. Burr is doubtless correct; that is, a party who by declaration or conduct, 'evinces an intention no longer to be bound by the contract,' entitles the other to rescind, and this whether he has or has not, apart from this, committed a breach of the contract going to the whole of the consideration. But it seems doubtful whether the test will hold negatively. Can an intention to repudiate the contract be necessary as well as sufficient to constitute a total and irreparable breach? Can there not be, without any such intent, a failure in a vital part of the performance which destroys the benefit of the contract as a whole? * * * All that the authorities require of us is not to presume delay in payment, as distinguished from delivery, to be in itself a total breach."

one contract for the purchase of that quantity of steel blooms. No doubt there are subsidiary terms in the contract, as to the time of delivery, "Delivery 1,000 tons monthly commencing January next;" and as to the time of payment, "Payment, net cash within three days after receipt of shipping documents;" but that does not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be deliveries for the purpose, of so many distinct quantities of iron. It is quite consistent with the natural meaning of the contract, that it is to be one contract for the purchase of that quantity of iron, to be delivered at those times and in that manner, and for which payment is so to be made. It is perfectly clear that no particular payment can be a condition precedent of the entire contract, because the delivery under the contract was most certainly to precede payment; and that being so, I do not see how, without express words, it can possibly be made a condition precedent to the subsequent fulfilment of the unfulfilled part of the contract, by the delivery of the undelivered steel.

But quite consistently with that view, it appears to me, according to the authorities and according to sound reason and principle, that the parties might have so conducted themselves as to release each other from the contract, and that one party might have so conducted himself as to leave it at the option of the other party to relieve himself from a future performance of the contract. The question is whether the facts here justify that conclusion? Now the facts relied upon, without reading all the evidence, are these. The company at the time when the money was about to become payable for the steel actually delivered fell into difficulties, and a petition was presented against them. There was a section in the Companies Act 1862 (§ 153), which appeared to the advisers of the purchasers to admit of the construction, that until in those circumstances the petition was disposed of by an order for the company to be wound up or otherwise, there would be no one who could receive, and could give a good discharge for, the amount due. There is not, upon the letters and documents, the slightest ground for supposing either that the purchasers could not pay, or that they were unwilling to pay, the amount due; but they acted as they did, evidently bona fide, because they doubted, on the advice of their solicitor, whether that section of the act, as long as the petition was pending, did not make it impossible for them to obtain the discharge to which they had an unquestionable right. And therefore the case which I put during the argument is analogous to that which according to the advice they received they supposed to exist—namely, the case of a man who has died between the delivery and the time when payment ought to be made, he being the only person to whom payment is due; and of course until there is a legal personal representative of that person no receipt can be given for the money. By the Act of Parliament, in the event of a winding-up order being made, it would date from the time when the petition was presented; and this clause, which no doubt, according to its true construction, only deals with alienations of the property of the company, was supposed by the solicitor of the purchasers to make it questionable whether the payment of a debt due to the company, to the persons who if there had been no petition would have had a right to receive it, might not be held, in the event of a winding-up order being made, to be a payment of the property of the company to a wrong person and therefore an alienation. I cannot ascribe to their conduct, under these circumstances, the character of a renunciation of the contract, a repudiation of the contract, a refusal to fulfil the contract. It is just the reverse; the purchasers were desirous of fulfilling the contract; they were advised that there was a difficulty in the way, and they expressed anxiety that that difficulty should be as soon as possible removed, by means which were suggested to them, and which they pointed out to the solicitors of the company. The company evidently took up the attitude, in that state of things, of treating the default as one which released them from all further obligation. On February 10th, which was before the winding-up order was made, and while that state of things still continued, the company by their secretary wrote to say that they thought (being so far correct and thinking rightly) that the objection was not well founded in law; and they added: "We shall therefore consider your refusal to pay for the goods already delivered as a breach of contract on your part and as releasing us from any further obligations on our part." I think that they were wrong in that conclusion, and that there is no principle deducible from any of the authorities which supports that view of such—I hardly like to call it a refusal—of such a demur, such a delay or postponement, under those circumstances.

The company, until they were wound up, never receded from that position which they took up on February 10th, 1881; and it appears to me to be clear that the liquidator adopted it, and never departed from it, and that the repudiation of the contract on insufficient grounds on the part of the company, which had taken place while the petition was pending and before the winding-up order was made, was adhered to after the winding-up order was made, on the part of the liquidator. On the other hand, it seems to me that, fairly and reasonably considered, the conduct of the respondents was justifiable. Upon February 17th, 1881, after the making of the winding-up order, they state that there are instalments which ought to have been delivered, but which have not been delivered, in respect of which they would have a claim for damages, and that they apprehend that they would have a right to deduct those damages from any payments then due from them; and, according to the view which has been taken in the Court of Appeal of the effect of § 10 of the Act of 1875, and in which view I believe your Lordships agree, that was the right way of looking at the matter. Then the respondents go on to say, that they are prepared to accept all deliveries which the liquidator may make under the contract, and to pay everything due, only requesting that those payments may be considered as made upon this understanding, in substance, that the right to the set-off which exists in law for the damages shall not be prejudiced—a perfectly reasonable, defensible, and justifiable proposal. And the solicitor who writes the letter adds, "Or I think it probable that my clients would consent to accept delivery now and waive the damages," a thing which in a later letter they express their willingness to do. In my judgment, they have not in any portion of the proceeding acted so as to show an intention to renounce or to repudiate the contract, or to fail in its performance on their part.

Therefore I think that the judgment of the Court below is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

NORRINGTON v. WRIGHT et al.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1885. 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366.)

GRAY, J. This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Arthur Norrington, a citizen of Great Britain, trading under the name of A. Norrington & Co., against James A. Wright and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, trading under the name of Peter Wright & Sons, upon the following contract:

"Philadelphia, January 19, 1880.

"Sold to Messrs. Peter Wright & Sons, for account of A. Norrington & Co., London: Five thousand (5,000) tons old T iron rails, for shipment from a European port or ports, at the rate of about one thousand (1,000) tons per month, beginning February, 1880, but whole contract to be shipped before August 1, 1880, at forty-five dollars ($45.00) per ton of 2240 lbs. customhouse weight, ex ship Philadelphia. Settlement, cash, on presentation of bills accompanied by custom-house certificate of weight. Sellers to notify buyers of shipments with vessels' names as soon as known by them. Sellers not to be compelled to replace any parcel lost after shipment. Sellers, when possible, to secure to buyers right to name discharging berth of vessels at Philadelphia. Edward J. Etting, Metal Broker."

The declaration contained three counts. The first count alleged the contract to have been for the sale of about 5,000 tons of T iron rails, to be shipped at the rate of about 1,000 tons a month, beginning in February, and ending in July, 1880. The second count sets forth the contract verbatim. Each of these two counts alleged that the plaintiffs in February, March, April, May, June, and July shipped the goods at the rate of about 1,000 tons a month, and notified the shipments to the defendants; and further alleged the due arrival of the goods at Philadelphia, the plaintiff's readiness to deliver the goods and bills thereof, with custom-house certificates of weight, according to the contract, and the defendants' refusal to accept them. The third count differed from the second only in averring that 400 tons were shipped by the plaintiff in February and accepted by the defendants, and that the rest was shipped by the plaintiffs, at the rate of about 1,000 tons a month, in March, April, May, June, and July. The defendants pleaded non assumpsit. The material facts proved at the trial were as follows:

The plaintiff shipped from various European ports 400 tons by one vessel in the last part of February, 885 tons by two vessels in March, 1,571 tons by five vessels in April, 850 tons by three vessels in May, 1,000 tons by two vessels in June, and 300 tons by one vessel in July, and notified to the defendants each shipment. The defendants received and paid for the February shipment upon its arrival in March, and in April gave directions at what wharves the March shipments should be discharged on their arrival; but on May 14th, about the time of the arrival of the March shipments, and having been then for the first time informed of the amounts shipped in February, March, and April, they gave Etting written notice that they should decline to accept the shipments made in March and April, because none of them were in accordance with the contract; and in answer to a letter from him of May 16th, wrote him on May 17th, as follows: "We are advised that what has occurred does not amount to an acceptance of the iron under the circumstances, and the terms of the contract. You had a right to deliver in parcels, and we had a right to expect the stipulated quantity would be delivered until the time was up in which that was possible. Both delivering and receiving were thus far conditional on there being thereafter a complete delivery in due time and of the stipulated article. On the assumption that this time had arrived, and that you had ascertained that you did not intend to, or could not, make any further deliveries for the February and March shipments, we gave you the notice that we declined accepting those deliveries. As to April, it is too plain, we suppose, to require any remark. If we are mistaken as to our obligation for the February and March shipments, of course we must abide the consequences; but if we are right, you have not performed your contract, as you certainly have not for the April shipments. There is then the very serious and much debated question, as we are advised, whether the failure to make the stipulated shipments in February or March has absolved us from the contract. If it does, we of course will avail ourselves of this advantage."

On May 18th Etting wrote to the defendants, insisting on their liability for both past and future shipments, and saying, among other things: "In respect to the objection that there had not been a complete delivery in due time of the stipulated article, I beg to call your attention to the fact that while the contract is for five thousand tons, it expressly stipulates that deliveries may be made during six months, and that they are only to be at the rate of about one thousand tons per month." "As to April, while it seems to me 'too plain to require any remark,' I do not see how it can seem so to you, unless you intend to accept the rails. If you object to taking all three shipments made in that month, I shall feel authorized to deliver only two of the cargoes, or, for that matter, to make the delivery of precisely one thousand tons. But I think I am entitled to know definitely from you whether you intend to reject the April shipments. and, if so, upon what ground, and also whether you are decided to reject the remaining shipments under the contract. You say in your last paragraph that you shall avail yourselves of the advantage, if you are absolved from the contract; but, as you seem to be in doubt whether you can set up that claim or not, I should like to know definitely what is your intention."

On May 19th the defendants replied: "We do not read the contract as you do. We read it as stipulating for monthly shipments of about one thousand tons, beginning in February, and that the six months' clause is to secure the completion of whatever had fallen short in the five months. As to the meaning of 'about,' it is settled as well as such a thing can be; and certainly neither the February, March, nor April shipments are within the limits. As to the proposal to vary the notices for April shipments, we do not think you can do this. The notice of the shipments, as soon as known, you were bound to give, and cannot afterwards vary it if they do not conform to the contract. Our right to be notified immediately that the shipments were known is as material a provision as any other, nor can it be changed now in order to make that a performance which was no performance within the time required." "You ask us to determine whether we will or will not object to receive further shipments because of past defaults. We tell you we will if we are entitled to do so, and will not if we are not entitled to do so. We do not think you have the right to compel us to decide a disputed question of law to relieve you from the risk of deciding it yourself. You know quite as well as we do what is the rule and its uncertainty of application." On June 10th Etting offered to the defendants the alternative of delivering to them one thousand tons strict measure on account of the shipments in April. This offer they immediately declined. On June 15th Etting wrote to the defendants that two cargoes, amounting to 221 tons, of the April shipments, and two cargoes, amounting to 650 tons, of the May shipments, (designated by the names of the vessels,) had been erroneously notified to them, and that about 900 tons had been shipped by a certain other vessel on account of the May shipments. On the same day the defendants replied that the notification as to April shipments could not be corrected at this late date, and after the terms of the contract had long since been broken. From the date of the contract to the time of its rescission by the defendants, the market price of such iron was lower than that stipulated in the contract, and was constantly falling. After the arrival of the cargoes, and their tender and refusal, they were sold by Etting, with the consent of the defendants, for the benefit of whom it might concern.

At the trial the plaintiff contended (1) that under the contract he had six months in which to ship the 5,000 tons, and any deficiency in the earlier months could be made up subsequently, provided that the defendants could not be required to take more than 1,000 tons in any one month; (2) that, if this was not so, the contract was a divisible contract, and the remedy of the defendants for a default in any month was not by rescission of the whole contract, but only by deduction of the damages caused by the delays in the shipments on the part of the plaintiff. But the court instructed the jury that if the defendants, at the time accepting the delivery of the cargo paid for, had no notice of the failure of the plaintiff to ship about 1,000 tons in the month of February, and immediately upon learning that fact gave notice of their intention to rescind, the verdict should be for them. The plaintiff excepted to this instruction, and, after verdict and judgment for the defendants, sued out this writ of error.

In the contracts of merchants, time is of the essence. The time of shipment is the usual and convenient means of fixing the probable time of arrival, with a view of providing funds to pay for the goods, or of fulfilling contracts with third persons. A statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty in the sense in which that term is used in insurance and maritime law, that is to say, a condition precedent upon the failure or non-performance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract. Behn v. Burness, 3 Best & S. 751; Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728, 17 L. Ed. 768; Davison v. Von Lingen, 113 U. S. 40, 5 Sup. Ct. 346, 28 L. Ed. 885.

The contract sued on is a single contract for the sale and purchase of 5,000 tons of iron rails, shipped from a European port or ports for Philadelphia. The subsidiary provisions as to shipping in different months, and as to paying for each shipment upon its delivery, do not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be shipments, or deliveries of so many distinct quantities of iron. Mersey S. & I. Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, 439. The further provision that the sellers shall not be compelled to replace any parcel lost after shipment, simply reduces, in the event of such a loss, the quantity to be delivered and paid for. The times of shipment, as designated in the contract, are "at the rate of about 1,000 tons per month, beginning February, 1880, but whole contract to be shipped before August 1, 1880." These words are not satisfied by shipping one-sixth part of the 5,000 tons, or about 833 tons, in each of the six months which begin with February and end with July. But they require about 1,000 tons to be shipped in each of the five months from February to June inclusive, and allow no more than slight and unimportant deficiencies in the shipments during those months to be made up in the month of July. The contract is not one for the sale of a specific lot of goods, identified by independent circumstances,—such as all those deposited in a certain warehouse, or to be shipped in a particular vessel, or that may be manufactured by the seller, or may be required for use by the buyer, in a certain mill,—in which case the mention of the quantity, accompanied by the qualification of "about," or "more or less," is regarded as a mere estimate of the probable amount, as to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it. But the contract before us comes within the general rule: "When no such independent circumstances are referred to, and the engagement is to furnish goods of a certain quality or character to a certain amount, the quantity specified is material, and governs the contract. The addition of the qualifying words 'about,' 'more or less,' and the like, in such cases, is only for the purpose of providing against accidental variations arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure, or weight." Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 171, 172, 24 L. Ed. 622. The seller is bound to deliver the quantity stipulated, and has no right either to compel the buyer to accept a less quantity, or to require him to select part out of a greater quantity; and when the goods are to be shipped in certain proportions monthly, the seller's failure to ship the required quantity in the first month gives the buyer the same right to rescind the whole contract that he would have had if it had been agreed that all the goods should be delivered at once.

The plaintiff, instead of shipping about 1,000 tons in February and about 1,000 tons in March, as stipulated in the contract, shipped only 400 tons in February, and 885 tons in March. His failure to fulfill the contract on his part in respect to these first two installments justified the defendants in rescinding the whole contract, provided they distinctly and seasonably asserted the right of rescission. The defendants, immediately after the arrival of the March shipments, and as soon as they knew that the quantities which had been shipped in February and in March were less than the contract called for, clearly and positively asserted the right to rescind, if the law entitled them to do so. Their previous acceptance of the single cargo of 400 tons shipped in February was no waiver of this right, because it took place without notice or means of knowledge that the stipulated quantity had not been shipped in February. The price paid by them for that cargo being above the market value, the plaintiff suffered no injury by the omission of the defendants to return the iron; and no reliance was placed on that omission in the correspondence between the parties.

The case wholly differs from that of Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. 149, 15 L. Ed. 847, in which the buyer of a specific lot of goods accepted and used part of them with full means of previously ascertaining whether they conformed to the contract. The plaintiff, denying the defendants' right to rescind, and asserting that the contract was still in force, was bound to show such performance on his part as entitled him to demand performance on their part, and, having failed to do so, cannot maintain this action.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment below should be affirmed. But as much of the argument at the bar was devoted to a discussion of the recent English cases, and as a diversity in the law, as administered on the two sides of the Atlantic, concerning the interpretation and effect of commercial contracts of this kind, is greatly to be deprecated, it is proper to add that upon a careful examination of the cases referred to they do not appear to us to establish any rule inconsistent with our conclusion.

In the leading case of Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurl. & N. 19, which was an action upon a contract of sale of 667 tons of bar iron, to be shipped from Sweden in June, July, August, and September, and in about equal portions each month, at a certain price payable on delivery, the declaration alleged that the plaintiffs performed all things necessary to entitle them to have the contract performed by the defendants, and were ready and willing to perform the contract on their part, and in June shipped a certain portion of the iron, and within a reasonable time afterwards offered to deliver to the defendants the portion so shipped, but the defendants refused to receive it, and gave notice to the plaintiffs that they would not accept the rest. The defendants pleaded that the shipment in June was of about 20 tons only, and that the plaintiffs failed to complete the shipment for that month according to the contract. Upon demurrer to the pleas, it was argued for the plaintiffs that the shipment of about one-fourth of the iron in each month was not a condition precedent, and that the defendants' only remedy for a failure to ship that quantity was by a cross-action. But judgment was given for the defendants, Chief Baron Pollock saying: "The defendants refused to accept the first shipment, because, as they say, it was not a performance, but a breach of the contract. Where parties have made an agreement for themselves, the courts ought not to make another for them. Here they say that, in the events that have happened, one-fourth shall be shipped in each month, and we cannot say that they meant to accept any other quantity. At the outset the plaintiffs failed to tender the quantity according to the contract,—they tendered a much less quantity. The defendants had a right to say that this was no performance of the contract, and they were no more bound to accept the short quantity than if a single delivery had been contracted for. Therefore the pleas are an answer to the action." 5 Hurl. & N. 28. So in Coddington v. Paleologo, L. R. 2 Exch. 193, while there was a division of opinion upon the question whether a contract to supply goods, "delivering on April 17th, complete 8th May," bound the seller to begin delivering on April 17th, all the judges agreed that if it did, and the seller made no delivery on that day, the buyer might rescind the contract.

On the other hand, in Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, under a contract to supply from 6,000 to 8,000 tons of coal, to be taken by the buyer's wagons from the seller's colliery in equal monthly quantities for 12 months, the buyer sent wagons for only 150 tons during the first month; and it was held that this did not entitle the seller to annul the contract and decline to deliver any more coal, but that his only remedy was by an action for damages. And in Brandt v. Lawrence, 1 Q. B. Div. 344, in which the contract was for the purchase of 4,500 quarters, 10 per cent. more or less, of Russian oats, "shipment by steamer or steamers during February," or, in case of ice preventing shipment, then immediately upon the opening of navigation, and 1,139 quarters were shipped by one steamer in time, and 3,361 quarters were shipped too late, it was held that the buyer was bound to accept the 1,139 quarters, and was liable to an action by the seller for refusing to accept them. Such being the condition of the law of England as declared in the lower courts, the case of Bowes v. Shand, after conflicting decisions in the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal, was finally determined by the House of Lords. 1 Q. B. Div. 470; 2 Q. B. Div. 112; 2 App. Cas. 455. In that case, two contracts were made in London, each for the sale of 300 tons of "Madras rice, to be shipped at Madras or coast for this port during the months of March $^{\text{and}}_{\text{or}}$ April, 1874, per Rajah of Cochin." The 600 tons filled 8,200 bags, of which 7,120 bags were put on board, and bills of lading signed in February; and for the rest, consisting of 1,030 bags put on board in February, and 50 in March, the bill of lading was signed in March. At the trial of an action by the seller against the buyer for refusing to accept the cargo, evidence was given that rice shipped in February would be the spring crop, and quite as good as rice shipped in March or April. Yet the House of Lords held that the action could not be maintained, because the meaning of the contract, as apparent upon its face, was that all the rice must be put on board in March and April, or in one of those months. In the opinions there delivered the general principles underlying this class of cases are most clearly and satisfactorily stated. It will be sufficient to quote a few passages from two of those opinions.

Lord Chancellor Cairns said: "It does not appear to me to be a question for your lordships, or for any court, to consider whether that is a contract which bears upon the face of it some reason, some explanation, why it was made in that form, and why the stipulation is made that the shipment should be during these particular months. It is a mercantile contract, and merchants are not in the habit of placing upon their contracts stipulations to which they do not attach some value and importance." 2 App. Cas. 463. "If it be admitted that the literal meaning would imply that the whole quantity must be put on board during a specified time, it is no answer to that literal meaning,—it is no observation which can dispose of, or get rid of, or displace, that literal meaning, —to say that it puts an additional burden on the seller without a corresponding benefit to the purchaser; that is a matter of which the seller and purchaser are the best judges. Nor is it any reason for saying that it would be a means by which purchasers, without any real cause, would frequently obtain an excuse for rejecting contracts when prices had dropped. The non-fulfillment of any term in any contract is a means by which a purchaser is able to get rid of the contract when prices have dropped; but that is no reason why a term which is found in a contract should not be fulfilled." Pages 465, 466. "It was suggested that even if the construction of the contract be as I have stated, still if the rice was not put on board in the particular months, that would not be a reason which would justify the appellants in having rejected the rice altogether, but that it might afford a ground for a cross-action by them if they could show that any particular damage resulted to them from the rice not having been put on board in the months in question. My lords, I cannot think that there is any foundation whatever for that argument. If the construction of the contract be as I have said, that it bears that the rice is to be put on board in the months in question, that is part of the description of the subject-matter of what is sold. What is sold is not 300 tons of rice in gross or in general. It is 300 tons of Madras rice to be put on board at Madras during the particular months." "The plaintiff, who sues upon that contract, has not launched his case until he has shown that he has tendered that thing which has been contracted for, and if he is unable to show that, he cannot claim any damages for the non-fulfillment of the contract." Pages 467, 468.

Lord Blackburn said: "If the description of the article tendered is different in any respect, it is not the article bargained for, and the other party is not bound to take it. I think in this case what the parties bargained for was rice, shipped at Madras or the coast of Madras. Equally good rice might have been shipped a little to the north or a little to the south of the coast of Madras. I do not quite know what the boundary is, and probably equally good rice might have been shipped in February as was shipped in March, or equally good rice might have been shipped in May as was shipped in April, and I dare say equally good rice might have been put on board another ship as that which was put on board the Rajah of Cochin. But the parties have chosen, for reasons best known to themselves, to say: We bargain to take rice, shipped in this particular region, at that particular time, on board that particular ship; and before the defendants can be compelled to take anything in fulfillment of that contract it must be shown not merely that it is equally good, but that it is the same article as they have bargained for, otherwise they are not bound to take it." 2 App. Cas. 480, 481.

Soon after that decision of the House of Lords, two cases were determined in the Court of Appeal. In Reuter v. Sala, 4 C. P. Div. 239, under a contract for the sale of "about 25 tons (more or less) black pepper, October $\substack{\text{and}\\\text{or}}$ November shipment, from Penang to London, the name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars to be declared to the buyer in writing within 60 days from date of bill of lading," the seller, within the 60 days, declared 25 tons by a particular vessel, of which only 20 tons were shipped in November, and five tons in December; and it was held that the buyer had the right to refuse to receive any part of the pepper. In Honck v. Muller, 7 Q. B. Div. 92, under a contract for the sale of 2,000 tons of pig-iron, to be delivered to the buyer free on board at the maker's wharf "in November, or equally over November, December, and January next," the buyer failed to take any iron in November, but demanded delivery of one-third in December and one-third in January; and it was held that the seller was justified in refusing to deliver, and in giving notice to the buyer that he considered the contract as canceled by the buyer's not taking any iron in November.

The plaintiff in the case at bar greatly relied on the very recent decision of the House of Lords in Mersey Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal in 9 Q. B. Div. 648, and following the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208. But the point there decided was that the failure of the buyer to pay for the first installment of the goods upon delivery does not, unless the circumstances evince an intention on his part to be no longer bound by the contract, entitle the seller to rescind the contract, and to decline to make further deliveries under it. And the grounds of the decision, as stated by Lord Chancellor Selborne in moving judgment in the House of Lords, are applicable only to the case of a failure of the buyer to pay for, and not to that of a failure of the seller to deliver, the first installment. The Lord Chancellor said: "The contract is for the purchase of 5,000 tons of steel blooms of the company's manufacture, therefore, it is one contract for the purchase of that quantity of steel blooms. No doubt, there are subsidiary terms in the contract, as to the time of delivery,—'delivery 1,000 tons monthly, commencing January next,'—and as to the time of payment,—'payment net cash within three days after receipt of shipping documents,'—but that does not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be deliveries for the purpose of so many distinct quantities of iron. It is quite consistent with the natural meaning of the contract that it is to be one contract for the purchase of that quantity of iron to be delivered at those times and in that manner, and for which payment is so to be made. It is perfectly clear that no particular payment can be a condition precedent of the entire contract, because the delivery under the contract was most certainly to precede payment; and that being so, I do not see how, without express words, it can possibly be made a condition precedent to the subsequent fulfillment of the unfulfilled part of the contract by the delivery of the undelivered steel." 9 App. Cas. 439.

Moreover, although in the Court of Appeal dicta were uttered tending to approve the decision in Simpson v. Crippin, and to disparage the decisions in Hoare v. Rennie and Honck v. Muller, above cited, yet in the House of Lords Simpson v. Crippin was not even referred to, and Lord Blackburn, who had given the leading opinion in that case, as well as Lord Bramwell, who had delivered the leading opinion in Honck v. Muller, distinguished Hoare v. Rennie and Honck v. Muller from the case in judgment. 9 App. Cas. 144, 446.

Upon a review of the English decisions, the rule laid down in the earlier cases of Hoare v. Rennie and Coddington v. Paleologo, as well as in the later cases of Reuter v. Sala and Honck v. Muller, appears to us to be supported by a greater weight of authority than the rule stated in the intermediate cases of Simpson v. Crippin and Brandt v. Lawrence, and to accord better with the general principles affirmed by the House of Lords in Bowes v. Shand, while it in no wise contravenes the decision of that tribunal in Mersey Co. v. Naylor. In this country there is less judicial authority upon the question. The two cases most nearly in point that have come to our notice are Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216, which accords with Bowes v. Shand and King Philip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603, which approves and follows Hoare v. Rennie. The recent cases in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, cited at the bar, support no other conclusion. In Shinn v. Bodine, 60 Pa. 182, 100 Am. Dec. 560, the point decided was that a contract for the purchase of 800 tons of coal at a certain price per ton, "coal to be delivered on board vessels as sent for during the months of August and September," was an entire contract, under which nothing was payable until delivery of the whole, and therefore the seller had no right to rescind the contract upon a refusal to pay for one cargo before that time. In Morgan v. McKee, 77 Pa. 228, and in Scott v. Kittanning Coal Co., 89 Pa. 231, 33 Am. Rep. 753, the buyer's right to rescind the whole contract upon the failure of the seller to deliver one installment was denied, only because that right had been waived, in the one case by unreasonable delay in asserting it, and in the other by having accepted, paid for, and used a previous installment of the goods. The decision of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Winchester v. Newton, 2 Allen (Mass.) 492, resembles that of the House of Lords in Mersey Co. v. Naylor.

Being of opinion that the plaintiff's failure to make such shipments in February and March as the contract required prevents his maintaining this action, it is needless to dwell upon the further objection that the shipments in April did not comply with the contract, because the defendants could not be compelled to take about 1,000 tons out of the larger quantity shipped in that month, and the plaintiff, after once designating the names of vessels, as the contract bound him to do, could not substitute other vessels. See Busk v. Spence, 4 Camp. 329; Graves v. Legg, 9 Exch. 709; Reuter v. Sala, above cited.

BLACKBURN v. REILLY.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1885. 47 N. J. Law, 290, 1 Atl. 27, 54 Am. Rep. 159.

In case. In error to the Essex circuit court.

Blackburn, the plaintiff below, a Virginia dealer in bark, entered into a contract on May 13, 1882, to sell to the defendant below, Reilly, a Newark tanner, for use in his business, 52 car-loads of bark at the price of $18 per ton, to be delivered at the rate of one car-load per week until the whole should have been delivered. Under this contract five car-loads were actually delivered. This was stored by Reilly in a loft over his tannery with other bark. It was all paid for at the contract price by July 3, 1882, but none of it was used until July 15th. Reilly claims that it was then found to be musty, lumpy, and unfit for the purpose for which it had been bought; and shortly after Reilly notified Blackburn not to send any more,—first by mail, alleging that he was overcrowded, and shortly afterwards in a personal interview, alleging its unmerchantable condition. * * *

DIXON, J. * * * The other question discussed on the argument was whether the defendant had the right to refuse to receive any more bark in case he could satisfy the jury that the five loads of bark delivered were not equal in quality to the requirements of the contract.[65] The contract provided that the plaintiff should deliver, and the defendant should receive, one car-load of bark weekly for a year at $18 a ton, payable on delivery. It belongs to a class of agreements sometimes called continuing contracts of sale, because they are to be completely performed, not by single acts of delivery and payment, but by a series of such acts at stated intervals. The rule to be applied in determining whether the express obligations of such contracts remain after one or more breaches by either party has been the subject of much discussion of late years, and has given rise to some contrariety of judicial opinion. We do not feel constrained by the phases of the present case to enter at any length upon the details of this discussion. In our opinion the rule established in England by the judgment of the House of Lords in Mersey Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal in S. C., 9 Q. B. Div. 648, is one which in ordinary contracts of this nature will work out results most conformable to reason and justice. The rule is that defaults by one party in making particular payments or deliveries will not release the other party from his duty to make the other deliveries or payments stipulated in the contract, unless the conduct of the party in default be such as to evince an intention to abandon the contract, or a design no longer to be bound by its terms. This rule leaves the party complaining of a breach to recover damages for his injury on the normal principle of compensation, without allowing him the abnormal advantage that might inure to him from an option to rescind the bargain. It also accords with the ancient doctrine laid down by Serjeant Williams in his notes to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320b, that where a covenant (of the plaintiff) goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the contract on the part of the defendant without averring performance in the declaration. It of course is inapplicable where the parties have expressed their intention to make performance of a stipulation touching a part of the bargain a condition precedent to the continuing obligation of the contract; and peculiar cases might arise where the courts would infer such an intention from the nature and circumstances of the bargain itself,—cases in which the courts would see that the partial stipulation was so important, so went to the root of the matter, (to use a phrase of Blackburn, J., in Poussard v. Spiers, 1 Q. B. Div. 410,) as to make its performance a condition of the obligation to proceed in the contract.

The case in hand is one of ordinary character, and therefore the question under the rule is whether the circumstances would warrant an inference by the jury that the plaintiff purposed to abandon the contract, or no longer to be bound by its terms. This question is, we think, not doubtful. The plaintiff had delivered five car-loads, which had been accepted and paid for by the defendant without any intimation that they were not satisfactory; was ready to deliver the sixth, when the defendant requested delay; and was prevented from further deliveries only by the peremptory refusal of the defendant to receive any more. Against this refusal the plaintiff protested, then proposed an arbitration, and threatened suit if the defendant should persist, and finally brought this action for damages. In the force of all this there is not a shadow of reason for saying that the plaintiff had abandoned or repudiated the contract. If the five deliveries of defective bark had been made against notice and remonstrance, it might have suggested the idea that the plaintiff meant to disregard his obligations; but by the defendant's acceptance of and payment for the bark without objection this ground for a possible inference of repudiation is wanting in the case. We regard it as incontestable that the deliveries were made in recognition of the binding force of the agreement. The defendant, therefore, was not discharged. Cahen v. Platt, 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203, was precisely like the case before us. The plaintiff had agreed to sell the defendant glass, to be delivered in installments. He had made several deliveries, which had been accepted and paid for by the defendant. Subsequently the defendant complained of the quality, and refused to receive any more. The suit was for damages resulting from the refusal, and the plaintiff recovered. Scott v. Kittanning Coal Co., 89 Pa. 231, 33 Am. Rep. 753, was also similar; but there the defendant contended that the conduct of the plaintiff in the delivery of the defective coal was fraudulent, yet the court held the defendant would not be thereby discharged.

There was no error in the ruling of the trial justice on this proffered defense. The judgment below should be affirmed.[66]

MILLAR'S KARRI & JARRAH CO. v. WEDDEL, TURNER & CO.

(In the King's Bench Division, 1908. 100 Law T. [N. S.] 128.)

The contract was in the following terms:

Sold for account of Messrs. Weddel, Turner, and Co. to our principals; 1100 pieces Tasmanian blue gum at 2s. 9d. per foot cube, cost, freight, and insurance, and safe port in the United Kingdom, destination to be declared by buyers on or before being advised that bills of lading are ready for signature. All to be 14 in. by 14 in. square by 65 ft. long. The timber to be hewn die square without camber, sound, straight grown, and of good merchantable quality and condition. Shipment of about half the quantity to be made in June, July, August next at buyers' option, and the balance to be shipped October, November, December next at buyers' option. To be paid for by net cash on presentation of and in exchange for shipping documents. Any question arising under this contract to be decided by the brokers hereto, but should either of the principals elect to do so they may call for arbitration in the usual manner.[67]

BIGHAM, J. The question in this case is whether the award is bad on its face. The material facts are as follows: On the 15th Feb., 1907, Weddel and Co. sold to Millars and Co. 1100 pieces of Tasmanian blue gum timber at a c. f. and i. price; the wood was to be of a certain size and hewn in a certain way; it was to be without camber, sound, straight grown, and of good merchantable quality and condition. The shipment was to be made in Tasmania in two parcels —namely, about one-half in June and the remainder in October, the destination being the United Kingdom. The payment was to be made against delivery of the shipping documents. The shipments were not made in the required proportions, but the buyers appear to have made no point of this. The first shipment consisted of 750 pieces; the second of 350 or thereabouts. The shipping documents in respect of both shipments arrived before the goods, and were duly taken up by the buyers. When the first parcel arrived the buyers examined the wood and found it did not accord with the requirements of the contract. They refused to accept it and demanded all their money back, intimating their intention to refuse to take the second shipment upon the ground that the first shipment was such a departure from the contract as to justify a refusal to accept either parcel.

The vendors denied the statements of the buyers as to the first lot, and contended that in any event there was no justification for refusing to take the second lot. The dispute was then referred to Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, who, after hearing the evidence, made the award now complained of. It is in these terms: "I award that the 750 pieces did not comply with the terms of the contract, and I further award that the said shipment was and is so far from complying with the requirements of the contract as to entitle the buyers to repudiate and to rescind the whole contract, and to refuse to accept the said shipment and all further shipments under the said contract."

It is this award which is said to be bad on its face. It is argued that it violates the well-known rule of law that where goods are sold to be delivered in different instalments a breach by one party in connection with one instalment does not of itself entitle the other party to rescind the contract as to the other instalments. But I do not agree. The rule, which is a very good one, is, like most rules, subject to qualification. Thus, if the breach is of such a kind, or takes place in such circumstances as reasonably to lead to the inference that similar breaches will be committed in relation to subsequent deliveries, the whole contract may there and then be regarded as repudiated, and may be rescinded. If, for instance, a buyer fails to pay for one delivery in such circumstances as to lead to the inference that he will not be able to pay for subsequent deliveries; or if a seller delivers goods differing from the requirements of the contract, and does so in such circumstances as to lead to the inference that he cannot, or will not, deliver any other kind of goods in the future, the other contracting party will be under no obligation to wait to see what may happen; he can at once cancel the contract and rid himself of the difficulty. This is the effect of section 31, subsec. 2 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, which reads as follows: "Where there is a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more instalments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of, or pay for, one or more instalments, it is a question in each case depending on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case, whether the breach of contract is a repudiation of the whole contract, or whether it is a severable breach giving rise to a claim for compensation, but not to a right to treat the whole contract as repudiated." In the present case, says the umpire, the first shipment, consisting of much more than half the whole, was so bad as to lead to the inference that the second shipment, which was to be made at the same place and on behalf of the same parties, would also be bad. That is the sense in which I read what he has written. Can it be said that such an inference could not reasonably be drawn from the conduct of the sellers in relation to the first shipment? I think not. The umpire has so found, and has expressed his finding in intelligible language. I think, therefore this motion must be dismissed.

WALTON, J. I agree, and for the reasons which have been stated, I only wish to add that it appears to me that there are two flaws in the argument which was addressed to us in support of this motion. It has been said, in the first place, that the award can only be supported on the ground that what the sellers did amounted to a repudiation of the whole contract—that that means or involves an intention to repudiate the whole contract, and it has been said that, granting everything here, it is plain that there was no intention to repudiate, because the sellers were insisting that they were performing their contract as far as they had gone, and insisting that they were entitled to have the contract performed in the future. I think that that is a fallacy. Of course, the idea of repudiation, which is the word used in section 31 of the Sale of Goods Act, does, no doubt, in a sense involve an intention to repudiate; but, to constitute a repudiation, as Sir George Jessel pointed out in the Mersey Steel & Iron Company v. Naylor (supra), it is not necessary that the party should say, "I will repudiate the contract," or "I intend to repudiate the contract." If, in fact, he is repudiating the contract, he is doing so, although he may be contending that he is performing the contract, and may be intending and expressing an intention to perform what is left of the contract. As Sir George Jessel said in the passage which I have referred to, there may, indeed, be a case where one party says in so many words that he does not intend to go on with the contract, but generally the intention must be inferred from the acts of the parties. The second flaw which I think is involved in the argument is this, that a defective delivery of one instalment cannot per se amount in effect to a repudiation. I think that is the foundation of a great deal of the argument that has been addressed to us. I desire to point out that I cannot find in the old cases, and certainly not in section 31 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, any such statement of the law. All that the Sale of Goods Act, and we need not look back further than the words of that Act, says is that in the case of defective delivery in the case of one instalment, it is a question in each case depending on the circumstances of the contract whether the breach of contract—that is, in this particular case, whether the defective delivery—is a repudiation of the whole contract (that is the plain meaning of the words), or whether the defective delivery is a severable breach giving rise to a claim for compensation, but not to the right to treat the whole contract as repudiated. I gather that that plainly means that the defective delivery may, having regard to the terms of the contract and to circumstances of the case, amount in effect to a repudiation of the whole contract. Now, what has the umpire found here? He has found that there was a defective delivery amounting to a breach of contract, and he has found that the defective delivery, under the circumstances of the case, was such a breach as amounted in effect to repudiation. He may or may not have been right in such a finding; we do not know what the evidence was upon which he came to that conclusion; we do not know whether there was any evidence upon which he was justified in coming to such a conclusion; but that question is not before us. It seems to me that the terms of the award follow quite properly—I do not mean to say in exact words, but in effect—the terms of the section, and that there is no ground for saying that the award is bad on the face of it. Therefore, I think this motion fails.

Motion dismissed.

JENSEN v. GOSS et al.

(District Court of Appeal of California, 1919. 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 Pac. 225.)

Action by Fred Jensen against Charles E. Goss and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment for $231 for damages found to have been suffered by plaintiff by reason of the failure of defendants to deliver to him hay under a written contract dated June 1, 1916, by the terms of which the hay was to be paid for "on the 13th day of each month following delivery." The defense is that plaintiff refused to pay for the hay as required by the contract, thereby releasing defendants from further performance on their part.

The testimony of and in behalf of defendants is corroborated by the evidence and admissions of plaintiff while on the stand, and fails to support the findings of the trial court. Plaintiff never met his obligations to pay as required. On the 15th day of July, the first month following deliveries of hay, one of the defendants personally called on him and demanded payment of the "money due according to his contract." Defendant promised "that in a matter of a few days he would pay." He made no payment until the 28th of the month, when he paid $275 on account.

Defendants continued to deliver hay as required by the plaintiff, and the latter continued his dilatory payments. Statements of the account were regularly sent to him on the 13th of each month. Collectors of the defendants repeatedly called on him. Members of the firm (defendants) as repeatedly conversed with him on the telephone, demanding payment. This condition of affairs continued until October 3d, after which defendants delivered no more hay. At that time plaintiff owed them $920, on account of which he made three payments of $200 each, the last on December 12th.

On December 14th one of the defendants personally called on plaintiff and demanded payment of $320.22, the balance due. Plaintiff, admitting that he "would pay him, that he had some money then," refused to pay until defendants delivered two more carloads of hay. There was some conversation relative to the quality of the hay delivered by the defendants, but refusal to pay the balance due was not predicated on that ground. Defendant told him that he considered the contract canceled. The same day defendants' attorneys made demand for "immediate payment of the" balance due, and notified plaintiff that, unless such payment was made upon receipt of the demand and notice, defendants would, by reason of the breach of the contract by plaintiff in failing to make payments for said hay as provided therein, refuse to deliver any further amount of hay.

Plaintiff did not pay the balance until December 21st, at which time, through his attorneys, he requested the defendants to deliver two carloads of hay. No hay being delivered, the plaintiff four or five days later went to the barn of defendants and personally demanded delivery of the hay, and was informed by them that the contract was at an end. After giving further orders to defendants for delivery of hay, no one of which was filled, plaintiff commenced this action.

In view of the evidence in the case, we have looked to respondent to sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court by weight of authority. This he has not done. None of the cases cited by him, so far as we are able to find, relate to a mercantile contract such as the one here under consideration. They have to do with purchase of real estate on the installment plan, forfeitures, and equitable rights or leasehold interests. "In mercantile contracts, such as contracts for the manufacture and sale of goods and the like, it is generally held that the parties have intended to make time the essence of the contract." 13 Corpus Juris, 688, and cases cited. The defendants were justified in rescinding the contract when plaintiff showed a clear intention to violate its provisions, and to withhold payments due until the delivery of more hay. Minaker v. California Canneries Co., 138 Cal. 239, 71 Pac. 110.

The rights of defendants to rescind were not waived, nor were they affected, by the fact that they did not stop delivery of hay immediately after failure of plaintiff to make his first payment as required. They had the right to rely, for a reasonable length of time at least, upon the promise of plaintiff to pay. San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton Land & Improvement Co., 119 Cal. 272, 51 Pac. 335.

Had plaintiff rested his refusal to pay on the ground of a failure to deliver the quality of hay required by the contract, such position would not aid him in this action. He could not offset any damages for such alleged breach on the part of defendants without showing performance on his own part of his own agreement. Minaker v. California Canneries Co., supra.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is reversed.[68]

HARTON v. HILDEBRAND et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1911. 230 Pa. 335, 79 Atl. 571.)

Suit by William E. Harton against William E. Hildebrand and another. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and bill reinstated.

MESTREZAT, J.[69] We do not agree with the learned court below in dismissing this bill, which was filed to restrain the defendant Howley from selling and disposing of the houses until he had paid the debts due from Hildebrand, the other defendant, to the plaintiff Harton.

No exceptions were filed by either party to the findings of fact made by the learned trial court, and therefore the case must be disposed of upon those facts. They may be summarized as follows:

On June 1, 1901, Hildebrand entered into a contract with Harton for the erection of eight dwelling houses on certain lots fronting on Brackenridge avenue in the thirteenth ward of the city of Pittsburg. On June 9, 1901, Frank P. Howley made a deed to Hildebrand for these lots, and he proceeded at once with the erection of the buildings. On August 7, 1901, Michael P. Howley, father of Frank P. Howley, conveyed to Hildebrand 26 lots of ground on Avalon street in the thirteenth ward of the city of Pittsburg. Judgment notes were given to secure the purchase money, but they were withheld from record [68] In the following cases nonpayment of part of the price as agreed was held to privilege the seller to make no more deliveries and to constitute a vital breach; Burt v. Garden City Sand Co., 237 Ill. 473, 86 N. E. 1055 (1909), buyer largely in arrears after definite notice that it would be fatal; Dudley v. Wye, 230 Mass. 350, 119 N. E. 790 (1918), prompt payment had been insisted on, and buyer gave weak excuses; Samuels v. W. H. Miner Chocolate Co., 235 Mass. 312, 126 N. E. 771 (1920), failure to pay and also failure to send more orders as agreed; National Machine & Tool Co. v. Standard Shoe Machinery Co., 181 Mass. 275, 63 N. E. 900 (1902); Kamps & Sacksteder Drug Co. v. United Drug Co., 164 Wis. 412, 160 N. W. 271 (1916), nonpayment plus bankruptcy; Kokomo Strawboard Co. v. Inman, 134 N. Y. 92, 31 N. E. 248 (1892), repeated failures to pay; Rugg v. Moore, 110 Pa. 236, 1 Atl. 320 (1885), failure to pay plus tortious taking of the goods; Lang v. Hedenberg, 277 Ill. 368, 115 N. E. 566 (1917), land sale; Hull Coal & Coke Co. v. Empire Coal & Coke Co., 113 Fed. 256, 51 C. C. A. 213 (1904); Phillips v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 646, 23 L. Ed. 341 (1875); Collins-Plass-Thayer Co. v. Hewlett, 109 S. C. 245, 95 S. E. 510 (1918); Beltinck v. Tacoma Theater Co., 61 Wash. 132, 111 Pac. 1045 (1910), advertising contract.

Of course, the condition of payment, like other conditions, can be waived. Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 158 Cal. 264, 110 Pac. 951 (1910).

[69] Parts of the opinion are omitted.

until the Prudential Trust Company, which was to furnish the money for the erection of the houses, had put on record as a first lien a mortgage from Hildebrand. On September 26, 1901, Hildebrand made a contract with Harton for the erection of 19 houses on the Avalon street property. This contract provided that the buildings should all be finished by April 1, 1902, and that the contract price should be $62,149, and should be paid "by the owner to the contractor in installments as follows: 70 per cent. of the above amount to be paid on estimated amount of work done as the buildings progress."

The Brackenridge avenue houses were completed in March, 1902. The houses on Avalon street were not finished or nearly finished by April 1, 1902, and Hildebrand and Harton agreed in the winter of 1901–1902 that no attempt should be made in the cold weather to complete these houses on April 1st. The contract price for the Brackenridge avenue houses was $18,000 and when they were completed in March, 1902, there was due from Hildebrand to Harton $5,573.61.

Harton began the Avalon street houses soon after making the contract and carried on the work until December when it was suspended, and began work again about March 1, 1902, and continued until about May 20, 1902, only nine of the houses, however, being begun at this or any later time by him; this action on his part being apparently acquiesced in by Hildebrand. On the latter date Harton presented to Hildebrand an estimate of the work already done on these houses, showing the value of the work done to date, the 70 per cent. of the amount required to be paid in installments, the amount of extra work done, the aggregate of the amount already paid him, and the balance of $2,496.26, which was then due and payable. This statement was admitted by Hildebrand in writing to be correct.

In May, 1902, a number of mechanics' liens were filed against the Brackenridge property; but no liens were ever filed against the Avalon street houses.

On May 22, 1902, Harton quit work on the Avalon street houses and declared that he would not go on with the contract because of the failure of Hildebrand to pay him the sum owing on the first and on the second contracts as above stated.

On June 14, 1902, Hildebrand conveyed to Frank P. Howley both the Brackenridge avenue and Avalon street properties, and as part of the same transaction an agreement was entered into between Hildebrand and Howley by which the latter accepted the conveyance, subject to all legal claims for labor and materials furnished in and about the erection of the houses. By this agreement, Howley assumed payment of these claims.

On July 31, 1902, Howley wrote Harton that if the latter was willing to go on under the contract he would aid him as much as he could in the construction of the buildings; that if he declined to go on he would complete the buildings himself. This notice was given under the sixth paragraph of the contract relating to the Avalon street houses, which provides that, if the contractor at any time during the progress of the work fails to supply material or workmen, or causes any unreasonable suspension of work, the owner may terminate the contract and finish the buildings at the contractor's expense. Immediately upon the receipt of this communication Harton replied that as there was owing to him for a long time at least $2,500 on this contract which had not been paid, and as it was impossible by reason of the nonpayment for him to carry out the contract, that he thereupon declared the contract null and void. Howley then proceeded to finish the nine houses, which cost him $12,548 more than the contract price. * * *

The parties agree that the only question in the case is whether, under the circumstances existing at the time, Harton was justified in stopping work on the Avalon street houses on May 22, 1902, and, subsequently, in refusing to proceed with it on notice by Frank P. Howley, who was then the owner of the property. As noted above, the learned court below held that "under all the circumstances it was altogether unreasonable for Harton to rescind the contract for any such delay of payment as this." The court, it will be observed, does not find that the amount of the estimate of May 20, 1902, is not correct or was not due Harton at that date, or that Howley was dissatisfied with it; nor does the court base its decree against the plaintiff on either of those grounds. It, therefore, becomes important to ascertain what the circumstances were on May 22, 1902, when Harton declined to proceed under the Avalon street contract, and on August 1, 1902, when he declared the contract rescinded. While, as suggested by the counsel for the appellee, a balance due Harton under the Brackenridge avenue contract has no bearing upon the rights of the parties under the Avalon street contract and would not justify the rescission of the latter contract by Harton, yet it may not be out of place to note the fact that, at the date of the suspension of work by Harton on the Avalon street houses, Hildebrand was indebted to him under the Brackenridge avenue contract, which had been fully performed by Harton, in the sum of over $5,500. For the payment of this balance, Harton had no security, and Hildebrand had no property out of which it could be collected. * * *

The contract price was to be paid, as stipulated in the agreement, "by the owner to the contractor in installments as follows: 70 per cent. of the above amount to be paid on estimated amount of work done as the buildings progress." It is manifest, therefore, that estimates were to be made as the work progressed. While the contract does not state when the estimates were to be made, yet it clearly contemplated that when an estimate had been made that 70 per cent. of it was then due and payable. On May 20, 1902, an estimate of the work done and the material furnished was made, and it appeared by the estimate that there was due and payable from Hildebrand to Harton on the Avalon street contract the sum of $2,496.26. Hildebrand was the owner of the property, and the money was due from him. It is not pretended that he made any offer to pay it or secure it. At that time he had no property, except the Brackenridge avenue and Avalon street properties. As found by the court, there was yet due Harton on the Brackenridge avenue contract over $5,500. That property was incumbered by a first mortgage to the Prudential Trust Company and by judgments entered on notes for the purchase price of the land. Hildebrand had signed a no-lien contract. By agreement of the parties another Prudential Trust Company mortgage of $60,000 was a first lien on the Avalon street property, and it was also subject to the judgments entered for the purchase money. It is therefore apparent that, for the balance due Harton for labor and material furnished in the construction of the Avalon street houses, recourse to that property or the Brackenridge avenue property would avail him nothing. Hildebrand was without means, and a pursuit of him by Harton would have simply resulted in the pursuer being mulcted in the cost in a vain endeavor to collect the claim.

These were the conditions existing at the time the estimate of the balance due Harton on the Avalon street contract was made on May 20, 1902, and on the second day thereafter when he declined to proceed with the work until the balance was paid. The same conditions prevailed on August 1, 1902, when he rescinded the contract. Both parties consented to the jurisdiction of equity, and that a chancellor should adjust their differences in accordance with equitable principles. Was it unreasonable, as held by the court below, for Harton to stop work under these circumstances? Was he compelled to proceed with the work, put his labor and material in it, and thus add to the amount already owed him by Hildebrand, with neither property nor any responsible party in view from whom he could compel payment? Is there any principle of equity or rule of law which would require him under these circumstances to proceed with the work simply for the benefit of Hildebrand's creditors and, possibly, for the improvement of Howley's property? Having due regard for the rights of the parties under the stipulations of their contract, these questions permit of but one answer, and that is in the negative. * * *

Hildebrand, the owner, had breached the Avalon street contract, and he was not in a position to demand its enforcement. Howley occupied no better position. The contract was entire as to the erection of the 19 houses, and divisible and severable as to the payment of the installments for the work and material furnished. Hildebrand's failure, therefore, to perform his part of the agreement by paying the estimate of May 20, 1902, gave Harton the right to declare the contract at an end. Rugg v. Moore, 110 Pa. 236, 1 Atl. 320; Easton v. Jones, 193 Pa. 147, 150, 44 Atl. 264, 265. In the last case it is said: "While plaintiff's failure in ability or intention to complete the work will be a good defense, even to an action for a payment stipulated to become due on a state of progress shown to be reached, yet a refusal to pay such an installment without that or other legal excuse is such a breach of the contract as will justify a rescission, and entitle the plaintiff to recover pro tanto for the work." * * *

ST. REGIS PAPER CO. v. SANTA CLARA LUMBER CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1906. 186 N. Y. 89, 78 N. E. 701.)

Action by the St. Regis Paper Company against the Santa Clara Lumber Company. From a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Third Department (93 N. Y. Supp. 1146), affirming a judgment entered on a decision of the Special Term (85 N. Y. Supp. 1034) in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

CULLEN, C. J. This action was brought for the specific performance of a contract whereby the defendant agreed to cut and deliver to the plaintiff from 11,000 to 13,000 cords of pulp wood a year from a large tract of wild lands in the Adirondacks owned by the defendants, during the term of 10 years, at the price of $9 a cord, with the privilege to the plaintiff to obtain a renewal of the contract for an additional term of 10 years at $12 per cord. The case has been before this court on a previous appeal and is reported in 173 N. Y. 149, 65 N. E. 967. In that report will be found a statement of the parts of the contract material to this controversy. On the former appeal, this court, reversing the decisions of the courts below, held that the contract was one the performance of which a court of equity could properly enforce. After our decision the case was tried on its merits and judgment was rendered by the trial court in favor of the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff had made default in the performance of that provision of the contract whereby the plaintiff agreed to make advances to the defendant for the cost of cutting and getting out the wood. The provision is as follows: "Party of the first part (defendant) shall commence to cut wood on or about the 15th day of August of each year for the following season's supply. Party of the second part (plaintiff) shall make such advances [70] The failure and refusal of an owner to make a "progress payment" as required by a building (or other expensive) contract goes to the essence. American-Hawaiian Engineering & Construction Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 497, 133 Pac. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44 (1913); Woodruff Co. v. Exchange Realty Co., 21 Cal. App. 607, 132 Pac. 598 (1913); Peet v. City of East Grand Forks, 101 Minn. 518, 112 N. W. 1003 (1907), city had no funds, large sum due; Newton v. Highland Imp. Co., 62 Minn. 436, 64 N. W. 1146 (1895); Howard County v. Pesha, 103 Neb. 296, 172 N. W. 55 (1919); Fernald Woodward Co. v. Conway Co. (D. C.) 229 Fed. 819 (1916).

"As is usually the case with building contracts, it evidently was in the contemplation of the parties that the contractor could not be expected to finance the operation to completion without receiving the stipulated payments on account as the work progressed. In such cases a substantial compliance as to advance payments is a condition precedent to the contractor's obligation to proceed." Guerini Stone Co. v. P. J. Carlin Const. Co., 248 U. S. 334, 39 Sup. Ct. 102, 63 L. Ed. 275 (1919).

of money to party of the first part as it may request during the progress of the work, but party of the second part need not advance more than approximately the cost of the work done. Payment for the said wood shall be made by the party of the second part to the party of the first part on the 15th day of each month for the wood delivered during the next preceding calendar month, after first deducting from the aggregate of the purchase price of the said wood one-tenth of the advances made upon that season's operations until such advances have been repaid." The judgment of the Special Term was affirmed by the Appellate Division by a divided court, and from the judgment of affirmance this appeal is taken.

The contract, dated the 29th day of August, 1899, was executed by the parties about the 1st of October in that year. For some time prior to the execution of the contract, however, the parties had been in negotiation concerning it, and during that interval, in contemplation of the contract, the defendant had built roads, constructed permanent camps, and incurred expenses for various items necessary for the prosecution of the work. Under the contract, the wood was to be delivered to the plaintiff at any point, the expense of the transportation to which should not exceed the cost of the transportation from Tupper Lake Junction to Watertown N. Y., and the delivery was to commence on or about the 1st day of June in each year. The ordinary method of taking out wood was to cut it, and haul it to the streams during the winter season, whence the next spring it was floated to the point of delivery. No deliveries would be, therefore, made to the plaintiff till June, 1900. On October 7th the defendant demanded the sum of $2,500 on account of expenses already incurred by it, with which demand the plaintiff complied on October 18th. On October 26th the defendant demanded the sum of $5,000 on account, and on November 17th an additional sum of $5,000. On account of these two demands, the plaintiff, on December 5th, paid the sum of $7,500. Now, while the whole controversy and the decision of the court below proceed on the failure of the plaintiff to properly respond to the defendant's demands for advances, it would be impracticable to give within the limits of an opinion even an abstract of the details of the correspondence between the parties. It is sufficient to say that from October 26, 1899, to March 24th following, the defendant made repeated demands for advances, while the plaintiff insisted that the advances asked for by the defendant were largely in excess of those ordinarily made for the purpose of taking pulp wood from the forest. On March 24, 1900, which was the date of the last demand by the defendant prior to its notification to the plaintiff that the contract was rescinded by it, the account between the parties, as found by the trial court, stood as follows: The defendant had expended $37,132.80; the plaintiff had advanced the defendant the sum of $25,000.

On March 24th the defendant sent to the plaintiff the following letter: "Malone, N. Y., March 24th, 1900. The St. Regis Paper Co., Watertown, N. Y.—Dear Sirs: In response to my notice to you some time since you sent me check for $5,000 on the Santa Clara Lumber Co. pulp-wood contract, which I at once forwarded to the company in New York. I have to-day received a letter from the company, saying that they have received $25,000 which was $12,500 short of the actual cost of the wood in its present condition, and they request me to ask you to remit at least $5,000 more; that the annoyance that they experience in getting these advances is so great that they feel very much disinclined to continue trying to fulfill the contract on their part unless the advances can be more promptly made. Hoping that you will remit at least $5.000 I remain, Very respectfully yours, John P. Badger."

To which the plaintiff made this reply: "Watertown, N. Y., March 26th, 1900. John P. Badger, Esq., Malone, N. Y.—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 24th inst. at hand and noted. We have advanced the Santa Clara Lumber Co. $2 per cord upon the quantity of pulp wood which they claim to have cut, and we have advanced this amount promptly upon receiving their several requests. As we have already explained to you, this is the amount which is ordinarily advanced to cover the cost of pulp wood delivered to the stream. We understand that the Santa Clara Lumber Co. have spent an unusual amount of money this year in establishing permanent camps and roads with a view of reducing the expense of maintenance in the future. We also understand that they have been lumbering upon their own account. We could hardly be expected to share in unusual expenses, and in view of the fact that they are conducting extensive operations of their own, it seems to us the only way we can arrive at the amount to advance is to take the customary amount. As we have heretofore said to you, however, the matter is merely one of interest, and we have suggested a friendly arbitration. You have consented to the arbitration, but, nevertheless, continue to make further requests for additional advances. Very truly yours, G. C. Sherman, Treas."

Nothing further passed till April 12th, when the defendant notified the plaintiff that on account of the latter's failure to make advances to the extent of the cost of work done the contract was rescinded, and at the same time sent to the plaintiff a certified check for $25,344.-79, the amount advanced by it with interest. It appears that at this time pulp wood had appreciated in price, and the defendant had made a contract for the sale of its wood to other parties on more favorable terms. The plaintiff refused to receive the check, and wrote the defendant insisting that the contract still continued in force, and thereupon the plaintiff brought this action for its specific performance.

The learned trial court found that the plaintiff failed and refused to "advance the cost of the work as requested by the defendant or any fair approximation thereof. That the defendant repeatedly notified the plaintiff of its intention to rescind the contract in case its requests were not complied with. * * * That the plaintiff did not make the advances, as requested, for approximately the cost of the work done, and that, with knowledge of the cost and of the terms of the contract, and with notice of the intention of the defendant to rescind if its requests were not complied with, deliberately and intentionally refused and neglected to make such advances, and that such refusal and neglect was not caused by any inadvertence or by any misunderstanding of the facts." If the testimony in any aspect justified this finding of the trial court, it is a complete answer to this appeal, for equity will not enforce a contract at the instance of a party who has deliberately and intentionally neglected and refused to comply with its requirements. But we think that there is no evidence to support this finding. Granting, as we must, for the trial court has so found, the fact, that the advances made by the plaintiff did not equal the expenditure incurred approximately by the sum of $12,500, that fact alone does not show that the plaintiff's default was deliberate and intentional.

We agree with the learned counsel for the respondent that the advances, which under the contract the plaintiff was obliged to make, were not limited by the ordinary and customary advances made to parties who get out wood for the market, but only by the sum which the defendant actually and properly expended towards cutting and hauling the lumber. Nevertheless, the contract was one which would naturally breed dispute and difference of opinion, for no definite amount to be advanced was specified. Whether outlay made for the work of a permanent character, such as the construction of roads and the building of camps, the defendant was entitled to demand from the plaintiff, under the provisions of the contract, is not wholly free from doubt. While the fact that the amounts called for by the defendant largely exceeded the usual advances in the business did not justify the plaintiff in refusing to accede to the defendant's demands, still it tended to excuse plaintiff's hesitation in complying. The contract contained a provision that all matters of difference that might arise between the parties respecting the contract or the fulfillment thereof should be determined by arbitration. We concede that this provision was too broad to be enforced by the courts. Nevertheless, granting its invalidity, the parties negotiated for an arbitration under it. These negotiations had not been terminated at the time of the defendant's rescission of the contract. There is nothing to show that the position of the plaintiff in this controversy was not taken by it in good faith. It was willing to help the defendant obtain money, for it expressly offered to discount the defendant's note for such amount as it might need. There is not a word from the plaintiff to be found in the correspondence tending to show an abandonment of the contract. On the contrary, it was constantly insisting on its performance.

It is true that the plaintiff erred in its construction of the contract and as to its liability to make advances thereunder, and, therefore, that it had not strictly performed the contract on its part. But that did not necessarily debar it from relief. Of such a situation this court said by Judge Danforth in Day v. Hunt, 112 N. Y. 191, 19 N. E. 414: "These objections cannot prevail. On the contrary, the very fact that the plaintiff has not strictly performed his part, and so is without remedy at law, is frequently a sufficient reason for the interposition of courts of equity, where relief is given, notwithstanding the lapse of time according to the actual merits of the case. * * * There is nothing to show that either party abandoned the contract or wished or intended to do so. They differed merely as to the form of the mortgage, and, so far as appears, that difference only prevented the completion of the sale. Although wrong in his construction as to its proper force, the plaintiff cannot be said to be wholly without excuse."

There is this further, and to my mind controlling, factor in this case. There had been at least a part performance by the plaintiff and a substantial part, and courts of equity regard with more favor actions to enforce specific performance where there has been performance in part than where nothing has been done by either party under the contract. Thus Mr. Pomeroy writes (Equity Jurisprudence, § 812) of the specific performance of contracts for the sale of land: "But in some cases time almost ceases to be material, as where the vendee has paid the purchase money, or is in possession of the land, it is then said that time does not run against him." While the trial court has found that the defendant notified the plaintiff of its intention to rescind the contract, unless its requests were complied with, it must be borne in mind that this notice was of the most general character; that is to say, that if advances were not more promptly made the defendant would be unable to fulfill and would give up the contract. Nevertheless, despite these notices, the defendant continued to take such moneys as the plaintiff advanced. Such receipt operated to abrogate any right to rescind that might then exist. The last payment so made by the plaintiff was the sum of $5,000 on March 12th. The rule seems to be well settled that though a party to a contract is in default, if the other party continues to negotiate with him after such default the contract cannot be rescinded without reasonable notice to the party in default to comply with the contract within a specified time. Pomeroy's Eq. Jurisprudence, § 815.

In Webb v. Hughes, L. R. 10 Eq. 281, a contract for the sale of land was to be closed on February 26th. Negotiations were continued after the date set for closing, and on April 7th the purchaser gave notice of immediate abandonment. Specific performance was decreed, the vice chancellor saying: "But, having once gone on negotiating, beyond the time fixed, he is bound not to give immediate notice of abandonment, but must give a reasonable notice of his intention to give up his contract if a title is not shown." In Parkin v. Thorald, 16 Beavan, 59, notice was given on October 21st that the contract must be performed on November 5th or otherwise would be abandoned. Specific performance was decreed, the length of notice being held insufficient.

The defendant's letter of March 24th, already recited in full, gave the plaintiff no notice that a certain amount must be paid by a certain time, but merely expressed the feeling of the defendant that it was "disinclined to continue trying to fulfill the contract on their part, unless the advances can be more promptly made." This was wholly insufficient as a notice of the defendant's election to abandon the contract unless by a certain time the plaintiff made the necessary advances. The defendant could not, under the circumstances, rescind the contract without notice. We are of opinion, therefore, that the judgments below were erroneous. It is unfortunate that the case should have been so long in litigation that during its pendency over half of the first contract term has expired. However, in case the plaintiff succeeds on a new trial the court may mold its decree in such form as, in view of the lapse of time and its effect on the interest of the parties, equity may require.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the final award of costs.[71]

HELGAR CORP. v. WARNER'S FEATURES, Inc.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 222 N. Y. 449, 119 N. E. 113.)

Action by the Helgar Corporation against Warner's Features, Incorporated. From a judgment of the Appellate Division, modifying and affirming a judgment entered on a referee's report (171 App. Div. 910, 154 N. Y. Supp. 1125), both parties appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

CARDOZO, J. The plaintiff's assignor made a contract with the defendant for the sale of films for moving pictures. At least one film was to be delivered every month. Deliveries were to begin in November, 1913, and to end in October, 1914. The price was fixed at eight cents per foot, and payment for each film was to be made within 30 days after exhibition to the public. By way of additional compensation, the defendant was also to pay one-half of the net profits realized by it as the result of foreign sales.

The plaintiff, having received an assignment of the contract, delivered pictures of the value at the contract rate of nearly $10,000. The price was payable on December 24, 1913. The finding is that payment was then demanded, and that "the defendant refused and neglected to pay the same or any part thereof, nor did the defendant offer or tender a part payment of said amount or offer to pay the same in installments." Two days later this action was begun. The plaintiff alleged its election to terminate the contract by reason of the breach. Judgment was demanded for the price of the films delivered, and also for the profits that would have been gained through the completion of the contract. The referee gave judgment for the price, but refused to award the profits. In his opinion, he put his refusal upon the ground that the failure to make punctual payment was not accompanied by acts or words evincing repudiation or abandonment. The Appellate Division added $2,000 to the judgment. This was the estimated value of foreign rights which attached to the sales already made. That value was thought to be recoverable as an incident to the price. With this modification, the judgment was unanimously affirmed. There are cross-appeals in this court.

[71] In accord: Nelson v. San Antonio Traction Co., 107 Tex. 180, 175 S. W. 434 (1915), refusal to pay because of a wrong construction of the agreement: Myer v. Wheeler, 65 Iowa, 390, 21 N. W. 692 (1884). See, also, Fresno Canal & Irr. Co. v. Perrin, 170 Cal. 411, 149 Pac. 805 (1915).

The rights of vendor and vendee upon the breach of an installment contract are now regulated by statute. The rule is to be found in section 126, subdivision 2, of the statute governing sales of goods (Personal Prop. Law, Consol. Laws, c. 41, amended by L. 1911, c. 571): "Where there is a contract to sell goods to be delivered by stated installments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more installments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more installments, it depends in each case on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case whether the breach of contract is so material as to justify the injured party in refusing to proceed further and suing for damages for breach of the entire contract, or whether the breach is severable, giving rise to a claim for compensation, but not to a right to treat the whole contract as broken."

The statute thus establishes a like test for vendor and for vendee. The earlier cases may not be wholly uniform. Wharton & Co. v. Winch, 140 N. Y. 287, 35 N. E. 589; Kokomo Strawboard Co. v. Inman, 134 N. Y. 92, 31 N. E. 248; Wolfert v. Caledonia S. I. Co., 195 N. Y. 118, 88 N. E. 24, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 864. We do not need to reconcile them. We have departed from the rule of the English statute (St. 56 & 57 Vict. c. 71, § 31, subd. 2), which keeps the contract alive unless the breach is equivalent to repudiation. Note of Commissioners on Uniform Laws, American Uniform Commercial Acts, p. 98; Williston on Sales, pp. 809, 810; 25 Halsbury, Laws of England, p. 220. We have established a new test which weighs the effect of the default, and adjusts the rigor of the remedy to the gravity of the wrong. "It depends in each case on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case" whether the breach is "so material" as to affect the contract as a whole.

The answer to that question must vary with the facts (Williston on Sales, p. 810). Default in respect of one installment, though falling short of repudiation, may under some conditions, be so material that there should be an end to the obligation to keep the contract alive. Under other conditions, the default may be nothing but a technical omission to observe the letter of a promise. Williston on Sales, p. 823; Nat. Machine Co. v. Standard Co., 181 Mass. 275, 279, 63 N. E. 900; Wharton & Co. v. Winch, supra. General statements abound that, at law, time is always of the essence. Williston, supra; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Booth v. S. D. Rolling Mills Co., 60 N. Y. 487; Schmidt v. Reed, 132 N. Y. 108, 30 N. E. 373. For some purposes this is still true. The vendor who fails to receive payment of an installment the very day that it is due may sue at once for the price. But it does not follow that he may be equally precipitate in his election to declare the contract at an end. Williston, p. 823; Beatty v. Howe Lumber Co., 77 Minn. 272, 79 N. W. 1013, and cases there cited; Graves v. White, 87 N. Y. 463, 466. That depends upon the question whether the default is so substantial and important as in truth and in fairness to defeat the essential purpose of the parties. Whatever the rule may once have been, this is the test that is now prescribed by statute. The failure to make punctual payment may be material or trivial according to the circumstances. We must know the cause of the default, the length of the delay, the needs of the vendor, and the expectations of the vendee. If the default is the result of accident or misfortune, if there is a reasonable assurance that it will be promptly repaired, and if immediate payment is not necessary to enable the vendor to proceed with performance, there may be one conclusion. If the breach is willful, if there is no just ground to look for prompt reparation, if the delay has been substantial, or if the needs of the vendor are urgent so that continued performance is imperiled, in these and in other circumstances, there may be another conclusion. Sometimes the conclusion will follow from all the circumstances as an inference of law to be drawn by the judge; sometimes, as an inference of fact to be drawn by the jury.

The findings in this case do not enable us to say that the plaintiff was justified in its precipitate election to declare the contract at an end. There is a finding that payment was refused. That is inconclusive by itself. The refusal may have been nothing more than a declaration of inability to make payment on the instant. There is a finding that the defendant did not offer part payment or payment in installments. That again is inconclusive. It is not an ultimate, but at most an evidentiary, fact. The circumstances may none the less have indicated a temporary default to be followed promptly by full payment. The referee must have interpreted the situation in that way, for he states in his opinion that the default was not accompanied by any act or declaration that would indicate abandonment. If we were at liberty to look into the evidence and draw our own inferences we might reach a contrary conclusion. But the evidence is not open to our scrutiny. The plaintiff has not requested the referee to find the ultimate fact on which the right to the recovery of profits depends. It has not requested a finding that the breach was so material as to justify its hasty election to declare the contract at an end. It has not requested a finding of the circumstances preceding or accompanying the default. There is not even a request which brings before us in due form the ruling that all profits must be excluded. The only request made specifies the extent of the loss, and includes elements of damage which the referee, in any view of the breach, was at liberty to reject. In these circumstances, we must hold the plaintiff to the rule which requires a request to find and an exception. Sherman v. Foster, 158 N. Y. 587, 597, 53 N. E. 504; Ostrander v. Hart, 130 N. Y. 406, 414, 29 N. E. 744; Burnap v. Nat. Bank of Potsdam, 96 N. Y. 125, 131; Thomson v. Bank of B. N. A., 82 N. Y. 1; Drake v. N. Y. Iron Mine, 156 N. Y. 90, 50 N. E. 785. The findings as made leave the character of the default equivocal. In the absence of an appropriate request for other findings, the evidence is not before us. The rule would be different if we were asked to go behind the findings for the purpose of affirmance. Ogden v. Alexander, 140 N. Y. 356, 35 N. E. 638; Ostrander v. Hart, supra. The plaintiff asks us to go behind them for the purpose of reversal. Its appeal must therefore fail.

The defendant complains of the increase of the judgment directed at the Appellate Division. We think the increase was erroneous. We have seen that the plaintiff was not at liberty to treat the entire contract as broken. Its cause of action was limited to the recovery of payments in default. But there has thus far been no default in respect of foreign sales. No foreign sales have yet been made. The award in that respect is an estimate of sales to be made hereafter. Until the conditions prescribed by the contract have been satisfied, the extra compensation is not payable. The plaintiff's recovery must be limited to payments already due.

The judgment of the Appellate Division to the extent that it modifies the judgment entered on the report of the referee should be reversed, and the judgment entered upon such report affirmed, with costs in this court to the defendant.

LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. AMALGAMATED OIL CO.

(Supreme Court of California, 1909. 156 Cal. 776, 106 Pac. 55.)

Action by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company against the Amalgamated Oil Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sloss, J. Action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. At the trial the defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted and a judgment of dismissal entered. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

The contract involved was in writing, and was executed by the Associated Oil Company, as party of the first part, and the Los Angeles

Gas & Electric Company, the plaintiff herein, as party of the second part. The defendant Amalgamated Oil Company succeeded to all the rights and obligations of the Associated Oil Company under the contract, and may, for the purposes of this discussion, be considered as having in the first instance entered into said contract with plaintiff. In the interest of brevity, we shall herein designate the plaintiff as the "gas company" and the defendant as the "oil company."

By the terms of the contract, which is dated the 1st day of February, 1905, the oil company agrees to sell and deliver to the gas company, and the latter agrees to purchase and receive from the former, a sufficient quantity of crude oil to operate all plants now or hereafter to be operated by the gas company in its business of manufacturing gas and electricity in the city of Los Angeles over and above the amounts heretofore contracted for to be delivered to the gas company by others than the oil company during the term of the contract. The term of the agreement is declared to be from February 1, 1905, to December 31, 1910, inclusive. In addition to various provisions regarding the character of oil to be furnished, the manner of delivery, and deductions for impurities, the contract provides that the gas company shall give three days' notice of its requirements, and fixes the purchase price at 45 cents per barrel, payments to be made on the 15th day of each month for all oil delivered during the preceding calendar month.

The complaint alleges that, after making various deliveries during the years 1905 and 1906, the defendant on December 31, 1906, notified the plaintiff that it no longer considered itself bound by the contract. On several occasions during January and February, 1907, the gas company, plaintiff, requested and demanded of the defendant oil company that it furnish and deliver to plaintiff a quantity of crude oil aggregating 24,700 barrels. Of this amount 11,616 barrels was the quantity of oil sufficient (over and above the oil otherwise contracted for as provided in the aforesaid contract) to operate plaintiff's plants. The plaintiff, it is alleged, has duly performed all the obligations imposed on it under the contract; but defendant has refused to deliver any of the oil demanded during said months of January and February, 1907. The lowest market value of oil of the quality described in the contract since the 1st day of January, 1907, was 75 cents per barrel. The prayer of the complaint is for $3,484.80, being the difference between the contract price and the market value of the 11,616 barrels, which, as plaintiff claims, the defendant should have delivered.

Of the answer it will be sufficient to say that it denies that "plaintiff has duly, or at all, performed all, or any, of the obligations imposed on it under the said contract."

At the trial there was no dispute about the terms of the contract, the refusal to deliver on demand as alleged, or the market value of oil at and after the refusal. The gas company did not, however, make any attempt to show that it had during the period prior to January, 1907, demanded or received from the oil company, a quantity of oil

(over and above amounts otherwise contracted for) sufficient to operate its plants. The motion for a nonsuit was based on the failure to produce evidence on this point, and, stating the same proposition in more general terms, that plaintiff had failed to prove its allegation that it had duly performed all the obligations imposed on it under said contract.

By the agreement the gas company agreed to take of the oil company, and pay for, all the oil required by it over and above specified exceptions. The oil company agreed to deliver, as called for, all such oil at a given price. If the contract is to be construed as entire with respect to these covenants—in other words, if such covenants were mutually dependent—the court below was clearly right in holding that plaintiff could not recover for a failure to deliver without alleging and showing either performance, or a sufficient excuse for the nonperformance, of its obligation to take of defendant all oil required to operate its gas and electric plants. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 115, 24 Pac. 867; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 318, 27 Pac. 280; 25 Am. St. Rep. 123; Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 670, 49 Pac. 840.

The appellant's contention is that the contract was severable into as many distinct agreements of sale as there were months in the term during which deliveries were to be made. We do not regard this position as tenable. Whether a contract is entire or severable is a question of interpretation. The intent of the parties is to be ascertained from a consideration of the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract. 2 Parsons' Contracts, (9th Ed.) 672; Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 120, 85 Pac. 305. It is, no doubt, well settled, as has been repeatedly declared by this court. that "when the price is expressly apportioned by the contract, or the apportionment may be implied by law, to each item to be performed the contract will generally be held to be severable." More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251, 6 Am. Rep. 621; Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99, 51 Pac. 27; Sterling v. Gregory, supra. But this rule is not universal. It is subject to the limitation that a contract will be treated as entire, even when the obligations of the one party consist of different acts to be separately paid for, where the nature and character of the agreement show that it was intended to be entire. Thus, in Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 227, Field, C. J., said: "But a contract, made at the same time for different articles at different prices is not an entire contract, unless the taking of the whole is essential from the character of the property, or is made so by the agreement of the parties. * * *" Similarly, in Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736, cited by this court in Sterling v. Gregory, supra, the "more reasonable rule" is said to be that, "where there is a purchase of different articles at different prices at the same time, the contract would be severable as to each article, unless the taking of the whole was rendered essential either by the nature of the subject-matter or by the act of the parties."

In the case of the contract before us, we have no doubt that the subject-matter and the stipulations of the parties were such as to make the taking of the oil contracted for essential to the right to demand further deliveries. The seller undertakes to hold itself in readiness to meet all the requirements of the buyer and to fill these requirements at a given price. In return it has the privilege of supplying at that price all oil that the buyer may require for its plant. These provisions—the obligation to furnish and the obligation to take all oil needed—are necessarily reciprocal. Each goes to the essence of the agreement. It is not to be supposed that the oil company would have been willing to bind itself to furnish oil for a term of years at 45 cents a barrel, regardless of the actual state of the market, unless it had been assured a continuous outlet for a large quantity at that figure. And, on the other hand, the gas company was, as must be assumed, undertaking to buy oil of the oil company at a fixed price in view of the fact that it was by the agreement securing a steady supply which would be sufficient for all its needs. To hold such a contract severable would open the way to great hardship and injustice. Either party could refuse compliance with the agreement when it desired, and still hold the other when conditions made such course advantageous. The one in default would, to be sure, be liable in damages for its breaches of the several contracts, but such liability would be far from an adequate protection to the other party. Let us suppose, for example, that for a period of two years after the making of the contract the market value of oil should be less than the contract price, and that during that time the gas company should find it to its interest to fill its requirements by purchasing of others than the defendant. In such event, the oil company would, under appellant's contention, be bound to continue to hold itself in readiness, during the entire term of the contract, to furnish oil if called for, and to seek its only relief for past breaches by actions for damages. While it could not know whether its future output would or would not be taken by the gas company, it could not safely enter into any contract to dispose of that output to others. Such construction of the contract would produce great confusion and uncertainty and would, to a great extent, deprive the parties of the substantial benefit of the respective covenants to take and to furnish all oil required.

The fact that the gas company does not agree to take any specified quantity of oil is of no consequence. It agrees to take all that may be needed in the operation of its plants. The exact quantity is subject to fluctuation with the conditions of its business, but the seller does not thereby forfeit the right to insist on furnishing all that shall be actually required. The agreement does not, in respect to the point under discussion, differ from one for the purchase and sale of a fixed quantity to be delivered and paid for in installments. While there is some conflict among the decided cases, the great weight of authority, at least in the United States, supports the proposition that such agreements are entire, and that a refusal without sufficient cause by the seller to furnish, or by the buyer to take or pay for, any installment, justifies a repudiation of the contract by the party not in default. 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1144–1148. The rule has been applied alike to contracts for the sale of fixed quantities and to those calling for the delivery of amounts to be fixed by the requirements of the buyer's plant or business. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield, 115 Fed. 119, 53 C. C. A. 23; Loudenback Fertilizer Co. v. Tennessee Phosphate Co., 121 Fed. 298, 58 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 402; Kokomo Strawboard Co. v. Inman, 134 N. Y. 92, 31 N. E. 248; George H. Hess Co. v. Dawson, 149 Ill. 138, 36 N. E. 557; King Phillip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603; Providence Coal Co. v. Coxe, 19 R. I. 380, 35 Atl. 210; Fullam v. Wright, etc., Co., 196 Mass. 474, 82 N. E. 711; Pacific Lumber Co. v. Iowa W. & P. Co., 35 Iowa, 308, 112 N. W. 771; Ross Meehan F. Co. v. Royer Wheel Co., 113 Tenn. 370, 83 S. W. 167. The same conclusion has been reached by this court in two cases. In Twomey v. People's Ice Co., 66 Cal. 233, 5 Pac. 158, the defendant agreed to furnish ice to plaintiffs for one year at the rate of $5 a ton; the vendor agreeing to sell ice to plaintiffs alone, and the plaintiffs agreeing to take ice from the defendant alone during the term of the contract. The plaintiffs having broken the contract by purchasing ice from third parties, it was held that this breach released defendant from any further performance. To the same effect, substantially, is Dunn v. Daley, 78 Cal. 640, 21 Pac. 377.

The holding that the contract is entire with respect to the covenants we have been discussing is in no wise inconsistent with the view that it is apportionable with respect to payments for oil actually delivered. 2 Parsons' Contracts (9th Ed.) 673, note. An action could be maintained for the price of any delivery as soon as it became due. This is the holding, and the extent of the holding in Veerkamp v. Hulburd, etc., Co., 58 Cal. 229, 41 Am. Rep. 265. But, as we have said, the contract may be entire with regard to the obligations to buy and sell the whole amount contracted for, notwithstanding the fact that payment for installments actually delivered may be enforced separately. Dunn v. Daley, supra; Barrie v. Earle, 143 Mass. 1, 8 N. E. 639; 58 Am. Rep. 126; Milske v. Mantel Co., 103 Md. 235, 63 Atl. 471, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, 115 Am. St. Rep. 354.

For these reasons it must be held that the motion for nonsuit was rightly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.[72]

[72] Southern Colonization Co. v. Derfler, 73 Fla. 924, 75 South. 790, L. R. A. 1917F, 744 (1917) is an interesting case, where a partial nonperformance "went to the essence."

(d) Performance on Time as a Condition

BECK & PAULI LITHOGRAPHING CO. v. COLORADO MILLING & ELEVATOR CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1892. 52 Fed. 700, 3 C. C. A. 248.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reversed.

This was an action by the plaintiff in error to recover the contract price of certain stationery and advertising matter furnished the defendant. It was tried on the merits, and at the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and this instruction is assigned as error. The plaintiff was a corporation of Wisconsin, engaged in lithographing and printing, and its principal place of business was at Milwaukee, in that state. The defendant was a corporation of Colorado, engaged in the business of milling, and its principal place of business was at Denver, in that state. In June, 1889, the plaintiff agreed to make new designs of certain buildings of defendant, with sketches of its trade-marks; to execute engravings thereof in a strictly first-class style; to embody these on the stationery described below; to submit to defendant for approval proofs thereof; to submit designs and proofs of hangers, on fine chromo plate, for advertising defendant's business, by the following fall; to engrave a strictly first-class vignette of one of defendant's plants; to submit a sketch and proof thereof to defendant; to furnish defendant with 10,000 business cards and 5,000 checks in August, 1889; to furnish, in the course of the year, letter heads, noteheads, bill heads, statements, bills, envelopes and cards to the defendant to the number of 331,100, and 5,000 hangers; and to furnish the vignette and 5,000 hangers more after the approval of the proofs thereof by the defendant. The defendant agreed to take and pay for this stationery, this vignette, and these hangers at certain agreed prices, which amounted in the aggregate to about $6,000. The plaintiff furnished the 10,000 cards and 5,000 checks required under the contract in August, 1889, and the defendant received and paid for them. The plaintiff introduced testimony to the effect that it strictly complied with and fully performed these contracts in every respect, except that it shipped the articles contracted for (which were not delivered in August) by rail from Milwaukee to the defendant, at Denver, in December, 1889, in five boxes, four of which did not arrive at Denver until 9:42 a. m., January 1, 1890, and the fifth did not arrive there until January 4, 1890; that before January 8, 1890, all of these articles were tendered to the defendant, and it refused to examine or receive them; that the sketches and proofs of the designs, trade marks, and hangers had been submitted to and approved by the defendant during the summer and fall of 1889, before these articles were manufactured, and that the last proof was approved November 16, 1889; that on December 16, 1889, the defendant wrote the plaintiff to forward by express 2,000 statements and 3,000 envelopes "as per proofs submitted;" that the state of the art and process of lithographing is such that, after the general idea of a piece of work is conceived, it is customary to make first a pencil design, and, when this is found satisfactory, to prepare a colored sketch where colored work is required; that after the sketch is colored it is lithographed, that is, transferred to a stone; that each color requires a separate stone; and in these hangers there were nine colors; that it requires from two to three months to reproduce on stone a colored sketch like that used for the hangers; that the artists' work and the reproduction on stone were the most expensive parts of this work contracted for; and that the expense of the materials and printing was but a small part of the entire expense of the work.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). The ground on which it is sought to sustain the instruction of the court below to return a verdict for the defendant in this case is that the plaintiff failed to tender or deliver the articles contracted for to the defendant, at Denver, until six or eight days after the expiration of the year, that the plaintiff did not therefore furnish them "in the course of the year," and that this failure justified the defendant in repudiating the contract, and refusing to pay any part of the contract price.

It is a general principle governing the construction of contracts that stipulations as to the time of their performance are not necessarily of their essence, unless it clearly appears in the given case from the express stipulations of the contract or the nature of its subject-matter that the parties intended performance within the time fixed in the contract to be a condition precedent to its enforcement, and, where the intention of the parties does not so appear, performance shortly after the time limited on the part of either party will not justify a refusal to perform by the party aggrieved, but his only remedy will be an action or counterclaim for the damages he has sustained from the breach of the stipulations. In the application of this principle to the cases as they have arisen, in the promulgation of the rules naturally deduced from it, and in the assignment of the various cases to the respective classes in which the stipulation as to time of performance is, or is not, deemed of the essence of the contract, the controlling consideration has been, and ought to be, to so decide and classify the cases that unjust penalties may not be inflicted, nor unreasonable damages recovered. Thus, in the ordinary contract of merchants for the sale and delivery, or the manufacture and sale, of marketable commodities within a time certain, it has been held that performance within the time is a condition precedent to the enforcement of the contract, and that a failure in this regard would justify the aggrieved party in refusing performance at a later day. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 183-203, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366.

This application of the general principle commends itself as just and reasonable, on account of the frequent and rapid interchange and use of such commodities made necessary by the demands of commerce, and because such goods, if not received in time by the vendee, may usually be sold to others by the vendor at small loss, and thus he may himself measure the damages he ought to suffer from his delay by the difference in the market value of his goods. On the other hand, it has been held that an express stipulation in a contract for the construction of a house, that it should be completed on a day certain, and that, in case of failure to complete it within the time limited, the builder would forfeit $1,000, would not justify the owner of the land on which the house was constructed in refusing to accept it for a breach of this stipulation when the house was completed shortly after the time fixed, nor even in retaining the penalty stipulated in the contract, but that he must perform his part of the contract, and that he could retain from or recover of the builder the damages he sustained by the delay and those only. Tayloe v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. 13, 17, 5 L. Ed. 384. This application of the general rule is equally just and reasonable. The lumber and material bestowed on a house by a builder become of little comparative value to him, while they are ordinarily of much greater value to the owner of the land on which it stands, and to permit the latter to escape payment because his house is completed a few days later than the contract requires would result in great injustice to the contractor, while the rule adopted fully protects the owner, and does no injustice to any one. The cases just referred to illustrate two well-settled rules of law which have been deduced from this general principle, and in accordance with which this case must be determined. They are:

In contracts of merchants for the sale and delivery or for the manufacture and sale of marketable commodities a statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or some material incident, such as the time of shipment, is a condition precedent, upon the failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 203, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Rolling Mill v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 261, 7 Sup. Ct. 882, 30 L. Ed. 920.[73] But in contracts for work or skill, and the materials upon which it is to be bestowed, a statement fixing the time of performance of the contract is not ordinarily of its essence, and a failure to perform within the time stipulated, followed by substantial performance after a short delay, will not justify the aggrieved party in repudiating the entire contract, but will simply give him his action for damages for the breach of the stipulation. Tayloe v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. 13, 17, 5 L. Ed. 384; Hambly v. Railroad Co. (C. C.) 21 Fed. 541, 544, 554, 557.

[73] In accord: McGowin Lumber & Export Co. v. Camp Lumber Co., 16 Ala. App. 283, 77 South. 433 (1918); Clark v. Fey, 121 N. Y. 470, 24 N. E. 703 (1890); Davison v. Von Lingen, 113 U. S. 40, 5 Sup. Ct. 346, 28 L. Ed. 885 (1885).

It only remains to determine whether the contracts in the case at bar are the ordinary contracts of merchants for the manufacture and sale of marketable commodities or contracts for labor, skill, and materials, and this is not a difficult task. A contract to manufacture and furnish articles for the especial, exclusive, and peculiar use of another, with special features which he requires, and which render them of value to him, but useless and unsalable to others,—articles whose chief cost and value are derived from the labor and skill bestowed upon them, and not from the materials of which they are made,—is a contract for work and labor, and not a contract of sale. Engraving Co. v. Moore, 75 Wis. 170, 172, 43 N. W. 1124, 6 L. R. A. 788, 17 Am. St. Rep. 186; Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450, 15 Am. Rep. 112; Hinds v. Kellogg (Com. Pl.) 13 N. Y. Supp. 922; Turner v. Mason, 65 Mich. 662, 32 N. W. 846.

[The Court then held that this contract was governed by the second rule and that performance exactly on time was not a condition precedent. The judgment of the lower court was reversed.] [74]

KING et al. v. CONNORS et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1915. 222 Mass. 261, 110 N. E. 289.)

CARROLL, J. In March, 1913, the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendants to buy the hotel property of the plaintiffs in Greenfield, Massachusetts, "on or before May first next, for the sum of thirty thousand dollars." One thousand dollars was deposited with Charles H. Keith "on account of the purchase price of said property." The remainder was to be paid as follows: "Fourteen thousand dollars in cash * * * upon the delivery of a good and sufficient warranty deed of the premises, clear of all incumbrances except taxes assessed April 1, 1913, on or before the first day of May next, and the balance of the purchase price, viz., fifteen thousand dollars, is to be paid * * * by mortgage on the premises."

The agreement was in writing, and in addition to the real estate therein described it included all the personal property in the hotel, with the exception of that in three rooms over the barroom and a few other articles specially mentioned; it further provided that if the defendants failed to comply with its conditions the one thousand dollars already deposited with Keith was to be paid to the plaintiffs, "in full as agreed upon and liquidated damages."

[74] See, also, Thurston v. Arnold, 43 Iowa, 43 (1876); Coleman v. Applegarth, 68 Md. 21, 11 Atl. 284, 6 Am. St. Rep. 417 (1887); Hubbell v. Von-Schoening, 49 N. Y. 326 (1872); Austin v. Wacks, 30 Minn. 335, 15 N. W. 409 (1883).

Beginning work on time is not a condition precedent, where it does not appear that the completion will also be late. Kenedy Town & Improvement Co. v. First Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 136 S. W. 558 (1911).

May 1, 1913, the plaintiffs were not ready and able to perform. On the second day of May, however, they were ready and able to fulfill the terms of the sale. On the morning of that day they notified the attorney for the defendant of their ability and desire to act and were told it was too late, that the sale should have been completed on the first day of May, and the plaintiffs having failed in this respect, the defendants were therefore excused from performance.

Thereupon this bill in equity was brought to specifically enforce the contract. The facts being found by a master, a decree was entered in the superior court dismissing the bill.

In equity, under an agreement like the one before us, time is not considered of the essence of the contract unless it expressly so appears or is to be implied from the surrounding circumstances. Mansfield v. Wiles, 221 Mass. 75, 108 N. E. 901; Lennon v. Napper, 2 Sch. & L. 681, 684. See Law Quarterly Review, July, 1915, p. 253. The written instrument contained no express stipulation making the time stated of the essence of the contract, and there is nothing in the terms of the contract, in the nature of the property to be conveyed, or in the existing circumstances, which requires an inference that the parties intended May first, 1913, to be the necessary and essential time for carrying the sale into effect.

On the second day of May the plaintiffs' tenant had not surrendered the lease of a portion of the premises occupied by him, although it was agreed that the premises were to be free of all incumbrances. The tenant, however, had promised in writing to execute a release and surrender the premises whenever required, within thirty days. This was a sufficient compliance with the contract. Mansfield v. Wiles, supra; Richmond v. Gray, 3 Allen, 31; Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407, 415.

It follows that the decree must be reversed and a decree entered for the plaintiff, the terms of which are to be settled by a judge of the superior court.

So ordered.[75]

LORD RANELAGH v. MELTON.

(In the High Court of Chancery, 1864. 2 Drew. & S. 278.)

This was a suit for specific performance.

By articles of agreement, bearing date the 22d day of December, 1857, the defendant, William Melton, agreed to lease certain plots

[75] In accord: Jaeger v. Shea, 130 Md. 1, 99 Atl. 954 (1917). If time was made expressly of the essence, specific performance will not be decreed when an installment of the price was tendered 20 days late, although relief is granted as against the specified penalty. Steedman v. Drinkle, [1916] 1 A. C. 275. If the condition has been waived, specific performance may be decreed. Kilmer v. B. C. Orchard Lands, [1913] A. C. 319. Where time has ceased to be of the essence by waiver, it may again be made so by notice. See note under "Waiver," p. 837.

of land in Richmond Road, Round Hill Park, Brighton, to Henry Banks and Joseph Vinall, for a term of ninety-nine years from June, 1856, subject to certain ground-rents; and the articles of agreement contained the following clause:

"In case, at any time within the space of seven years from the 23d day of June, 1856, the lessees shall be desirous of purchasing the fee simple and inheritance of all or any one of the said plots of ground, and of such their desire shall give three months notice to the lessor, and shall, at the expiration of such notice pay unto him the sum of £210 in respect of each plot mentioned in such notice, and all rent payable to and including the current quarter, then the lessor shall and will convey the freehold and inheritance of the plot or plots mentioned in such notice unto and to the use of the lessees, or as they shall appoint."

The articles of agreement provided that the terms lessor and lessee, as used therein, should apply to their assigns in the event of either party disposing of his interest in the premises.

The articles of agreement also provided that the lessees, in exercising their option to purchase, should not investigate the title of the lessor to the premises.

The interest of the lessees, Banks and Vinall, subsequently became vested in the present plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs being desirous of exercising their right, under the clause in the articles of agreement, of purchasing from the defendant the fee simple and inheritance in the said plots of land, on the 20th day of March, 1863, served on the defendant notice, as provided by the articles of agreement, of their desire so to do. It was admitted that this notice was regular in all respects. After the service of this notice, some communications took place between the parties, in the course of which the defendant expressed his wish to have the draft conveyances sent to him for perusal.

The period of three months from the date of the notice expired on the 20th of June, and the seven years from the date of the articles of agreement expired on the 24th of June, but nothing further took place till the 1st of July, when the plaintiff's solicitor sent the defendant draft conveyances for his perusal.

On the receipt of these draft conveyances the defendant wrote the plaintiff's solicitor that he did not consent to excuse the default to complete on or before the 20th or 24th day of June; and finally, on this ground, the defendant refused to complete the sale to the plaintiffs of the fee in the said plots of land. It appeared that the purchase-money had never been tendered.

Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs filed their bill to enforce specific performance, by the defendant, of the agreement to sell the fee simple to them.

The cause now came on upon motion for a decree.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY). I apprehend the rule of law applicable to cases like the present is perfectly clear. No doubt, if an owner of land and an intending purchaser enter into a contract constituting between them the relation of vendor and purchaser, and there is a stipulation in the contract that the purchase-money shall be paid and the contract completed on a certain day, this Court in ordinary cases has established the principle that time is not of the essence of the contract, and that the circumstance of the day fixed for the payment of the money and completion of the purchase being past does not entitle either party to refuse to complete. On the other hand, it is well settled that where there is a contract between the owner of land and another person, that if such person shall do a specified act, then he (the owner) will convey the land to him in fee; the relation of vendor and purchaser does not exist between the parties unless and until the act has been done as specified. The Court regards it as the case of a condition on the performance of which the party performing is entitled to a certain benefit; but in order to obtain such benefit he must perform the condition strictly. Therefore, if there be a day fixed for its performance, the lapse of that day without its being performed prevents him from claiming the benefit. Applying that rule to the present case: if the agreement fixes a day for the payment of the money, then it is clear that if that day is past without the payment, the right to compel a conveyance is lost.

The question then is, whether any time is fixed in this agreement for the payment of the money. The language is, that if the lessees shall at the expiration of three months after the notice (which notice was duly given) pay the money, then the lessor shall convey the freehold and inheritance; and the matter resolves itself into a question of construction,—What is the meaning of the words "at the expiration of three months?"

The plaintiffs contend that these words mean, not at the time at which the three months expire, but at any time afterwards. If that be the true construction, the consequence would be, that not only a day or a week after, but a year or any number of years after the expiration of the three months, the plaintiffs would have a right to tender the money and demand a conveyance; and this is what the law will not permit. But besides that, if the lessees should think fit not to pay the money, could the owner file a bill to compel them to do so? I apprehend, clearly not; for there is nothing in the agreement to make it obligatory on the lessees to pay the money. It is impossible to put such a construction on the words. "At the expiration of three months" must mean, not at any time after such expiration, but on the day on which the three months expire.

This case is not open to the argument which might arise in ordinary cases between vendor and purchaser, that the investigation of the title would occupy some time, inasmuch as the agreement provides that the lessees shall accept the title; so that there was nothing to be done but the conveyance. Unfortunately for the plaintiffs, they have allowed the time limited for the payment of the money to elapse, and therefore they are not entitled to a conveyance.

Bill dismissed, with costs.

WINDERS et al. v. KENAN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1913. 161 N. C. 628, 77 S. E. 687.)

Action by J. B. Winders and others against J. G. Kenan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action to compel specific performance, based upon the following instrument:

"This agreement, executed this 17th day of January, 1905, by and between Jas. G. Kenan and heirs of O. R. Kenan, of the county of Duplin and state of North Carolina, of the first part, and J. B. Winders and L. F. Hall of the second part, witnesseth: That said party of the first part for and in consideration of the sum of five hundred dollars to him in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby fully acknowledged, doth agree that upon the payment of ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars, two thousand of which is to be paid the 1st day of April, 1905, and the remainder in four annual payments with interest at 6 per cent., to give, grant, sell and convey by proper deed with full warranty, and assure to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, all the trees on the following described tract of land, * * *

"In witness whereof the said party of the first part hath hereunto set their hands and seal the day and year first written above.

"James G. Kenan. [Seal.]"
[and several others.]

The probate of this instrument was not complete until April 25, 1905, and it was registered on May 1, 1905. About the 1st of April, 1905, one of the plaintiffs and James G. Kenan, who represented the other makers of the instrument, met in Kenansville for the purpose of having a deed prepared, and a deed was prepared in accordance with said writing, and at that time the said plaintiff told the said Kenan that he would be ready to make the first payment when the deed was delivered. The probate of the deed was complete about April 10, 1905, and the plaintiffs were notified thereof during the month of April, and not later than April 27th.

The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that between March 6 and March 10, 1905, they told the said Kenan that they would take the timber, and for him to prepare a deed, and that the money was ready, and that the said Kenan said that he would have to have a little time, as the parties did not live close together, and that a few days would not make any difference as to the execution of the deed or as to the payment of the money; that on May 30, 1905, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of $1,500, which the defendants refused to accept, and declared the contract at an end; that in the fall of 1905 or the spring of 1906 the plaintiffs tendered to the defendants two checks, one in the sum of $2,500 and the other in the sum of $9,220, which were refused; that on February 28, 1908, the plaintiffs tendered to the defendants $2,240, which was refused; that in March, 1909, the plaintiff tendered to the defendants the sum of $2,120, which was refused; that during the last of March or the 1st of April, 1909, the plaintiffs tendered to the defendants $9,500 and four years interest thereon, which was refused.

There was no other evidence upon the part of the plaintiffs of the tender of any part of the purchase money, but they did offer evidence that they were at all times ready, able, and willing to pay the purchase price, but they contended that the $500 first recited in said instrument was a part of the purchase price, and that the balance due was $9,500, instead of $10,000. They also offered evidence tending to prove that after the deed was written on April 1, 1905, material changes were made therein, so that it did not conform to said instrument, and that they declined to accept it on that ground. At the conclusion of the whole evidence, his honor entered judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

ALLEN, J.[76] In bilateral contracts there are reciprocal promises, so that there is something to be done or forborne on both sides, while in a unilateral contract there is a promise on one side only, the consideration on the other side being executed. 9 Cyc. 244. An option belongs to the latter class. It is a contract to give another the right to buy, and not a contract to sell, and it is because of the fact that the other party is not compelled to buy that it is spoken of as an offer. In Black v. Maddox, 104 Ga. 157, 30 S. E. 723, approved in Trogden v. Williams, 144 N. C. 199, 56 S. E. 868, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 867, it is defined to be "the obligation by which one binds himself to sell and leaves it discretionary with the other party to buy, which is simply a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy the property at a fixed price within a certain time."

If not based on a valuable consideration, the right to buy may be withdrawn at any time before acceptance (Paddock v. Davenport, 107 N. C. 710, 12 S. E. 464), but, if there is a valuable consideration to support it, the right continues during the period fixed in the option. Cummins v. Beavers, 103 Va. 230, 48 S. E. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 881, 1 Ann. Cas. 986. In this case the court said: "The distinction between an option given without a consideration and an option given for a valuable consideration is that in the first case it is simply an offer to sell, and can be withdrawn at any time before acceptance upon notice to the vendee; but in the second, where a consideration is paid for the option, [76] Part of the statement of facts and the court's discussion of several cases are omitted.

it cannot be withdrawn by the vendor before the expiration of the time specified in the option."

If no conditions are imposed upon the prospective purchaser, and it is a simple proposition giving the right to buy, upon notice of acceptance, it becomes a contract of sale and is obligatory on both parties, and it is then the duty of the seller to tender his deed and of the purchaser to pay according to its terms. Hardy v. Ward, 150 N. C. 393, 64 S. E. 171. The maker has, however, the right to impose conditions which must be performed precedent to the exercise of the right to buy, and among these is the payment of the agreed price. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 3 L. R. A. 94; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 53 S. E. 795, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403; Trogden v. Williams, 144 N. C. 201, 56 S. E. 865, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 867. In the Trogden Case the language in the contract was: "If they shall, within the time hereinafter specified, elect to purchase said land, then and in that event they shall pay one-half cash and the balance in twelve months, to be secured by mortgage." And the court held that "payment of one half the purchase money and securing the other half constitute the method of electing to purchase," and quoted with approval the following excerpt from Weaver v. Burr, supra: "The period of 60 days from 7th June, 1883, mentioned in the option, within which plaintiff had the privilege of buying the land, * * * expired on the 6th day of August, 1883. During the whole of that period and during the whole of the 6th of August plaintiffs had the privilege of converting the offer of John Burr into a valid and binding contract by an unconditional acceptance of and compliance with the terms thereof. They could not do so by any other manner than by actual payment or tender of the whole price of the land before the sixty days expired. Neither could they withhold the payment, or tender of payment, until a proper deed was executed or survey could be made and the excess number of acres ascertained." Contracts of this character, being unilateral in their inception, are construed strictly in favor of the maker, because the other party is not bound to performance, and is under no obligation to buy, and it is generally held that time is of the essence of such a contract, and that the conditions imposed must be performed in order to convert the right to buy into a contract of sale.

The acceptance must be according to the terms of the contract, and if these require the payment of the purchase money or any part thereof, precedent to the exercise of the right to buy, the money must be paid or tendered, and a mere notice of an intention to buy or that the party will take the property does not change the relations of the parties. Bateman v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 251, 70 S. E. 474, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615; Clark v. Lumber Co., 158 N. C. 139, 73 S. E. 793; Kelsey v. Crowther, 162 U. S. 404, 16 Sup. Ct. 808, 40 L. Ed. 1017; Pom. Spec. Per. § 387; Weaver v. Burr, supra; Trogden v. Williams, supra; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 53 S. E. 795, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403;

Killough v. Lee, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 260, 21 S. W. 970; Stembridge v. Stembridge, 87 Ky. 94, 7 S. W. 611; Schields v. Horbach, 30 Neb. 540, 46 N. W. 629; Hollmann v. Conlon, 143 Mo. 379, 45 S. W. 275. * * * Applying these principles to the facts, we are of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to specific performance.

The paper writing does not purport to be a contract to convey, is unilateral, and is what is designated as an option. * * * In the writing before us the makers, in consideration of $500 paid, agree upon the payment of $10,000, of which $2,000 was to be paid the 1st day of April, 1905, and the remainder in four annual installments at 6 per cent. interest, to give, grant, sell, and convey by proper deed, etc., which if we adopt a liberal and not a strict construction, can mean no more than that the $500 was paid for the right to buy, and that this right could not be exercised, nor were the makers under any obligation to convey until payment or tender of the purchase money.

If this is the correct interpretation of the writing, the notice given by the plaintiffs in March, 1905, that they would take the timber, did not change the relations of the parties and convert the writing into a contract to sell, because the writing imposed the further condition of payment of the purchase money. Nor can the conversation at the time the deed was written have this effect, as no money was presented or tendered, and it amounted to no more than an expression of readiness to make the first payment of $2,000 upon delivery of the deed. It may be conceded, as contended by the plaintiffs, for the purposes of this appeal, and not otherwise, that the conversation with one of the defendants in March, the delay in the execution of the writing sued on and in the execution of the deed work a waiver of the right to demand payment on the 1st day of April, 1905, but it appears from the record that the paper writing was complete on April 25, 1905, and was registered on May 1st thereafter, and the plaintiffs were notified on April 27, 1905, that the deed was ready for delivery. After notice of the execution of the writing and of the deed, there was no excuse for further delay, and it was then incumbent on the plaintiffs to pay or tender the sum of $2,000 at least promptly. They did not do this, but on the contrary, waited until May 30, 1905, before they offered to pay any amount, and then only the sum of $1,500, which was not in compliance with the writing upon which they sue in time or amount. The defendants refused to accept, and declared the contract at an end, as they had the right to do, and it could not be revived without their consent by subsequent offers to pay. In the view of the case we have adopted, the alteration of the deed after it was written is not material, as the correspondence shows that, while the defendants wished some modification of the option, they did not refuse to execute a deed in accordance with its terms until the plaintiffs had by delay lost their right to demand it. If, under the writing, the plaintiffs had been required to do no more than give notice of acceptance, they would have had the right to delay payment until a deed was tendered conforming to the writing, but they were required to pay before they were entitled to demand a deed of any kind, and had not placed themselves in position to criticize the one offered.

We have discussed the case in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs upon the assumption that they could have demanded a deed upon the payment of $2,000, but we do not so decide, as the writing says upon the payment of $10,000, of which $2,000 was to be paid on the 1st of April, 1905, and the remainder in four annual installments, the makers agree to sell and convey.

For the reasons given, we are of opinion there was no error in entering the judgment of nonsuit.

Affirmed.[77]

(e) Contracts of Service

POUSSARD v. SPIERS & POND.

(Queen's Bench Division of High Court of Justice, 1876. 1 Q. B. Div. 410.)

Declaration on an agreement by the defendants to employ the plaintiff's wife to sing and play in an opera at the defendants' theatre. Breach, that the defendants refused to allow the plaintiff's wife to perform according to the agreement.

Pleas: 1. That defendants did not agree as alleged. 2. That plaintiff's wife was not ready and willing to perform. 3. That plaintiff rescinded the contract before breach. Issue joined.

At the trial before Field, J., at the Middlesex Michaelmas sittings, 1875, judgment was entered for the defendants, with leave to move to enter judgment for the plaintiff for £83.

A notice of motion was given accordingly, and a cross order was obtained by the defendants for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

The facts proved and the course of the trial are fully given in the judgment of the Court.

[77] It seems never to have been doubted that time is of the essence in accepting an ordinary offer. The same rule is followed in regard to the exercise of an irrevocable power created by an option contract. This is because the executed consideration was given for a power with a fixed life period. That power has been enjoyed just as agreed, and strict enforcement of the time limit causes no forfeiture whatever. So where a sale was to become absolute in absence of a notice to the contrary by a fixed time, the power to terminate the conditional duty ended on the exact day. Mackey Wall Plaster Co. v. United States Gypsum Co. (D. C.) 244 Fed. 275 (1917); Berg Co. v. Thomas & Son Co., 256 Pa. 584, 100 Atl. 951 (1917); International Filter Co. v. La Grange Ice & Fuel Co., 22 Ga. App. 167, 95 S. E. 736 (1918).

The first three related to the supposed rescission and waiver. The other questions were in writing and were: 4. Whether the non-attendance on the night of the opening was of such material consequence to the defendants as to entitle them to rescind the contract? To which the jury said, "No." And, 5, was it of such consequence as to render it reasonable for the defendants to employ another artiste, and whether the engagement of Miss Lewis, as made, was reasonable; to which the jury said "Yes." Lastly, he left the question of damages, which the jury assessed at £83.

On these answers he reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to enter judgment for £83.

A cross rule was obtained on the ground that the verdict was against evidence and that the damages were excessive.

We think that, from the nature of the engagement to take a leading, and, indeed, the principal female part (for the prima donna sang her part in male costume as the Prince de Conti) in a new opera which (as appears from the terms of the engagement) it was known might run for a longer or shorter time, and so be a profitable or losing concern to the defendants, we can, without the aid of the jury, see that it must have been of great importance to the defendants that the piece should start well, and consequently that the failure of the plaintiff's wife to be able to perform on the opening and early performances was a very serious detriment to them.

This inability having been occasioned by sickness was not any breach of contract by the plaintiff, and no action can lie against him for the failure thus occasioned. But the damage to the defendants and the consequent failure of consideration is just as great as if it had been occasioned by the plaintiff's fault, instead of by his wife's misfortune. The analogy is complete between this case and that of a charter party in the ordinary terms, where the ship is to proceed in ballast (the act of God, &c., excepted) to a port and there load a cargo. If the delay is occasioned by excepted perils, the shipowner is excused. But if it is so great as to go to the root of the matter, it frees the charterer from his obligation to furnish a cargo. See per Bramwell, B., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Law Rep. 10 C. P. at page 141.

And we think that the question, whether the failure of a skilled and capable artiste to perform in a new piece through serious illness is so important as to go to the root of the consideration, must to some extent depend on the evidence; and is a mixed question of law and fact. Theoretically, the facts should be left to and found separately by the jury, it being for the judge or the Court to say whether they, being so found, shew a breach of a condition precedent or not. But this course is often (if not generally) impracticable; and if we can see that the proper facts have been found, we should act on these without regard to the form of the questions.

Now, in the present case, we must consider what were the courses open to the defendants under the circumstances. They might, it was said on the argument before us (though not on the trial), have postponed the bringing out of the piece till the recovery of Madame Poussard, and if her illness had been a temporary hoarseness incapacitating her from singing on Saturday, but sure to be removed by the Monday, that might have been a proper course to pursue. But the illness here was a serious one, of uncertain duration, and if the plaintiff had at the trial suggested that this was the proper course, it would, no doubt, have been shewn that it would have been a ruinous course; and that it would have been much better to have abandoned the piece altogether than to have postponed it from day to day for an uncertain time during which the theatre would have been a heavy loss.

The remaining alternatives were to employ a temporary substitute until such time as the plaintiff's wife should recover; and if a temporary substitute capable of performing the part adequately could have been obtained upon such a precarious engagement on any reasonable terms, that would have been a right course to pursue; but if no substitute capable of performing the part adequately could be obtained, except on the terms that she should be permanently engaged at higher pay than the plaintiff's wife, in our opinion it follows, as a matter of law, that the failure on the plaintiff's part went to the root of the matter and discharged the defendants.

We think, therefore, that the fifth question put to the jury, and answered by them in favour of the defendants, does find all the facts necessary to enable us to decide as a matter of law that the defendants are discharged.

The fourth question is, no doubt, found by the jury for the plaintiff; but we think in finding it they must have made a mistake in law as to what was a sufficient failure of consideration to set the defendants at liberty, which was not a question for them.

This view taken by us renders it unnecessary to decide anything on the cross rule for a new trial.

The motion must be refused with costs.

Motion refused with costs.

BETTINI v. GYE.

(Queen's Bench Division of High Court of Justice, 1876. 1 Q. B. Div. 183.)

Third count, that the defendant was and is the director of the Royal Italian Opera in London, and the plaintiff was and is a dramatic artist and professional singer, and thereupon it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendant in parts beyond the seas, to wit, at Milan, in Italy, by an agreement in writing in the French language, of which the translation is as follows:

"Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London.
"Year 1875.

"The undersigned, Mr. Frederick Gye, gentleman, and director of the Royal Italian Opera in London, of the one part, and Mr. Bettini, dramatic artist, on the other part, have agreed as follows:

"1. Mr. Bettini undertakes to fill the part of primo tenor assoluto in the theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, both public and private, in Great Britain and in Ireland during the period of his engagement with Mr. Gye.

"2. This engagement shall begin on the 30th of March, 1875, and shall terminate on the 13th of July, 1875.

"3. The salary of Mr. Bettini shall be £150 per month, to be paid monthly.

"4. Mr. Bettini shall sing in concerts as well as in operas, but he shall not sign anywhere out of the theatre in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1875, without the written permission of Mr. Gye, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London, and out of the season of the theatre.

"5. Mr. Gye shall furnish the costumes to Mr. Bettini for his characters according to the ordinary usage of theatres.

"6. Mr. Bettini will conform to the ordinary rules of the theatre in case of sickness, fire, rehearsals, etc.

"7. Mr. Bettini agrees to be in London without fail at least six days before the commencement of his engagement, for the purpose of rehearsals.

"8. In case Mr. Gye shall require the services of Mr. Bettini at a distance of more than ten miles from London, he shall pay his travelling expenses.

"9. Mr. Bettini shall not be obliged to sing more than four times a week in opera. Mr. Bettini, in order to assist the direction of Mr. Gye, will sing, upon the request of Mr. Gye, in the same characters in which he has already sung, and in other characters of equal position. In case of the sickness of other artists, Mr. Bettini agrees to replace them in their characters of first tenor assoluto.

"10. Mr. Gye shall have the right to prolong the period limited above upon the same conditions, provided that the period does not go beyond the end of the month of August. F. Gye.

"Milan, 14 Dec. 1874."

That the plaintiff did not sing anywhere out of the said theatre in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from January 1st, 1875, to the date of the commencement of this action, without the written permission of the defendant, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London, and out of the season of the said theatre. That the plaintiff was prevented by temporary illness from being in London before March 28th, 1875, but he did arrive in London on that day; and, save as aforesaid, the plaintiff has always performed his said agreement, and was and is ready and willing to perform his part of the said agreement, of all which the defendant had notice, and all things were done and happened and all conditions were fulfilled and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to a performance by the defendant of the said agreement and to maintain this action. Yet the defendant did not nor would receive the plaintiff into his said service but wholly refused so to do, and wrongfully exonerated and discharged the plaintiff from his said agreement, and from the performance of the said agreement on the plaintiff's part, and wrongfully put an end to and determined the said agreement, whereby the plaintiff was damnified.

The defendant pleaded, ninthly, to the third count, that the plaintiff was not in London six days before the commencement of the said engagement for the purpose of rehearsals, nor had the defendant notice before the said six days of the plaintiff's inability to be in London, or that he would not be in London six days before the commencement of his said engagement for the purpose of rehearsals, nor was the plaintiff ready and willing to attend such rehearsals, although it was necessary for him to do so, wherefore the defendant did not nor would receive the plaintiff into his service in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid, which is the breach complained of.

Demurrer to the ninth plea, and joinder.

The judgment of the Court (BLACKBURN, QUAIN, and ARCHIBALD, JJ.) was delivered by BLACKBURN, J. In this case the parties have entered into an agreement in writing, which is set out on the record.

The Court must ascertain the intention of the parties, as is said by Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court in Graves v. Legg [9 Ex. at page 716] "to be collected from the instrument and the circumstances legally admissible in evidence with reference to which it is to be construed." He adds: "One particular rule well acknowledged is, that where a covenant or agreement goes to part of the consideration on both sides, and may be compensated in damages, it is an independent covenant or contract." There was no averment of any special circumstances existing in this case, with reference to which the agreement was made, but the Court must look at the general nature of such an engagement. By the seventh paragraph of the agreement, "Mr. Bettini agrees to be in London without fail at least six days before the commencement of his engagement for the purpose of rehearsals." The engagement was to begin on March 30th, 1875. It is admitted on the record that the plaintiff did not arrive in London till March 28th, which is less than six days before the 30th, and therefore it is clear that he has not fulfilled this part of the contract.

The question raised by the demurrer is, not whether the plaintiff has any excuse for failing to fulfill this part of his contract, which may prevent his being liable in damages for not doing so, but whether his failure to do so justified the defendant in refusing to proceed with the engagement, and fulfil his, the defendant's, part. And the answer to that question depends on whether this part of the contract is a condition precedent to the defendant's liability, or only an independent agreement, a breach of which will not justify a repudiation of the contract, but will only be a cause of action for a compensation in damages.

This is a question which has very often been raised, and the numerous cases on the subject are collected in the first volume of Sir E. V. Williams's Notes to Saunders, p. 554, in the notes to Pordage v. Cole, and in the second volume, p. 742, notes to Peeters v. Opie.

We think the answer to this question depends on the true construction of the contract taken as a whole.

Parties may think some matter, apparently of very little importance, essential; and if they sufficiently express an intention to make the literal fulfilment of such a thing a condition precedent, it will be one; or they may think that the performance of some matter, apparently of essential importance and prima facie a condition precedent, is not really vital, and may be compensated for in damages, and if they sufficiently expressed such an intention, it will not be a condition precedent.

In this case, if to the seventh paragraph of the agreement there had been added words to this effect, "And if Mr. Bettini is not there at the stipulated time Mr. Gye may refuse to proceed further with the agreement;" or if, on the other hand, it had been said, "And if not there, Mr. Gye may postpone the commencement of Mr. Bettini's engagement for as many days as Mr. Bettini makes default, and he shall forfeit twice his salary for that time," there could have been no question raised in the case. But there is no such declaration of the intention of the parties either way. And in the absence of such an express declaration, we think that we are to look to the whole contract, and, applying the rule stated by Parke, B., to be acknowledged,[78] see whether the particular stipulation goes to the root of the matter, so that a failure to perform it would render the performance of the rest of the contract by the plaintiff a thing different in substance from what the defendant has stipulated for; or whether it merely partially affects it and may be compensated for in damages. Accordingly, as it is one or the other, we think it must be taken to be or not to be intended to be a condition precedent.

If the plaintiff's engagement had been only to sing in operas at the theatre, it might very well be that previous attendance at rehearsals with the actors in company with whom he was to perform was essential. And if the engagement had been only for a few performances, or for a short time, it would afford a strong argument that attendance for the purpose of rehearsals during the six days immediately before the commencement of the engagement was a vital part of the agreement. But we find, on looking to the agreement, that the plaintiff was to sing in theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, both public and private, from March 30th to July 13th, 1875, and that he was to sing in concerts as well as in operas, and was not to sing anywhere out of the theatre in Great Britain or Ireland from January 1st to December 31st, 1875, without the written permission of the defendant, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London.

The plaintiff, therefore, has, in consequence of this agreement, been deprived of the power of earning anything in London from January 1st to March 30th; and though the defendant has, perhaps, not received any benefit from this, so as to preclude him from any longer treating as a condition precedent what had originally been one, we think this at least affords a strong argument for saying that subsequent stipulations are not intended to be conditions precedent, unless the nature of the thing strongly shows they must be so.

And as far as we can see, the failure to attend at rehearsals during the six days immediately before March 30th could only affect the theatrical performances and, perhaps, the singing in duets or concerted pieces during the first week or fortnight of this engagement, which is to sing in theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, and concerts for fifteen weeks.

We think, therefore, that it does not go to the root of the matter so as to require us to consider it a condition precedent.

The defendant must therefore, we think, seek redress by a cross-action for damages.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

FARMER v. FIRST TRUST CO.

In re MILWAUKEE MOTOR CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1917. 246 Fed. 671, 158 C. C. A. 627, L. R. A. 1918C, 1027.)

In the matter of the Milwaukee Motor Company, bankrupt; First Trust Company, trustee. Appeal by A. J. Farmer from an order disallowing his claim. Affirmed.

Appellant Farmer, a mechanical engineer, was employed as superintendent of the bankrupt's gas engine shops at Milwaukee. After serving about two months in such capacity, a contract for a year's service, beginning August 1, 1912, was entered into, under which Farmer was to superintend and manage the shops, devoting his entire time thereto, and to receive for such service a salary of $6,500 and a bonus of $3 per engine if, with the equipment of the factory, and such further equipment as had theretofore been specified by Farmer, 3,000 engines were produced within the year at prescribed factory costs, to fill contracts therefor which were extant. Provision was made for renewal of the contract for another year if Farmer "has made good his guaranty to make the said 3,000 engines now sold within this contract year, and within the above schedule cost of manufacture."

Under date of July 26th, the bankrupt had entered into a contract with the Imperial Automobile Company of Jackson, Mich., to supply it 2,200 motors, with option for 1,000 more, during the entire year; the contracted deliveries for 1912 being August 100, September 130, October 260, November 260, and December 300.

The work of installing the new equipment was being carried on, and the manufacture of the engines proceeded, but in the months indicated only 190 engines were completed for delivery, and some, if not all of these, proved unsatisfactory. Demands for overdue deliveries were being made, as well as complaints respecting engines delivered. In response to the complaints the bankrupt's vice president on December 18th went to Jackson, taking Farmer with him. The next day Farmer started back home by way of Chicago. The vice president urged him to be back to the shops as soon as possible, and Farmer said he would reach Milwaukee the same day, as he intended stopping at Chicago but a short time to buy his wife a Christmas present. Upon reaching Chicago he did not return to Milwaukee, but remained at Chicago until the 22d, indulging himself in diversion strictly personal. Coming to Milwaukee on the 22d, he did not go to the shop because of a severe cold he had contracted. On the 24th he was dismissed from his employment. Within six months thereafter the company became bankrupt. Farmer filed his claim for $13,062.45 for damage accruing to him by reason of his alleged unlawful dismissal.[79]

ALSCHULER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts as above). It is maintained for appellant that one serving in a supervisory capacity is not so strictly accountable to the employer for his time as is a clerk or a workman, and that Farmer's absence of two or three days without permission was not such a breach of the contract as warranted its termination. The legal proposition, as generally stated, is sustained by the authorities cited from Wisconsin, the state where this contract was made, as well as elsewhere. Moody v. Streissguth Clothing Co., 96 Wis. 202, 71 N. W. 99; Schumaker v. Heinemann et al., 99 Wis. 251, 74 N. W. 785; Loos v. Walter Brewing Co., 145 Wis. 1, 129 N. W. 645, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1052; Green v. Somers, 163 Wis. 96, 157 N. W. 529; Beach on Modern Law of Contracts, § 584.

But the applicability of such rule must depend on the facts of particular cases. Conditions may be readily imagined where in a well-organized, smoothly running, and successful business a day's or even a month's absence of a general superintendent, who has the business well in hand, might be wholly consistent with its continued uneventful and successful operation. Upon the other hand, the business may be in condition so critical that a single hour's willful absence of such an officer at such a time might well be regarded as rank disloyalty and gross insubordination. Nearly five months of the new contract period had passed. Instead of deliveries of 1,050 engines required during that time under a single contract, to say nothing of other outstanding contracts, but 190 all told had in fact been delivered, and these more or less defective. Purchasers were clamoring for deliveries and complaining of defects in those delivered; materials were delayed; there was more or less trouble in the shop; and things generally seemed to be going awry. Added to this, the new equipment was in process of installation; old machines were being moved and changed; and the shop was undergoing radical rearrangement and reconstruction. The responsible head was Farmer. He had various foremen under him, but he was the only mechanical engineer connected with the plant, and while in authority it was upon his designing, planning, and direction that success or failure depended. This high-priced man faced obstacles, to surmount which would manifestly require his fullest capacity and undivided attention. Surely this was not a situation wherein the man at the helm might needlessly and with impunity abandon his post that he may tread "the primrose path of dalliance."

It is urged that the evidence shows no harm to the business resulting from these days of absence of its mechanical head. The sentry sleeping at his post, is not less derelict in duty if, haply, disaster does not follow; nor is the responsible employé's disloyalty or insubordination measured by the extent of the resultant harm to the employer, nor minimized if none happens to follow.

It is insisted that even if, while at Chicago, appellant did transgress the canons of propriety and right living, this of itself would not warrant his dismissal. The authorities support the proposition that if the transgression does not injure the employer, nor unfit the transgressor for the employment, termination of a contract of employment for such cause alone would not be justified. Wood, Master & Servant, § 110; Child v. Boyd, etc., Co., 175 Mass. 493, 56 N. E. 608; Brownell v. Ehrich, 43 App. Div. 369, 60 N. Y. Supp. 112. But the dismissal here is not justified on the ground of the employé's personal transgression at Chicago. The fact of the transgression affords evidence that the absence from duty was not necessitated by any such causes as might excuse it, and emphasizes the conclusion that it was willful and deliberate, and under conditions which gave to the conduct strong color of disloyalty and insubordination.

Nor is it material that at the time of the dismissal the employer did not know of his conduct at Chicago, and did not assign it as a cause of dismissal. Even if the cause assigned for dismissal was not in itself sufficient, if it appears that sufficient cause therefor did in fact exist, the dismissal was justified. Wood, Master & Servant, § 121; Labatt's Master & Servant, § 189; Carpenter Steel Co. v. Norcross, 204 Fed. 537, 123 C. C. A. 63, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1035; Thomas v. Beaver Dam Mfg. Co., 157 Wis. 427, 147 N. W. 364, Ann. Cas.

1916A, 1020; Loos v. Walter Brewing Co., 145 Wis. 1, 129 N. W. 645, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1052; Von Heyne v. Tompkins, 89 Minn. 77, 93 N. W. 901, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 524. But the employer did then know the desperate condition of things at home; did know that appellant's place was there, and his presence there much needed; did know appellant had been asked at Jackson to return at once to the shop, and had stated he would do so after a short stay at Chicago for buying a present; and did know that for several days he did not put in appearance at his place of duty. Without any excuse appearing for the absence, such as illness or other unavoidable cause might afford, the employer was warranted in attributing it to a willful disregard of the master's interests, and to insubordination, which, in our judgment, upon this record justified his dismissal.

The order of the District Court is therefore affirmed.[80]

SECOND NAT. BANK OF CINCINNATI, OHIO, v. PAN-AMERICAN BRIDGE CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1910. 183 Fed. 391, 105 C. C. A. 611.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

Action at law by the Pan-American Bridge Company against the Second National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Knappen, Circuit Judge.[81] The defendant in error (plaintiff below, and hereafter called the plaintiff) recovered verdict and judgment against plaintiff in error (hereafter called the defendant) for $2,723.49, being the balance of the contract price for certain structural steel work furnished by plaintiff, under written contract with defendant, for the construction of the latter's bank building, together with the value of certain extras furnished. The questions presented on this review lie within a comparatively narrow compass. The facts material to their understanding are these:

The contract provides that plaintiff shall furnish and erect the work "agreeably to the drawings and plans prepared by" the architects for the owner, and that the work shall be performed "under the direction, and to the satisfaction of" the architects or the authorized representative of the owner; also that payments under the contract should be made "upon a certificate of the architect or other authorized representative of the owner," 15 per cent. being retained from the amount of each certificate and to be paid within 30 days after the final completion of the work "and the acceptance of the same by the architects of the owner, or its duly authorized agent." Payments were made from time to time by the defendant as the work progressed, aggregating full payment of the contract price except the sum of $2,062.89. Plaintiff furnished extras amounting to $660.60. It is for the sum of these two items that recovery was permitted. There is no dispute over the extras. The only dispute over the merits of the other item arises upon the claim of defendant that it should be allowed $2,370.84, as the expense of making certain changes in the work claimed to have been made necessary by plaintiff's failure to comply with the specifications in one respect only, which is this: The specifications provide that "the connection of beams and columns will be standard." They also provide that the contractor shall furnish to the architect, for his approval, triplicate copies of detail drawings, and that the work shall be executed "in strict accordance with such approved drawings," there being the further provision that "the architect, in approving these drawings, approves them in a general manner as being in or out of conformance with the general requirements of his drawings and specifications and does not relieve the contractor of responsibility for the correctness of the work shown by them."

[80] See, also, Crabtree v. Bay State Felt Co., 227 Mass. 68, 116 N. E. 535 (1917), superintendent refused to appear before board of directors; held a question for the jury; Casavant v. Sherman, 213 Mass. 23, 99 N. E. 475 (1912).

[81] Part of the opinion is omitted.

The contractor made detail drawings of the connections of beams and columns, plainly showing 8 holes for each connection; that is to say, in splice-plates, angle irons, columns, and beams. These drawings were approved in writing by the architect. Construction in accordance therewith proceeded to at least the sixth story, without objection by the owner or the architect to the manner of these connections. Objection was then made that good workmanship and standard connection required 10 rivets instead of 8 for each connection. The record indicates that this objection was first made by the public building inspector. There is testimony tending to show that the architect, after construction had progressed to at least the height before stated, insisted that new 10-rivet connections be furnished in place of the 8-rivet connections. Upon plaintiff's refusal or failure to make the changes, they were made by defendant at a cost of $2,370.84. The architect was satisfied with and accepted the material and workmanship furnished by plaintiff with the single exception of the connections in question. He refused to finally accept plaintiff's work as a performance of the contract and to give a certificate of such performance, basing his refusal upon the failure of plaintiff to make the proper connections or to allow defendant for the cost of the changes made therein. The plaintiff's work has not been accepted by defendant, or by any one on its behalf, as a complete performance of the contract, the defendant, however, being in the occupancy and use of the building. By its plea it offered to confess judgment for $352.69, as the difference between the plaintiff's claim and the amount paid by defendant for making the new connections.

Upon the trial there was a conflict of testimony as to whether 8-rivet connections were standard or whether 10-rivets were required. The defendant, both by objection to testimony and by motion for a directed verdict at the close of the testimony, insisted that plaintiff was precluded from recovery by the architect's refusal to accept performance of the contract and to give his certificate thereof, and that plaintiff could have relief against such refusal only in a court of equity. The court instructed the jury that if plaintiff's work and material conformed to the contract recovery could be had, notwithstanding the lack of acceptance or certificate by the architect, provided the jury should find that such certificate was withheld "unreasonably and unfairly" or (as expressed at another time) "capriciously or arbitrarily." An instruction requested by defendant at the close of the general charge that "it is not sufficient to show that the architect is unreasonable and unfair," was refused. No exception was taken to the charge of the court as given, exception being, however, reserved to the refusal to give the request just referred to as well as to the refusal to direct verdict for defendant.

In our opinion the exception to the refusal of defendant's request just mentioned sufficiently raises for review the correctness of the charge in the respect mentioned. Indeed, no question of such sufficiency is raised in plaintiff's brief.

We cannot accede to the proposition that resort to equity is necessary in order to avoid the effect of failure to obtain the architect's certificate. The contention most strongly urged seems to be that the plaintiff must, as condition precedent to recovery on the contract, procure the setting aside of the contract provisions requiring such certificate, although the suggestion is also made that the architect's action needs reforming. Neither of those contentions is, in our opinion, maintainable. The plaintiff does not attack the validity of the contract provision requiring the architect's certificate as a condition precedent to recovery. Nor is there any certificate of the architect standing in the way and requiring reformation. The plaintiff's complaint in this respect is not that the contract is wrong, nor that any certificate of the architect is wrong. Its grievance is that the architect has improperly refused, as alleged, to accept the work and to certify accordingly. * * *

The right of a party to a building contract to show in an action at law thereon that the certificate required by the contract as a condition precedent to action was fraudulently withheld has been at least impliedly recognized in numerous cases, several of which are cited in another branch of this opinion, and has never, so far as we have seen, been denied. But in our opinion the trial judge erred in holding that the architect's certificate could be dispensed with if the jury were satisfied that it was "unreasonably and unfairly" withheld. It is true that this instruction finds apparent support in several decisions of state courts cited in plaintiff's brief. But the rule is well settled in the federal courts that under contract provisions such as those existing here the certificate of acceptance is a condition precedent to recovery upon the contract in the absence of fraud or of mistake so gross as to imply bad faith; in other words, that the withholding of the certificate must have been in bad faith.

Thus, in Kihlberg v. United States, 97 U. S. 402, 24 L. Ed. 1106, it was said: "It is sufficient that the parties expressly agreed that distances should be ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster, and in the absence of fraud or such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith, or a failure to exercise an honest judgment, his action in the premises is conclusive upon the appellant as well as upon the government."

In Sweeney v. United States, 109 U. S. 618, 620, 3 Sup. Ct. 344, 27 L. Ed. 1053, it was held that, as there was "neither fraud, nor such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith, nor any failure to exercise an honest judgment on the part of the officer in making his inspections," the certificate was a condition precedent to payment. In Martinsburg & Potomac R. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 551, 553, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 1037, 29 L. Ed. 255, a charge was requested that the engineer's final estimate was conclusive unless it appeared that he was guilty of "fraud or intentional misconduct." A modification by adding the words "or gross mistake" was held "well calculated to mislead the jury, for they were not informed that the mistake must have been so gross, or of such a nature, as necessarily implied bad faith upon the part of the engineer." In Chicago Santa Fé R. R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 195, 11 Sup. Ct. 290, 292, 34 L. Ed. 917, it was held that the engineer's certificate was conclusive in the absence of fraud or of such gross error "as to imply bad faith." In United States v. Gleason, 175 U. S. 588, 602, 607-608, 20 Sup. Ct. 228, 236, 44 L. Ed. 284, an averment that the refusal of the engineer to extend the time for the completion of the contract "was wrongful and unjust, and a breach of the contract" was held "wholly insufficient on which to base an attempt to upset the judgment of the engineer."

To the same effect are several decisions of this court. In Mundy v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 67 Fed. 633, 637, 14 C. C. A. 583, 587, Judge Taft used this language: "The authorities leave no doubt that construction contracts, in which the contractor stipulates that the engineer or architect of the owner shall finally and conclusively decide, as between him and the owner, what amount of work has been done, and its character, and the amount to be paid therefor under the contract, are legal, and should be enforced. In such cases, after the work has been done, the contractor can recover nothing in excess of the amount found due by the engineer, unless he can make it appear that the engineer's decision was fraudulently made, or was founded on palpable mistake."

In Boyce v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 111 Fed. 138, 142, 49 C. C. A. 276, 280, Judge Severens used this language: "And if the appointee, without fraud or manifest mistake, makes a determination upon any of the matters falling within the scope of the authority committed to him, the parties are bound by the decision."

In Memphis Trust Co. v. Brown-Ketchum Iron Works, 166 Fed. 398, 403, 93 C. C. A. 162, 167 (where many authorities upon the proposition we are considering are cited), it was said of an agreement in a building contract to submit differences to the arbitration of the architect that: "An award made by virtue of such contract provision, in the absence of fraud or of such gross mistake as would imply bad faith or a failure to exercise honest judgment, is binding upon both parties thereto, so far as it is confined to disputes actually subsisting and open to arbitration." See, also, American Bonding & Trust Co. v. Gibson County, 127 Fed. 671, 62 C. C. A. 397; s. c. 145 Fed. 871, 873, 76 C. C. A. 155, 7 Ann. Cas. 522; Choctaw & M. R. Co. v. Newton, 140 Fed. 225, 71 C. C. A. 655.

The jury could scarcely be expected to understand that the words "unreasonably and unfairly" meant "in bad faith," for the court charged that, "if their [the plaintiffs'] work and materials did conform to the plans and specifications made by the architect, then the refusal of the architects to accept such work and materials and to issue a certificate of acceptance is not fair and reasonable, and the plaintiffs may recover in excess of $352.69."

In other words, the actual conformity of the work and materials to the plans and specifications was made the test of the bad faith which the law requires for setting aside the action of the architect. It is strongly insisted that the bad faith of the architect is clearly shown by his refusal to accept the plaintiff's work on account of defects apparent in the detail drawings approved by the architect. While the record was such as to justify submitting to the jury the question whether the architect acted in bad faith in refusing the certificate, and while it is possible that the defendant and the architect as well, in requiring the substituted connections, were influenced by a fear of criticism upon the sufficiency of the building, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the admitted facts lead only to a conclusion of bad faith on the architect's part.

The error referred to requires a reversal of the judgment. The plaintiff should be permitted to make any amendment of its pleadings which may be necessary to meet the views we have expressed.

The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary to consider the propriety of the instruction that a "capricious and arbitrary" refusal to accept avoided the effect of the failure to obtain the certificate; and perhaps the record should not be construed as sufficiently raising that question. We content ourselves with the suggestion that, if the words referred to are to be used, it should be made clear that they involve either bad faith or a refusal or failure to exercise honest judgment.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.[82]

[82] A contract making the decision of an architect or engineer final and conclusive will be enforced, in the absence of fraud or bad faith on his part or on that of the party maintaining the validity of his decision. In such cases his decision is usually a condition precedent to recovery. Shriner v. Craft, 166 Ala. 146, 51 South. 884, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 450, 139 Am. A statute declared null and void any provision of a contract making the finding or award of an engineer, architect, or other person final or conclusive or a condition precedent to a right of action; this statute was held unconstitutional in Adinolfi v. Hazlett, 242 Pa. 25, 88 Atl. 869, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 885 (1913).

The certificate of an architect is often made a condition precedent to the power of the owner to terminate the contract and the right to payment by the contractor of the expense of completion. (Supreme Court of the United States, 1885. 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255.)

HARLAN, J.[83] This case is within the principles announced in Kihlberg v. U. S., 97 U. S. 398, 24 L. Ed. 1106 and Sweeney v. U. S., 109 U. S. 618, 3 Sup. Ct. 344, 27 L. Ed. 1053. Kihlberg sued the United States upon a contract for the transportation of military, Indian, and government stores and supplies from points on the Kansas Pacific Railway to posts and stations in certain states and territories. The contract provided for payment for transportation "in all cases according to the distance from the place of departure to that of delivery, the distance to be ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the district of New Mexico, and in no case to exceed the distance by the usual and customary route." One of the issues in that case was as to the authority of that officer to fix, conclusively for the parties, the distances which should govern in the settlement of the contractor's accounts for transportation. There was neither allegation nor proof of fraud or bad faith upon the part of that officer in his discharge of the duty imposed upon him by the mutual assent of the parties. This court said: "In the absence of fraud, or such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith, or a failure to exercise an honest judgment, his action in the premises is conclusive upon the appellant as well as upon the government." This principle was affirmed and applied in Sweeney's Case, in which he sought to recover from the United States the price of a wall built by him around a national cemetery. The contract provided that the wall should be received, and become the property of the United States, after an officer or civil engineer, to be designated by the government to inspect the work, should certify that it was in all respects such as the contractor agreed to construct. The officer designated for that purpose refused to so certify, on the ground that neither the material nor the workmanship was such as the contract required. As the officer exercised an honest judgment in making his inspections, and as there was on his part neither fraud, nor such gross mistake as implied bad faith, it was adjudged that the contractor had no cause of action on the contract against the United States.

Those decisions control the determination of the claim arising out of the contract here in suit, whereby the defendant in error, who was plaintiff below, covenanted and agreed that he would furnish all the material required,—which should be sound, durable, and of good quality, and approved by the company's chief engineer,—and perform all the labor necessary to construct and finish, in every respect, in the most substantial and workman-like manner, the grading and masonry of a certain section of the Martinsburg & Potomac Railroad.

[83] Part of the opinion is omitted.

The contract provides that, to prevent all disputes, the engineer of the company "shall, in all cases, determine" the quantity of the several kinds of work to be paid for under the contract, and the amount of compensation that the appellee should earn at the rates therein specified; that he "shall, in all cases," decide every question which can or may arise relative to the execution of the contract, and "his estimate shall be final and conclusive;" that in order to enable the contractor to prosecute the work advantageously, the engineer "shall make an estimate from time to time, not oftener than once per month, as the work progresses, of the work done," for which the company "will pay in current money within twenty per cent. of the amount of said estimate on presentation;" that, in calculating the quantity of masonry, walling and excavation, the most rigid geometrical rules should be applied, any custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and that "whenever this contract shall be wholly completed on the part of the said contractor, and the said engineer shall have certified the same, they [the company] will pay for said work" the prices in the contract named. These stipulations were emphasized by this additional provision in the agreement: "And it is further agreed that whenever the contract shall be completely performed on the part of the contractor, and the said engineer shall certify the same in writing under his hand, together with his estimate aforesaid, the said company shall, within thirty days after the receipt of said certificate, pay to the said contractor, in current notes, the sum which according to this contract shall be due."

The plaintiff, in his declaration, which is in assumpsit, sets out the written contract in full, and counts specially upon its various provisions. The other count is the ordinary one of indebitatus assumpsit. A general demurrer by the company to the whole declaration, and to each count, was overruled. This action of the court below cannot be upheld without disregarding the express conditions of the written agreement; for it does not appear from the declaration that the engineer ever certified in writing the complete performance of the contract by the plaintiff, together with an estimate of the work done, and the amount of compensation due him according to the prices established by the parties. Until after the expiration of 30 days from the receipt of such a certificate, the company did not, by the terms of the agreement come under a liability to pay the plaintiff the balance, if any, due to him under the contract. Nor does the declaration state any facts entitling him to sue the company, on the contract, in the absence of such a certificate by the engineer, whose determination was made by the parties final or conclusive. And upon the supposition that the engineer made such a certificate as that provided by the contract, there is no allegation that entitled the plaintiff to go behind it; for there is no averment that the engineer had been guilty of fraud, or had made such gross mistake in his estimates as necessarily implied bad faith, or had failed to exercise an honest judgment in discharging the duty imposed upon him. The first count of the declaration was, therefore, defective for the want of proper averments showing plaintiff's right to sue on the contract, and the demurrer to that count should have been sustained.

As, for this reason, the case must be remanded for a new trial, it is proper to say that if the declaration had been good on demurrer, we should have been compelled to reverse the judgment for errors in the instructions given to the jury. Several instructions were asked by the defendant embodying the general proposition that the final estimate of the engineer was to be taken as conclusive, unless it appeared from the evidence that, in respect thereto, he was guilty of fraud or intentional misconduct. These instructions were modified by the court by adding after the words "fraud or intentional misconduct" the words "or gross mistake." This modification was well calculated to mislead the jury, for they were not informed that the mistake must have been so gross, or of such a nature, as necessarily implied bad faith upon the part of the engineer. We are to presume from the terms of the contract that both parties considered the possibility of disputes arising between them in reference to the execution of the contract. And it is to be presumed that in their minds was the possibility that the engineer might err in his determination of such matters. Consequently, to the end that the interests of neither party should be put in peril by disputes as to any of the matters covered by their agreement, or in reference to the quantity of the work to be done under it, or the compensation which the plaintiff might be entitled to demand, it was expressly stipulated that the engineer's determination should be final and conclusive. Neither party reserved the right to revise that determination for mere errors or mistakes upon his part. They chose to risk his estimates, and to rely upon their right, which the law presumes they did not intend to waive, to demand that the engineer should, at all times, and in respect of every matter submitted to his determination, exercise an honest judgment, and commit no such mistakes as, under all the circumstances, would imply bad faith. * * *

COPLEW v. DURAND et al.

Action by D. Coplew against A. W. Durand and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff had entered into a contract with defendants to do the painting, polishing, enameling—in short the "finishing"—of the woodwork and floors of defendants' house. By the terms of the contract progress payments were to be made, 75 per cent. of the contract price to be paid on completion, and 25 per cent. 36 days after final completion. The progress payments were made as in the contract provided, and this action is brought to recover the 25 per cent. final payment, which defendants refused to make.

The contract provided that the work was to be "strictly first-class and to be done to the entire satisfaction of the owner and the architect"; as to the payments, "that in each of said cases a certificate be obtained and signed by the said architect." Defendants' refusal to pay was based upon the declaration of the architect that the work was not first-class and was not done to his satisfaction. Where work is to be done to the satisfaction of a person, evidenced by a certificate to that effect, the production of such a certificate is a condition precedent to a right of action upon the contract. This proposition is too well established to be questioned, and, indeed, is not questioned in this case. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54; Loup v. California, etc., Co., 63 Cal. 97; Cox v. McLaughlin, 63 Cal. 196; Tally v. Parsons, 131 Cal. 516, 63 Pac. 833; Kihlberg v. U. S., 97 U. S. 398, 24 L. Ed. 1106; Wangler v. Swift, 90 N. Y. 38; 9 Cyc. 618.

To make his case, in the absence of such certificate, the contractor pleaded and the court found that the work was done to the entire satisfaction of the owner and the architect, and that the refusal to issue the completion certificate was wrongful and was due to plaintiff's refusal to do certain repair work which was not required of him by the contract. The evidence, while conflicting, established to the satisfaction of the trial court the following facts: Under the terms of the contract plaintiff was to be paid $2,165. The work consisted of the finishing of the woodwork of the doors and walls and the finishing of the hardwood floors. The hardwood floors were naturally the last woodwork to be put in place and the last to be finished by the contractor. The contractor proceeded with his work upon the doors and walls, receiving partial payments. In the early part of August he had completed all this work, and nothing remained for him to do under his contract but to finish the floors, which were not as yet ready for him. The architect asked the plaintiff what would be the value of the work which he had yet to do upon the floors, and plaintiff replied, "About $200." The architect then stated that he would allow him the full 75 per cent. of the contract price, deducting the value of the separate work yet to be done upon the floors, and did so; the architect himself testifying that he knew that he had paid precisely 75 per cent. of the entire contract price, excepting $200, the cost or the value of the work upon the floors. It is in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that at the time of the completion of all this woodwork, excepting the floors, the architect and owner both expressed themselves satisfied with it. This condition of affairs obtained from August 8, 1904, when the last payment, amounting to 75 per cent. was made, until January 22, 1905, when plaintiff finally completed the work upon the floors. The delay was through no fault of his. Meantime decorators had been called in, and in doing their work they had injured the work done by plaintiff. This is not disputed, and a separate contract was entered into by defendants with plaintiff to repair the damage so occasioned by the decorators. This work, in turn, he did to the apparent satisfaction of the defendants. At least he was paid in full therefor. It is not satisfactorily explained why at this time he should have been employed at a special price to do this repair work, if, as defendants' architect contends, he was at that time insisting that the original work was incomplete, unsatisfactory, and poor. The floors were done by plaintiff, as the court finds, in a satisfactory and workmanlike manner. Then, when in due course plaintiff demanded his final payment, the architect refused to give him a final certificate, stating that the woodwork had been damaged by water, panels and joists were cracked and would have to be replaced, and that he looked to the plaintiff to finish these damaged panels and joists, to which plaintiff replied that he could not be expected to do the work twice, when he was paid but once for it. In fact it was necessary to replace panels to the number of about 60, and those panels in turn had to be "finished."

Appellants, however, contend that, notwithstanding these progress payments which had been made, and notwithstanding the fact that the woodwork had been completed to the satisfaction of the architect and owners, and evidence of that completion given by the payment of the 75 per cent., still the owners and architect retained a right under the contract to exercise a later judgment, and were not legally required to pass final judgment until the contractor was ready to turn over to them his work as complete. Haynes v. Second Baptist Church, 88 Mo. 285, 57 Am. Rep. 413. In this connection it is pointed out that the very finding of the court, while to the effect that the work had been performed to the satisfaction of the architect and owner, declared also that it was not performed in a good and workmanlike manner, so that, whatever payments the owners and architect might choose to make during the progress, they still had the right to refuse the certificate for the final payment if at that time the work had not been performed to their satisfaction under the terms of the contract. This undoubtedly is true. Where, from the nature of the work, there might be latent defects, not discoverable at the time of completion, but becoming patent after the lapse of time, it might be important that the architect should not exercise final judgment until after the lapse of the 36 days; or where, as the architect contends in this case, the defects were apparent, and he frequently called the contractor's attention to them, and paid the 75 per cent. under repeated promises of the contractor to repair the defects before the work was finally turned over for acceptance. Under such circumstances it would unhesitatingly be held that there was reserved to the architect the right of final approval or rejection at the expiration of the time named. This was the position of the defendants in this case, and that position was supported by the testimony of the architect. But the difficulty which confronts appellants lies in the fact that the court did not accept their version. Its direct finding that the work was done to the satisfaction of the architect impliedly, but positively, negatives the contention that he was, during all of that time, insisting that the work was imperfect and incomplete.

The case which is thus presented is one where the work has been completed to the satisfaction of the owner and architect, and the latter thereafter and without warrant refuses to issue his certificate for the final payment. The refusal under these circumstances being unreasonable, the necessity for the production of the certificate is dispensed with. Katz v. Bedford, 77 Cal. 322, 19 Pac. 523, 1 L. R. A. 826; Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 649; Phillips, etc., Co. v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 646, 23 L. Ed. 341.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.[84]

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1882. 88 N. Y. 648.)

In July, 1877, Michael Nolan, the plaintiffs' testator, entered into an agreement with the defendant to do the mason work in the erection of two buildings in the city of Brooklyn for the sum of $11,700, to be paid to him by her in instalments as the work progressed. The last instalment of $2,700 was to be paid thirty days after the completion and acceptance of the work. The work was to be performed to the satisfaction and under the direction of M. J. Morrill, architect, to be testified by his certificate, and that was to be obtained before any payment could be required to be made. As the work progressed, all the instalments were paid except the last, and Nolan, claiming that he had fully performed his agreement, commenced this action to recover that instalment. The defendant defended the action upon the ground that Nolan had not fully performed his agreement according to its terms and requirements, and also upon the ground that he had not obtained the architect's certificate, as required by the agreement.

Upon the trial the defendant gave evidence tending to show that much of the work was imperfectly done, and that the agreement had not been fully kept and performed on the part of Nolan; the latter gave evidence tending to show that the work was properly done, that he had fairly and substantially performed his agreement, and that the architect had refused to give him the certificate, which, by the terms of his agreement, would entitle him to the final payment. The referee found that Nolan completed the mason work required by the agreement according to its terms; that he in good faith intended to comply with, and did substantially comply with, and perform the requirements of his agreement; but that there were trivial defects in the plastering for which a deduction of $200 should be made from the last instalment, and he ordered judgment in favor of Nolan for the last instalment, less $200.

The Court say: "It is a general rule of law that a party must perform his contract before he can claim the consideration due him upon performance; but the performance need not in all cases be literal and exact. It is sufficient if the party bound to perform, acting in good faith, and intending and attempting to perform his contract, does so substantially, and then he may recover for his work, notwithstanding slight or trivial defects in performance, for which compensation may be made by an allowance to the other party. Whether a contract has been substantially performed is a question of fact depending upon all the circumstances of the case to be determined by the trial court. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 189, 72 Am. Dec. 442; Thomas v. Fleury, 26 N. Y. 26; Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, 10 Am. Rep. 449; Johnson v. DePeyster, 50 N. Y. 666; Phillip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 256; Bowery Nat. Bank v. The Mayor, 63 N. Y. 336. According to the authorities cited under an allegation of substantial performance upon the facts found by the referee, Nolan was entitled to recover unless he is barred because he failed to get the architect's certificate, which the referee found was unreasonably and improperly refused. But when he had substantially performed his contract, the architect was bound to give him the certificate, and his refusal to give it was unreasonable, and it is held that an unreasonable refusal on the part of an architect in such a case to give the certificate dispenses with its necessity."

HEBERT v. DEWEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1906. 191 Mass. 403, 77 N. E. 822.)

Two actions. The first by Valerie Hebert, administratrix, against P. H. Dewey; the second by Dewey against Hebert. Rulings were adverse to Dewey, and he excepted. In second action, exceptions overruled; in first action, exceptions sustained.

KNOWLTON, C. J. The first of these actions was brought by the plaintiff's intestate to recover upon a contract in writing for building a house for the defendant, and also for extra work done in connection with the contract. * * * [86]

The first important exception relates to the rulings and refusals to rule in regard to certificates given to the plaintiff's intestate by the architect, upon which payments were made by the defendant under the contract. The contract provided for three payments to be made at different stages in the progress of the work, and a fourth after the completion of it. Then followed this proviso: "That in each case of the said payments, a certificate shall be obtained from and signed by said F. S. Newman, architect, to the effect that the work is done in strict accordance with the drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due; said certificate, however, in no way lessening the total and final responsibility of the contractor; neither shall it exempt the contractor from liability to replace work, if it be afterwards discovered to have been done ill, or not according to the drawings and specifications, either in execution or materials," etc.

The third certificate, in its substantive parts, is as follows: "This is to certify that under the terms of the contract dated," etc., "Mr. Joseph Hebert, contractor for building your house, is entitled to the third payment, amounting to $1,200." The first and second certificates were in the same form; but the architect refused to give the fourth and final certificate, and the plaintiff's intestate never obtained it. At the trial the evidence was conflicting upon all the questions in issue, and there was much dispute as to whether the plaintiff's intestate had performed the contract, or had done improper work and used improper materials in violation of it. The judge instructed the jury, in substance, that so far as the work and materials which had previously been supplied were known to the architect at the time of giving one of these certificates, the certificate would be conclusive upon the defendant as to the quality not fraudulent; Johnson & Grommet Bros. v. Bunn & Monteiro, 114 Va. 222, 76 S. E. 310 (1912); Richmond College v. Scott-Nuckols Co., 124 Va. 333, 98 S. E. 1 (1919); Scully v. U. S. (D. C.) 197 Fed. 327 (1912), "it is not necessary that there should be actual fraud or intentional wrong; it is enough if there has been an arbitrary, unreasonable, or unjust refusal." See Audette v. L'Union St. Joseph, ante, p. 489.

[86] Part of the opinion is omitted. No question affecting the defendant's cross-action is of present interest.

and fitness of the work and materials, and it would not afterwards be open to the architect or the owner to question it. He treated each of these certificates as a final determination, in favor of the contractor, that the contract had been properly performed up to that time, in all parts of which the architect had knowledge. It is well settled that, in the absence of fraud, or such mistake as prevents him from exercising his judgment upon the case, the parties are bound by the certificate of an architect, made under the authority of a building contract like that now before us. His position is like that of an arbitrator, to determine the particular matter submitted to him. Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, 389; Flint v. Gibson, 106 Mass. 391; Robbins v. Clark, 129 Mass. 145. National Contracting Co. v. Com., 183 Mass. 89, 66 N. E. 639; Norcross v. Wyman, 187 Mass. 25, 72 N. E. 347; White v. Abbott, 188 Mass. 99, 74 N. E. 305.

The only question of difficulty in this part of the case arises from the peculiar language of the contract as to the effect of the certificates. They are referred to as "in no way lessening the total and final responsibility of the contractor." etc. This language furnishes ground for an argument that the certificates given prior to the completion of the work were intended to be merely intermediate or progress certificates, for the benefit of the builder, given to enable him to obtain payments on account, during the progress of the work. Such certificates are not conclusive as to the final payment, nor upon a claim for damages, nor on a quantum meruit. 1 Hudson, Building Contracts, 288; Tharsis Sulphur & Copper Co. v. McElroy, 3 App. Cas. 1040; Ford v. Railroad Co., 54 Iowa, 723, 7 N. W. 126. While the matter is not free from doubt, we are inclined to hold that these certificates were intended to be something more than progress certificates, and that they are to be held final in their determination of all matters which were then within the knowledge of the architect. In the first place, the contract makes no distinction in this particular between the certificates to be given before the work is completed and the final certificate. Then the special provision as to the effect is that they shall not relieve the contractor from liability for inferior work, "if it be afterwards discovered to have been done ill, * * * either in execution or materials," etc. Inasmuch as the general rule would make such certificates conclusive, we are of opinion that they should be held to leave the claims open only as to deficiencies that are afterwards discovered, and that this exception of the defendant should be overruled.[87]

The defendant contended that the plaintiff could not recover under the contract, because here intestate failed to obtain from the architect a certificate that the final payment was due. The question is whether a sufficient justification was shown for this failure. The instruction to the jury on this point was as follows: "If the defendant's architect capriciously withheld the final certificate, and capriciously allowed the contractor to believe that nothing more remained to be done to entitle him to such certificate, the contractor is thereby relieved from his obligation to secure the certificate." This was in accordance with the plaintiff's request, except that the judge left out the word "fraudulently" which was used in the request with "capriciously." The law bearing upon this part of the case has not been definitely settled in this commonwealth. There is a class of cases arising under policies of insurance and other similar contracts, in which it is held that the procurement of the certificate, called for by the contract, is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's recovery. Johnson v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 49, 17 Am. Rep. 65; Audette v. L'Union St. Joseph, 178 Mass. 113, 59 N. E. 668, and cases there cited. The reason why it is not open to the plaintiff in these cases to show that he could not obtain the certificate, is because the nature of the contract and the purpose of the requirement of a certificate are such as to make the recovery conditional upon the presentation of the paper, for the purpose of affording the insurer an assurance against fraud, and giving him additional evidence that there is a legal liability. Johnson v. Phœnix Ins. Co., ubi supra. The promise is to pay only upon the existence of conditions shown by a particular kind of proof, which the parties prescribe as the only evidence that will be deemed sufficient to establish the fact. In such contracts the plaintiff takes upon himself the obligation to furnish the required proof, and assumes the risk of whatever difficulty there may be in procuring it. Whether a contract is of this kind is a question of construction, dependent upon the meaning of the parties, as ascertained from the writing. A provision for a certificate by an architect, in a building contract, stands differently. The architect is the agent of the owner, to perform an act for the convenience of both parties, in regard to a matter with which he is directly connected as an employé. It is assumed by the contracting parties and implied in the contract that he will do his duty, and will act in good faith in determining whether a certificate should be granted.

In cases under provisions like the one before us, it is everywhere held that the contractor may recover without a certificate, if the circumstances relieve him from the obligation to obtain one. What circumstances are sufficient for this purpose is the only question. If the owner wrongfully interferes to prevent the giving of a certificate, it is universally held that this will entitle the contractor to recover without it. Beharrell v. Quimby, 162 Mass. 571, 575, 39 N. E. 407; Whitten v. New England Live Stock Co., 165 Mass. 343, 345, 43 N. E. 121; Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 H. & C. 42; Whelen v. Boyd, 114 Pa. 228, 6 Atl. 384. Many of the authorities are to the effect that any wrongful refusal of the architect to give a certificate will entitle the contractor to proceed without one. In some of the cases it is said that if the architect unreasonably refuses to give a certificate it is enough. Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648; Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N.

Y. 382, 390, 25 N. E. 418; Thomas v. Stewart, 132 N. Y. 580, 30 N. E. 577; Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608; United States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 327, 9 L. Ed. 142. In others it appeared that he refused "dishonestly and arbitrarily," or "willfully and fraudulently," or "capriciously." Bentley v. Davidson, 74 Wis. 420, 43 N. W. 139; Chism v. Schipper, 51 N. J. Law, 1, 16 Atl. 316, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668; Bradner v. Roffsell. 57 N. J. Law, 32, 29 Atl. 317; Id., 57 N. J. Law, 412, 31 Atl. 387; Badger v. Kerber, 61 Ill. 328. In Beharrell v. Quimby, 162 Mass. 571, 575, 39 N. E. 407, 409, there is an implication that if the architect "had fraudulently or capriciously withheld a final certificate," the plaintiff might have recovered without it.

In the present case there was evidence from which the jury might have found that after a complete performance of the contract the plaintiff's intestate applied to the architect for the final certificate, and he willfully and fraudulently refused to give it. It is plain that in making the contract it was understood between the parties that the architect would act in good faith in the performance of this part of his duty. In legal effect, the contract is as if their understanding in this particular had been written into it, as one of its terms. If, under such an agreement, after the full performance of the contract, the architect willfully and fraudulently refuses to act, or dies, or becomes disqualified, and there is no provision for such a case, the question arises whether the contractor is entitled to receive the contract price, the fact of performance being shown in some other way, or whether the entire contract falls to the ground, and the parties are left to enforce their rights under a quantum meruit. It is a general rule that if an implied condition that fails is of the essence of the contract, and enters largely into the consideration, in such a way that there can be no substantial performance under the changed conditions, the whole contract will fail, and the parties may have reasonable compensation for what they have done in reliance upon it. Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 27 N. E. 667, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654. But the provision in this case for the ascertainment of their rights, in reference to the construction of the building called for by the contract is of a different kind. It is a part of the machinery provided for the ascertainment and adjustment of their rights in reference to the matters to which the contract relates. It is provided to be used only upon an implied condition that it will be available for use. If, through the death or incapacity of the architect, or his willful refusal to act, it becomes impossible to adopt this method of determining the rights of the parties, other means may be adopted, on the ground that this no longer remains as an essential term of the agreement. In all substantial particulars the contract is complete without the provision for obtaining a final certificate, and, in the case supposed, it should be treated as if the provision were stricken from the contract. In Whitten v. New England Live Stock Insurance Co., 165 Mass. 343, 345, 43 N. E. 121, this was held to be the effect of an interposition by a party to prevent that from happening, upon the happening of which he was to make a payment under a contract.

A provision like the one before us in this kind of contract, where the substance of the consideration on one side is valuable property in the form of labor and materials, is materially different from the provision in the policies of insurance to which we have referred. In these contracts for insurance a small sum is paid on one side to obtain indemnity from the possible consequences of a risk which is very likely to cause damage. The compensation is to be paid only for genuine losses, resulting from the risk insured against. Satisfactory proof of their character, as coming within the policy, is of the very essence of the contract. On that depends the obligation of the insurer to pay a very large sum for which only a small consideration is given. In view of the ease with which frauds may be practiced, the parties sometimes prescribe a method of establishing the validity of the claim, which they make essential to its recognition. They say, in effect, that the policy shall apply only to claims established in this way, and they thereby make the production of the prescribed certificate of the very essence of the contract. It is only to contracts which are construed as showing such a strict agreement that this rule is applied. Whether any of these insurance contracts should be held to require the production of a certificate as a condition precedent to recovery, if the person who is to give it is incapacitated from acting, or fraudulently refuses to act, is a question which we need not consider in this case. In regard to such questions the rights of the parties depend upon what is their meaning and intention as shown by their contracts as applied to the subject with which they are dealing. We do not intend to extend the doctrine of the insurance cases beyond the statements in our decisions.

In all the cases that we have cited under building contracts, it is held that there may be a recovery upon the contract, where the contractor's failure to obtain the architect's certificate showing performance of it is caused by the fraud or intentional misconduct of the architect. In United States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 327, 9 L. Ed. 142, a case where the contract entitled the plaintiff to payment on the certificate of a colonel, commanding a party, Mr. Justice McLean said in the opinion: "Had the defendant proved that application has been made to the commanding officer for the proper certificates, and that he refused to give them, it would have been proper to receive other evidence to establish the claim." In Whelen v. Boyd, 114 Pa. 228, 232, 6 Atl. 384, 386, the court said of the defendant, in reference to the refusal of a certificate: "The law is settled that he cannot take advantage of his own or his agent's wrong." In Baltimore & Ohio R. R. v. Polly, Woods & Co., 14 Grat. (Va.) 447, 464, this language is used, in reference to the same subject: "The principal cannot take advantage of the fraud of his agent, even though he did not actually participate in the perpetration of the fraud." Other cases, indicating that, where the plaintiff is excused from obtaining such a certificate, the recovery may be on the contract itself, are Herrick v. Belknap's Estate and the Vermont Central R. R., 27 Vt. 673, 681, and Batchelor v. Kirkbride (C. C.) 26 Fed. 899. We have found no case of this kind in which it is held, on a failure to obtain an architect's certificate after performance of a contract, that the contract lost its force, and that the parties were left to their rights upon a quantum meruit.

In a case like the present, we are of opinion that if an architect after the completion of a contract willfully, and without excuse, refuses to act at all, or if he acts dishonestly and in bad faith, and the contractor is thereby prevented from obtaining a certificate, the contractor may proceed with his suit without it. Such action or refusal to act would leave the provision for obtaining an architect's certificate of no effect upon the rights of either party. The judge followed the instruction quoted with other instructions which went too far in relieving the plaintiff from obligation to obtain the certificate. He said: "If the fact was that after Mr. Hebert had finished the contract so far as he thought it required him to do work and furnished material, and when he called upon Mr. Macauley or Mr. Newman to come there and see whether the thing was right, and if it was, to give him a certificate, and if not, tell him what work was to be done, and he would do it. Mr. Macauley went there and pointed out where things were necessary to be done, and then a certificate could be given, and Guyman or Mr. Hebert caused those things to be done, and the doing of those things was said to be all that was required, and they were done, and then Mr. Newman the [architect] refused to give the certificate, or to come to the premises to look them over and see whether in these respects the added matters were sufficiently done, and they were sufficiently done, then the architect's certificate would drop out of sight and not be required." The facts here stated would be evidence from which the jury might find that the plaintiff's intestate was excused from obtaining the certificate; but it cannot be said as matter of law that they would excuse him. The architect, in the meantime, might have discovered other things which justified him in refusing the certificate.

After telling the jury that certain conduct of Dewey would not be fraudulent in reference to the certificate, he added: "It would still have to be shown by the plaintiff that the certificate ought to have been given, and if it was shown that the work was done and the contract substantially performed, then the fact that the certificate was not given was not of any account." This last proposition was not correct in law. If the architect, acting in good faith, thought that the work was not properly done and the contract was not substantially performed, and refused the certificate for that reason, the mere fact that the certificate ought to have been given, and that the work was done, and the contract was performed, would not entitle the plaintiff to recover without the certificate. The parties were bound by the decision of the architect made in good faith. The judge also gave the following instruction: "Under the law as I have instructed you I do not know as it would make any difference what was the conduct of Mr. Dewey, whether he tried improperly to get the architect to withhold the certificate, because if the work was properly done then the certificate ought to have been given. If the work was not properly done, and was so far improperly done as to render it no performance of the contract by Hebert, then the certificate would not avail. Perhaps it is only in the event that although the contract was not performed, still there were particulars in which it could be compensated for, and certain things could be done by Mr. Dewey to remedy it, in that event, but even in that event I don't see that the certificate would make any difference." Because these instructions give too little effect to the requirement that the contractor shall procure a certificate from the architect before he is entitled to payment, there must be a new trial. We deem it unnecessary to discuss other questions raised by the bill of exceptions.

In the second action the exceptions are overruled. In the first action the entry will be:

(g) Substantial Performance as Fulfillment of Condition

HANDY v. BLISS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1910. 204 Mass. 513, 90 N. E. 864.)

Action by Herman P. Handy against Nancy E. Bliss. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted. Exceptions sustained.

Knowlton, C. J.[88] This is an action to recover a balance due a contractor for the construction of a building. One of the counts was upon an account annexed, which opened to the plaintiff the right of recovery upon a quantum meruit for labor and materials. The defendant requested, among others, the following instructions:

"(1) That if the jury believe that pages 1 and 2 of the specifications, entitled 'General Conditions,' were a part of the contract, there could be no recovery on the ground of substantial performance.

"(2) If the jury shall be of the opinion that pages 1 and 2 of the specifications, entitled 'General Conditions,' were not a part of the original contract, then that where a payment is due only on the completion of the contract as here, the plaintiff must show substantial completion; that is, if the plaintiff knowingly omitted to do certain things required by the contract, and they are of such a nature that the work is complete in all material respects, then the contractor may recover the contract price, less what it would necessarily cost to complete the work; but the performance, so far as it goes, must be in exact compliance with the terms of the contract; that to constitute substantial performance, a general adherence to the plans and specifications is not sufficient, the builder not being entitled to willfully or carelessly depart from minute details, or to leave his work incomplete in any material respect; that the builder is not entitled to make changes that are so substantial that an allowance out of the contract price will not give the owner substantially what he contracted for, or to omit work that cannot be done by the owner except at great expense or with great risk to the building.

"(3) That this doctrine of substantial performance does not apply where omissions by the builder were intentional, or where the contract is to be performed to the satisfaction of the owner."

The law relative to the matters mentioned in these requests has been considered in different cases, and it was discussed at length in Bowen v. Kimbell, 203 Mass. 364, 89 N. E. 542, 133 Am. St. Rep. 302. To entitle the plaintiff to recover in a case of this kind there must be an honest intention to perform the contract and an attempt to perform it. There must be such an approximation to complete performance that the owner obtains substantially what was called for by the contract, although it may not be the same in every particular, and although there may be omissions and imperfections on account of which there should be a deduction from the contract price. It is not necessary that the work should be complete in all material respects, nor that there should be no omissions of work that cannot be done by the owner except at great expense or with great risk to the building. There may be omissions of that which could not afterwards be supplied exactly as called for by the contract without taking down the building to its foundations, and at the same time the omission may not affect the value of the building for use or otherwise, except so slightly as to be hardly appreciable. Notwithstanding such an omission, there might be a substantial performance of the contract.

There is no reason why the doctrine of substantial performance should not apply where the contract is to be performed to the satisfaction of the owner, according to the usual meaning of this expression as applied to contracts of this kind, namely, to his satisfaction, so far as he is acting reasonably in considering the work in connection with the contract. This doctrine does not apply where the builder intends not to perform the contract. But an intentional omission to do certain things called for by the contract, if he believes that they are not called for, and intends in good faith to do all that he has agreed to do, does not prevent the application of the doctrine. These requests for rulings were rightly refused.

Another request, numbered 3, relates to the requirements that the work should be done "to the entire satisfaction and approval of the owner." The question is whether this language means that the owner must act reasonably in determining whether the work is satisfactory, or whether, if he acts in good faith, he may decline to be satisfied and refuse his approval upon a whimsical and unreasonable exercise of personal taste or prejudice. Sometimes it is difficult to determine which construction should be given to a contract of this kind. Cases in which the language has been given the former meaning are: Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284, 21 N. E. 312, 14 Am. St. Rep. 422; Noyes v. Eastern Accident Ass'n, 190 Mass. 171, 76 N. E. 665; Lockwood Mfg. Co. v. Mason Regulator Co., 183 Mass. 25, 66 N. E. 420. See C. W. Hunt & Co. v. Boston Elev. Ry. Co., 199 Mass. 227, 85 N. E. 446; Cashman v. Proctor, 200 Mass. 272, 86 N. E. 284; Webber v. Cambridge Sav. Bank, 186 Mass. 314, 71 N. E. 567. Contracts which are given the latter meaning are found in Williams Mfg. Co. v. Standard Brass Co., 173 Mass. 356, 53 N. E. 862; White v. Randall, 153 Mass. 394, 26 N. E. 1071; Whittemore v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R., 191 Mass. 392, 77 N. E. 717.

Where the subject-matter of the contract seems to involve questions of personal taste or prejudice, and especially when in such a case no benefit will pass under the contract unless the work is accepted, there is more reason for giving such language the latter construction. But as was said in Hawkins v. Graham, ubi supra, "when the consideration furnished is of such a nature that its value will be lost to the plaintiff, either wholly or in great part unless paid for, a just hesitation must be felt and clear language required before deciding that payment is left to the will, or even to the idiosyncrasies of the interested party. In different cases, courts have been inclined to construe agreements of this class as agreements to do the thing in such a way as reasonably ought to satisfy the defendant."

The erection of a building upon real estate ordinarily confers a benefit upon the owner, and he should not be permitted to escape payment for it on account of a personal idiosyncrasy. Indeed, under the law of Massachusetts, this question is usually of little practical application to contracts for buildings upon real estate; for if the contract is not performed by reason of the failure of the owner to be satisfied with that which ought to satisfy him, there can be a recovery upon a quantum meruit; and in most cases the deduction that would be made from the contract price, for the difference between the literal performance of the contract and that which would have been a complete performance if the owner had acted reasonably and accepted the work, would be little if anything. This request for an instruction was rightly refused. * * *

MANITOWOC STEAM BOILER WORKS v. MANITOWOC GLUE CO.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1903. 120 Wis. 1, 97 N. W. 515.)

Action by the Manitowoc Steam Boiler Works against the Manitowoc Glue Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.[90]

Action to recover the contract price and enforce a lien for supplying a steam boiler to the defendant. The evidence disclosed that the defendant operated a glue factory, requiring a large amount of steam, not only for power, but also for heating and drying; that it had an old tubular boiler, which had been manufactured by the plaintiff, and with which and its use the plaintiff was entirely familiar; that in such situation the parties negotiated for a new boiler, the defendant stating to the plaintiff that the old boiler was inadequate—that it had a commercial rating of about 80 horse power, and that one was needed of about 100 horse power. The plaintiff's manager counseled one still larger, namely, to rate about 125 horse power, as compared with the old one, 80 horse power. The agreement finally reached was that the new one should be substantially of 50 per cent. more capacity than the old, but was to be of the Scotch type, instead of the tubular type. Plaintiff constructed a boiler of the Scotch type, put it in place in a building and upon brick foundation constructed by the defendant for that purpose. After it was connected up, it was found disappointing in capacity, and not up to the old boiler, but was used, in connection with the old one, to furnish the steam necessary for the factory, while efforts were made both by plaintiff and defendant to make it work more efficiently. These efforts being still unsatisfactory, the defendant complained of the boiler as not satisfying the contract, and, as the defendant's manager testifies, desired to have it taken away. The plaintiff's manager testifies that thereupon he proposed to have a test made, and, if it did not satisfy the contract, he would either take it out and put in a new one, or enlarge it so as to make it of the necessary capacity. That test was made, the plaintiff contending that it showed the boiler to satisfy the contract, the defendant contending that it did not, but meanwhile using the boiler to supply in part the steam needed to keep its factory running. * * * Thereupon the court made findings that the plaintiff had substantially performed its contract, except claim for defects. Dyer v. Lintz, 76 N. J. Law, 204, 68 Atl. 908 (1908); Peterson v. Pusey, 237 Ill. 204, 86 N. E. 692 (1908); Edmunds v. Welling, 57 Or. 103, 110 Pac. 533 (1910); Otis Elevator Co. v. Flanders Realty Co., 244 Pa. 186, 90 Atl. 624 (1914); Pressy v. McCornack, 235 Pa. 443, 84 Atl. 427 (1912); Stratmeyer v. Hoyt (Iowa) 174 N. W. 243 (1919); City of St. Charles v. Stookey, 154 Fed. 772, 85 C. C. A. 494 (1907); Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 156 Fed. 922, 85 C. C. A. 54 (1907); Northwestern Terra Cotta Co. v. Caldwell, 234 Fed. 491, 148 C. C. A. 257 (1916), seller supplied only 99⅞ per cent. of material agreed.

[90] Parts of the report are omitted.

that, instead of a boiler 50 per cent. greater than the old one, it had supplied one of about 20 per cent. less capacity; that defendant had accepted the boiler; and that the reasonable value thereof was the original contract price of $2,035, for which, less the payments, judgment was rendered, from which the defendant brings this appeal.

DODGE, J. (after stating the facts). The result of this action, whereby the defendant is required to pay the full contract price for a boiler of only about one-half the capacity or value of that for which it agreed to pay, is somewhat startling, especially in view of the consideration, understood by both parties, that its only reason for buying a new boiler at all was that the operation of the factory required more steam than the old one could supply. Before reaching such a result, a court should pause to re-examine the rules of law or processes of reasoning upon which it is based. If the law warrants it, the force or value of a contract seems to have vanished. The contractor receives the same compensation for nonperformance as for performance. The general rule of law is firmly established that he who makes an entire contract can recover no pay unless he performs it entirely and according to its terms. Moritz v. Larsen, 70 Wis. 569, 36 N. W. 331; Cohn v. Plumer, 88 Wis. 622, 60 N. W. 1000; Widman v. Gay, 104 Wis. 277, 80 N. W. 450. This general rule has, with considerable hesitation, been relaxed for equitable considerations in certain exceptional situations where it is believed to work hardship:

First, in favor of laborers who contract to perform personal services, and without fault of either party fail of complete performance (Diefenback v. Stark, 56 Wis. 462, 466, 14 N. W. 621, 43 Am. Rep. 719; Walsh v. Fisher, 102 Wis. 172, 78 N. W. 437, 43 L. R. A. 810, 72 Am. St. Rep. 865; Hildebrand v. Amer. F. A. Co., 109 Wis. 171, 85 N. W. 268, 53 L. R. A. 826); secondly, in building contracts, where the contractor constructs something on the land of another which by oversight, but in good-faith effort to perform fails to entirely satisfy the contract, but is so substantially in compliance therewith that the structure fully accomplishes the purpose of that contracted for, and the other party voluntarily accepts the benefit thereof, or where the failure is mere inconsiderable incompleteness, and the expense of completion is easy of ascertainment (Malbon v. Birney, 11 Wis. 107; Fuller, etc., Co. v. Shurts, 95 Wis. 606, 70 N. W. 683; Williams v. Thrall, 101 Wis. 337, 76 N. W. 599; Laycock v. Parker, 103 Wis. 161, 79 N. W. 327; Pritzlaff Co. v. Berghoefer, 103 Wis. 359, 79 N. W. 564; Taft v. Montague, 14 Mass. 282, 7 Am. Dec. 215; Smith v. School Dist., 20 Conn. 312; Bozarth v. Dudley, 44 N. J. Law, 304, 43 Am. Rep. 373; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173, 72 Am. Dec. 442; Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. Ed. 762; and, thirdly, where the contractor supplies an article different from or inferior to that promised, and the recipient, having full opportunity to reject without loss or injury, decides to accept and retain the thing furnished.

This third phase is hardly an exception, for such voluntary acceptance may well be deemed the making of a new contract to take and pay reasonably for the article which does not satisfy the original contract. Fuller, etc., Co., v. Shurts, supra; Williams v. Thrall, supra. In case of either of these exceptions, great caution is due in order that the innocent purchaser shall not suffer. If loss must fall anywhere, it should rest on him who breaks the contract. As said in Allen v. McKibbin, 5 Mich. 449, 455, and quoted approvingly in Walsh v. Fisher, supra, "the party in default can never gain by his default, and the other party can never be permitted to lose by it:" Bishop v. Price, 24 Wis. 480. The question, therefore, in such cases, is never what will reasonably compensate the contractor, but what can the purchaser pay without being put in worse position than if the contract had been performed? The recovery is quantum valebat from the innocent purchaser's point of view.

Proceeding to ascertain how far these principles are applicable to the situation at bar, we are confronted by the fact that substantial performance of the express contract is wholly wanting. The finding is that the boiler furnished was about 82 per cent. of the capacity of the old one, instead of 150 per cent., and that the increase of capacity was the vital and essential part of the contract. This is in no sense substantial performance. The boiler does not serve at all the purpose which the larger one would have served, and for which it was purchased. Defendant can obtain that for which it contracted, and for which it agreed to pay $2,035, and which is necessary to the purpose which induced the contract, in only one of two ways: either it can remove this boiler from its premises at large expense, if plaintiff does not remove it, and purchase and put in place another of the required size; or it can retain it, and put in another of substantially equal capacity as auxiliary to it, and at a cost equal to or greater than the original contract price, and probably necessitating reconstruction of his boiler house. One in such predicament cannot be said to have received in substance that for which he contracted. Malbon v. Birney, supra; Fuller, etc., Co. v. Shurts, supra. Neither do we discover either finding or proof that defendant had accepted the boiler, had decided to keep it, and use it so far as it will go toward supplying the needed steam. True, the trial court argues that it would be inequitable to allow defendant to keep the boiler and pay nothing for it, but does not find that it has elected to do so. The only finding is that it is not shown by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant rejected the boiler, or demanded its removal, though he did protest that it did not satisfy the contract. The evidence is that defendant never in words ordered plaintiff to remove the boiler, but from the testimony of the same witness (plaintiff's manager) it appears that defendant, at the time of protesting the insufficiency, did convey to defendant its wish and expectation that it be removed. That witness testified that upon such protest he agreed that he would remove the boiler if on test it did not come up to contract requirement. The test was made, the capacity ascertained, but the plaintiff's contention thereafter was that the contract was other than it is now found to have been, and for that reason did not remove it. This testimony fully confirms that of defendant's manager that he desired to have the boiler removed, and negatives any inference that it remained on defendant's premises pursuant to an election on its part to keep it. * * * Doubtless the fact, unexplained, that defendant made use of the boiler, which had been built into its boiler house and connected with the steam pipes in its factory, is an evidentiary circumstance having some tendency to show acceptance, but such conduct is by no means conclusive when a party cannot forego use of the appliance without at the same time giving up the use of his own premises. * * *

The result is that at the close of the trial there was no evidence to support a recovery on the contract, and the court should have rendered judgment dismissing the complaint. Neither was there evidence to support a cause of action quantum meruit, to accord with which amendment by the court is authorized by section 2830, Rev. St. 1898. True, the court might conceive that acts subsequent to those disclosed by the proofs might take place, and might constitute acceptance; but could that justify an entire change of issues? The real controversy had been as to the capacity of the boiler contracted for. That issue being decided against it, different courses were open both to plaintiff and defendant. The former might decide to take it away and replace it by one up to the contract requirement, as it had promised to do; or perhaps it might enlarge this particular boiler, as suggested by the evidence; or it might take it away entirely, and stand its liability for damages for entire breach of the contract. The defendant might consent to any of these steps, or it might resist them in such a way as to effectively work an acceptance so as to be liable quantum meruit. Indeed, so far as the record discloses, these options are still open to the parties, if not foreclosed by the judgment appealed from. * * *

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment dismissing the complaint.[91]

[91] In the following cases the court gave judgment for the defendant, for the reason that the plaintiff's performance was not substantial performance: Herdal v. Sheehy, 173 Cal. 163, 159 Pac. 422 (1916), building erected partly on an adjoining street; Tice v. Moore, 82 Conn. 244, 73 Atl. 133, 17 Ann. Cas. 113 (1909), plaintiff abandoned performance; Nance v. Patterson Bldg. Co., 140 Ky. 564, 131 S. W. 484, 140 Am. St. Rep. 398 (1910); Steel Storage & Elevator Const. Co. v. Stock, 225 N. Y. 173, 121 N. GILLESPIE TOOL CO. v. WILSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1888. 123 Pa. 19, 16 Atl. 36.)

Action by the Gillespie Tool Company against R. J. Wilson and George E. Tener, copartners under the style of Wilson & Tener, to recover for boring a gas-well. The contract of the plaintiff company was to put down and case a gas-well for the defendants, 2,000 feet deep,—to be 8 inches in diameter for 400 feet, to shut off fresh water, and below that, to the bottom, to be 5⅝ inches in diameter. If salt water was found below 400 feet, the 5⅝-inch casing to be drawn, and the hole reamed out to 8 inches in diameter, to shut off salt water. then 5⅝-inch hole to the bottom. The well was put down the 2,000 feet, but the diameter was not as specified in the contract. It was an 8-inch hole to the depth of 940 feet; from that to 1,820 a 5⅝-inch hole; and from that to the bottom a 4¼-inch hole. At the depth of 1,729 feet, a salt rock was struck, nearly 100 feet in thickness. To shut off this salt water and finish the well 5⅝ inches in diameter, the casing from 940 to 1,820 feet would have to be drawn, and the hole reamed out to 8 inches in diameter. Instead of doing that, the plaintiff inserted casing inside the 5⅝-inch casing, and this shut off the salt water, but in consequence thereof could make the well below only 4½ inches in diameter.

The court below granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff took out a writ of error, making the following assignments of error: "(1) The court below erred in entering judgment of compulsory nonsuit. (2) The court below erred in refusing plaintiff's motion to take off nonsuit. (3) The court below erred in rejecting plaintiff's offer of testimony of J. M. Guffy and others, which, with the objection thereto and ruling of the court thereon, were as follows: 'By Plaintiff's Counsel: We propose to ask Mr. Guffy, and other witnesses of similar practical experience in the same line, the following question: A test well is to be drilled for oil or gas in undeveloped territory to a depth of 2,000 feet. An 8-inch hole is drilled 940 feet deep, passing through the water-veins usually found in the developed territory, and it is cased to that depth. From that point it is drilled 5⅝ inches in diameter, until it has reached a depth of 1,729 feet from the surface, when salt-water veins, such as are unusual in previously developed territory, are struck, and continue to be struck until the well has been drilled to a depth of 1,822 feet from the surface. It is then cased with 4¼-inch casing from the surface down to the depth of 1,822 feet, where the salt-water veins have all been passed. Assuming these facts, state whether or not substantially the same results would be reached in testing territory for oil or gas as if the hole had been drilled 5⅝ inches in diameter below the depth of 1,822 feet. (Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant, and, further, that the question assumes facts not shown to exist in this case.) By the Court: The offer is to prove substantially that it is as good as if it had been bored out the required distance. The question is not whether it will answer as well, but whether it is a substantial fulfillment of the contract. Objection sustained. Exception and bill sealed.' (4) The court below erred in rejecting plaintiff's further offer of testimony of same witnesses, as follows: 'Assuming the facts above stated, [as in third assignment of error,] state whether or not it would be good operating in the drilling of a test well to drill the remaining portion of the 2,000 feet with a 4-inch bit or auger. (Objected to as before. Objection sustained, and bill sealed.)' (5) The court below erred in rejecting plaintiff's further offer of testimony of same witnesses, as follows: 'Assuming the above facts [as in third assignment of error] to be true, state whether or not, in case of obtaining gas, the same could be practically used as well from a 4¼-inch hole as from a 5⅝-inch hole. (Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection sustained.)'"

STERRETT, J. Plaintiff company neither proved nor offered to prove such facts as would have warranted the jury in finding substantial performance of the contract embodied in the written propositions submitted to and accepted by the defendants. In several particulars the work contracted for was not done according to the plain terms of the contract. Nearly one-half of the well was not reamed out, as required, to an 8-inch diameter, so as to admit 5⅝-inch casing in the clear. About 180 feet of the lower section of the well, also, was bored 4 or 4½ inches instead of 5⅝ inches in diameter. In neither of these particulars, nor in any other respect, was there any serious difficulty in the way of completing the work in strict accordance with the terms of the agreement. To have done so would have involved nothing more than additional time and increased expense. The fact was patent, as well as proved by undisputed evidence, that a 4½-inch well would not discharge as much gas as one 5⅝ inches in diameter. It is no answer to say that, for the purpose of testing the territory, a 4½-inch well was as good as a 5⅝-inch well, nor that reaming out the well to the width and depth required by the terms of the contract would have subjected defendants to additional expense without any corresponding benefit. That was their own affair. They contracted for the boring of a well of specified depth, dimensions, etc., and they had a right to insist on at least a substantial performance of the contract according to its terms. That was not done, and the court was clearly right in refusing to submit the case to the jury on evidence that would not have warranted them in finding substantial performance of the contract. The equitable doctrine of substantial performance is intended for the protection and relief of those who have faithfully and honestly endeavored to perform their contract in all material and substantial particulars, so that their right to compensation may not be forfeited by reason of mere technical, inadvertent, or unimportant omissions or defects. It is incumbent on him who invokes its protection to present a case in which there has been no willful omission or departure from the terms of his contract. If he fails to do so, the question of substantial performance should not be submitted to the jury. The offers specified in the third, fourth, and fifth assignments were rightly rejected. The proposed evidence was irrelevant and incompetent. There is nothing in the second that requires a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.[92]

JACOB & YOUNGS v. KENT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1921. 230 N. Y. 239, 129 N. E. 889.)

CARDOZO, J. The plaintiff built a country residence for the defendant at a cost of upwards of $77,000, and now sues to recover a balance of $3,483.46, remaining unpaid. The work of construction ceased in June, 1914, and the defendant then began to occupy the dwelling. There was no complaint of defective performance until March, 1915. One of the specifications for the plumbing work provides that "all wrought-iron pipe must be well galvanized, lap welded pipe of the grade known as 'standard pipe' of Reading manufacture."

The defendant learned in March, 1915, that some of the pipe, instead of being made in Reading, was the product of other factories. The plaintiff was accordingly directed by the architect to do the work anew. The plumbing was then encased within the walls except in a few places where it had to be exposed. Obedience to the order meant more than the substitution of other pipe. It meant the demolition at great expense of substantial parts of the completed structure. The plaintiff left the work untouched, and asked for a certificate that the final payment was due. Refusal of the certificate was followed by this suit.

The evidence sustains a finding that the omission of the prescribed brand of pipe was neither fraudulent nor willful. It was the result of the oversight and inattention of the plaintiff's subcontractor. Reading pipe is distinguished from Cohoes pipe and other brands only by the name of the manufacturer stamped upon it at intervals of between six and seven feet. Even the defendant's architect, though he inspected the pipe upon arrival, failed to notice the discrepancy. The plaintiff tried to show that the brands installed, though made by other manufacturers, were the same in quality, in appearance, in market value, and in cost as the brand stated in the contract—that they were indeed, the same thing, though manufactured in another place. The evidence was excluded, and a verdict directed for the defendant. The Appellate Division reversed, and granted a new trial.

We think the evidence, if admitted, would have supplied some basis for the inference that the defect was insignificant in its relation to the project. The courts never say that one who makes a contract fills the measure of his duty by less than full performance. They do say, however, that an omission, both trivial and innocent, will sometimes be atoned for by allowance of the resulting damage, and will not always be the breach of a condition to be followed by a forfeiture. Spence v. Ham, 163 N. Y. 220, 57 N. E. 412, 51 L. R. A. 238; Woodward v. Fuller, 80 N. Y. 312; Glacius v. Black, 67 N. Y. 563, 566; Bowen v. Kimbell, 203 Mass. 364, 370, 89 N. E. 542, 133 Am. St. Rep. 302. The distiriction is akin to that between dependent and independent promises, or between promises and conditions. Anson on Contracts (Corbin's Ed.) § 367; 2 Williston on Contracts, § 842. Some promises are so plainly independent that they can never by fair construction be conditions of one another. Rosenthal Paper Co. v. Nat. Folding Box & Paper Co., 226 N. Y. 313, 123 N. E. 766; Bogardus v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 101 N. Y. 328, 4 N. E. 522. Others are so plainly dependent that they must always be conditions. Others, though dependent and thus conditions when there is departure in point of substance, will be viewed as independent and collateral when the departure is insignificant. 2 Williston on Contracts, §§ 841, 842; Eastern Forge Co. v. Corbin, 182 Mass. 590, 592, 66 N. E. 419; Robinson v. Mollett, L. R., 7 Eng. & Ir. App. 802, 814; Miller v. Benjamin, 142 N. Y. 613, 37 N. E. 631. Considerations partly of justice and partly of presumable intention are to tell us whether this or that promise shall be placed in one class or in another. The simple and the uniform will call for different remedies from the multifarious and the intricate. The margin of departure within the range of normal expectation upon a sale of common chattels will vary from the margin to be expected upon a contract for the construction of a mansion or a "skyscraper." There will be harshness sometimes and oppression in the implication of a condition when the thing upon which labor has been expended is incapable of surrender because united to the land, and equity and reason in the implication of a like condition when the subject-matter, if defective, is in shape to be returned. From the conclusion that promises may not be treated as dependent to the extent of their uttermost minutiæ without a sacrifice of justice, the progress is a short one to the conclusion that they may not be so treated without a perversion of intention. Intention not otherwise revealed may be presumed to hold in contemplation the reasonable and probable. If something else is in view, it must not be left to implication. There will be no assumption of a purpose to visit venial faults with oppressive retribution.

Those who think more of symmetry and logic in the development of legal rules than of practical adaptation to the attainment of a just result will be troubled by a classification where the lines of division are so wavering and blurred. Something, doubtless, may be said on the score of consistency and certainty in favor of a stricter standard. The courts have balanced such considerations against those of equity and fairness, and found the latter to be the weightier. The decisions in this state commit us to the liberal view, which is making its way, nowadays, in jurisdictions slow to welcome it. Dakin & Co. v. Lee, 1916, 1 K. B. 566, 579. Where the line is to be drawn between the important and the trivial cannot be settled by a formula. "In the nature of the case, precise boundaries are impossible." 2 Williston on Contracts, § 841. The same omission may take on one aspect or another according to its setting. Substitution of equivalents may not have the same significance in fields of art on the one side and in those of mere utility on the other. Nowhere will change be tolerated, however, if it is so dominant or pervasive as in any real or substantial measure to frustrate the purpose of the contract. Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 51, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608. There is no general license to install whatever, in the builder's judgment, may be regarded as "just as good." Easthampton L. & C. Co., Ltd., v. Worthington, 186 N. Y. 407, 412, 79 N. E. 323. The question is one of degree, to be answered, if there is doubt, by the triers of the facts (Crouch v. Gutmann; Woodward v. Fuller, supra), and, if the inferences are certain, by the judges of the law (Easthampton L. & C. Co., Ltd., v. Worthington, supra). We must weigh the purpose to be served, the desire to be gratified, the excuse for deviation from the letter, the cruelty of enforced adherence. Then only can we tell whether literal fulfillment is to be implied by law as a condition. This is not to say that the parties are not free by apt and certain words to effectuate a purpose that performance of every term shall be a condition of recovery. That question is not here. This is merely to say that the law will be slow to impute the purpose, in the silence of the parties, where the significance of the default is grievously out of proportion to the oppression of the forfeiture. The willful transgressor must accept the penalty of his transgression. Schultze v. Goodstein, 180 N. Y. 248, 251, 73 N. E. 21; Desmond-Dunne Co. v. Friedman-Doscher Co., 162 N. Y. 486, 490, 56 N. E. 995. For him there is no occasion to mitigate the rigor of implied conditions. The transgressor whose default is unintentional and trivial may hope for mercy if he will offer atonement for his wrong. Spence v. Ham, supra.

In the circumstances of this case, we think the measure of the allowance is not the cost of replacement, which would be great, but the difference in value, which would be either nominal or nothing. Some of the exposed sections might perhaps have been replaced at moderate expense. The defendant did not limit his demand to them, but treated the plumbing as a unit to be corrected from cellar to roof. In point of fact, the plaintiff never reached the stage at which evidence of the extent of the allowance became necessary. The trial court had excluded evidence that the defect was unsubstantial, and in view of that ruling there was no occasion for the plaintiff to go farther with an offer of proof. We think, however, that the offer, if it had been made, would not of necessity have been defective because directed to difference in value. It is true that in most cases the cost of replacement is the measure. Spence v. Ham, supra. The owner is entitled to the money which will permit him to complete, unless the cost of completion is grossly and unfairly out of proportion to the good to be attained. When that is true, the measure is the difference in value. Specifications call, let us say, for a foundation built of granite quarried in Vermont. On the completion of the building, the owner learns that through the blunder of a subcontractor part of the foundation has been built of granite of the same quality quarried in New Hampshire. The measure of allowance is not the cost of reconstruction. "There may be omissions of that which could not afterwards be supplied exactly as called for by the contract without taking down the building to its foundations, and at the same time the omission may not affect the value of the building for use or otherwise, except so slightly as to be hardly appreciable." Handy v. Bliss, 204 Mass. 513, 519, 90 N. E. 864, 134 Am. St. Rep. 673. Cf. Foeller v. Heintz, 137 Wis. 169, 178, 118 N. W. 543, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 321; Oberlies v. Bullinger, 132 N. Y. 598, 601, 30 N. E. 999; 2 Williston on Contracts, § 805, p. 1541. The rule that gives a remedy in cases of substantial performance with compensation for defects of trivial or inappreciable importance has been developed by the courts as an instrument of justice. The measure of the allowance must be shaped to the same end.

The order should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed in favor of the plaintiff upon the stipulation, with costs in all courts.[93]

ROWE v. GERRY et al.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1906. 112 App. Div. 358, 98 N. Y. Supp. 380.)

Action by Edward Rowe against Isabel H. Gerry and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Gerry appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. This case has been here twice on appeal from judgments for the plaintiff. 86 App. Div. 349, 83 N. Y. Supp. 740; 109 App. Div. 153, 95 N. Y. Supp. 857. The complaint was to recover the final balance due on a building contract; i. e., it was for performance of the contract. The first judgment was reversed for the reason that performance was not shown by the plaintiff, but nonperformance, and excuse therefor, whereas a recovery could be had under the complaint only for performance. The second judgment was affirmed, because substantial performance, which is performance, was shown and found by the trial court. A reargument was ordered.

The learned counsel for the appellant understands that the second judgment should have been reversed, because it was for substantial performance, which he understands from our two former opinions to be not performance, but nonperformance. We do not wish to leave any such impression as that. There is a wide difference. Substantial performance is performance, and entitles the plaintiff to recover under a complaint for performance; and especially is that so under building contracts, where some of the infinite details may be easily overlooked. Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, 10 Am. Rep. 449; Spence v. Ham, 163 N. Y. 220, 57 N. E. 412, 51 L. R. A. 238. It may well even happen that the plaintiff may not know of existing omissions when he draws his complaint for performance. When such omissions are proved by the defendant, the plaintiff may recover on his complaint for performance, if they be unsubstantial, and not willful, but the cost of supplying them has to be deducted.

The judgment is affirmed.[94]

[94] Where the issue is the duty of the defendant to pay the agreed price, the performance by the plaintiff is quite immaterial except so far as such performance is a condition precedent to the duty. If the only condition is substantial (not full) performance, it is sufficient to allege this; but it is also proper to allege full performance for this means full performance of conditions precedent. Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 156 Fed. 922, 926, 85 C. C. A. 54 (1907).

In Smith v. Mathews Const. Co., 179 Cal. 797, 179 Pac. 205, 207 (1919), the court said: "Appellants insist that the deviations from the strict letter of the contract (such, for example, as the failure in each room to carry the "scratch coat" clear to the floor at that part of the wall subsequently concealed by the baseboard) were intentional, willful violations of the agreement necessarily involving bad faith, and that the doctrine of substantial performance has no application. They also assert that such doctrine may only be invoked by pleading and where, as here, plaintiff alleged full performance and the court found that there were any deviations, however slight, from strict performance on the part of the lien claimant, the judgment must be against him. In support of the point last stated, appellants cite such cases as Herdal v. Sheehy, 173 Cal. 163, 159 Pac. 422 (1916), and Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867 (1890), which hold, in effect, that where one seeks to recover for the value of work done or material furnished in the partial performance of a contract, full performance of which has been prevented by the other party to the agreement, he must plead the excuse for failure of full performance. Undoubtedly, if the omissions on the part of the plaintiff were material and substantial failures to complete his contract, the pleading was not sufficient to support a cause of action based upon the quantum meruit. But the court held that there was a substantial performance of the contract, and the real question is whether or not that ruling was justified. It is not true, as appellants contend, that any conscious deviation from the absolute terms of the agreement causes a failure of performance."

(h) CONDITION OF PERSONAL SATISFACTION

GIBSON v. CRANAGE.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1878. 39 Mich. 49, 33 Am. Rep. 351.)

MARSTON, J. Plaintiff in error brought assumpsit to recover the contract price for the making and execution of the portrait of the deceased daughter of defendant. It appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that he at a certain time called upon the defendant and solicited the privilege of making an enlarged picture of his deceased daughter. He says: "I was to make an enlarged picture that he would like, a large one from a small one, and one that he would like and recognize as a good picture of his little girl, and he was to pay me."

The defendant testifies that the plaintiff was to take the small photograph and send it away to be finished, "and when returned if it was not perfectly satisfactory to me in every particular, I need not take it or pay for it. I still objected and he urged me to do so. There was no risk about it; if it was not perfectly satisfactory to me I need not take it or pay for it."

There was little if any dispute as to what the agreement was. After the picture was finished it was shown to defendant who was dissatisfied with it and refused to accept it. Plaintiff endeavored to ascertain what the objections were, but says he was unable to ascertain clearly, and he then sent the picture away to the artist to have it changed.

On the next day he received a letter from the defendant reciting the original agreement, stating that the picture shown him the previous day was not satisfactory and that he declined to take it or any other similar picture, and countermanded the order. A farther correspondence was had, but it was not very material and did not change the aspect of the case. When the picture was afterwards received by the plaintiff from the artist, he went to see the defendant and to have him examine it. This defendant declined to do, or to look at it, and did not until during the trial, when he examined and found the same objections still existing.

We do not consider it necessary to examine the charge in detail, as we are satisfied it was as favorable to plaintiff as the agreement would warrant.

The contract (if it can be considered such) was an express one. The plaintiff agreed that the picture when finished should be satisfactory to the defendant, and his own evidence showed that the contract in this important particular had not been performed. It may be that the picture was an excellent one and that the defendant ought to have been satisfied with it and accepted it, but under the agreement the defendant was the only person who had the right to decide this question. Where parties thus deliberately enter into an agreement which violates no rule of public policy, and which is free from all taint of fraud or mistake, there is no hardship whatever in holding them bound by it.

Artists or third parties might consider a portrait an excellent one, and yet it prove very unsatisfactory to the person who had ordered it and who might be unable to point out with clearness the defects or objections. And if the person giving the order stipulates that the portrait when finished must be satisfactory to him or else he will not accept or pay for it, and this is agreed to, he may insist upon his right as given him by the contract. McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray (Mass.) 141; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136, 18 Am. Rep. 463.

The judgment must be affirmed with costs.[95]

KENDALL v. WEST.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1902. 196 Ill. 221, 63 N. E. 683, 89 Am. St. Rep. 317.)

Action by Ezra Kendall against William H. West. From a judgment of the appellate court (98 Ill. App. 116) affirming a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

HAND, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought in the circuit court of Cook county by the appellant against the appellee to recover damages in the sum of $10,000 for the breach of a contract in writing whereby the appellee, a theatrical manager, engaged the appellant, a specialist in monologue, to perform for appellee at such places and theaters in the United States and Canada as appellee might require, for the theatrical season of 1898 and 1899; the season to begin on or about August 15, 1898, and continue for not less than 30 weeks. Appellant

Where a contract is to be performed to the satisfaction of some third person, more or less disinterested, the cases dealing with certificates of architects and engineers are applicable. In such cases the courts are much more likely (though not quite certain) to hold that personal satisfaction is a condition. See Butler v. Tucker, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 447 (1840); Webb & Co. v. Board Trustees of Morganton Graded School Dist., 143 N. C. 299, 55 S. E. 719 (1906), contract to buy bonds "when legally issued to the satisfaction of our attorney"; Church v. Shanklin, 95 Cal. 626, 30 Pac. 789, 17 L. R. A. 207 (1892), condition of perfecting title to land to the satisfaction of an attorney; Giles v. Union Land Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 196 S. W. 312 (1917); Grafton v. Eastern Co. R. Co., 8 Exch. 699 (1853), coke to be supplied "to the satisfaction of the railway company's inspecting officer."

agreed to "render satisfactory services," and appellee agreed to pay for "satisfactory services" the sum of $250 per week. Appellant entered upon his engagement on August 15, and continued until November 5, 1898, when the contract was terminated by appellee. Appellant was paid for his services in full up to and including November 5th. The case was tried by the court and a jury. At the close of all the evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant, and a motion for a new trial having been overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict, the appellant perfected an appeal to the appellate court for the First district, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, and a further appeal has been prosecuted to this court.

The question presented for decision is, did the circuit court err in taking the case from the jury? There was no conflict in the evidence, and, the facts being admitted, it was the duty of the court to direct the jury as to whether or not such facts, in law, amounted to a legal justification for the discharge of the appellant. The company managed by appellee was a minstrel company. The appellant was requested by appellee a number of times to shorten the time of his performance, and to try his part in black face, with both of which requests he positively declined to comply. Wood, in his work on Master and Servant (section 119), says: "Refusing to obey the reasonable orders of the master is a good ground for discharge from service, for in every contract of hiring there is an implied contract on the part of the servant that he will obey the lawful and reasonable commands of his master." The appellee was the proprietor of the company, and had the right to direct its management; and, if appellant refused to comply with his reasonable request, the appellee had the right to discharge him. We do not think the court erred in holding, as a matter of law, that the request made of appellant to shorten the time of his performance, and to try his part in black face, under the circumstances shown by the undisputed testimony, was not unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, and that he was bound to comply therewith, and, upon a refusal so to do, that the appellee had the right to discharge him and terminate the contract. The contract of employment provided that appellant should render "satisfactory services," for which he was to receive the sum of $250 per week. It contained no provision in any manner limiting the appellee in the exercise of his judgment as to what should be deemed "satisfactory services." The appellant did not undertake to render services which should satisfy a court or jury, but undertook to satisfy the taste, fancy, interest, and judgment of appellee. It was the appellee who was to be satisfied, and, if dissatisfied, he had the right to discharge the appellant at any time for any reason, of which he was the sole judge. Goodrich v. Van Nortwick, 43 Ill. 445; Crawford v. Publishing Co., 163 N. Y. 404, 57 N. E. 616. In the Goodrich Case the plaintiff purchased and paid for a fanning mill, with the agreement that, if it did not suit him and answer his purpose, he might return it within 30 days. It was held that the mill must answer both requirements, and, if it did not suit the purchaser, he had the right to return it and recover back the purchase price, and that he was the sole judge of whether or not he was suited. In the Crawford Case the plaintiff made a contract to write for the defendant's newspaper for two years, provided his services should be satisfactory to the publisher; and it was held that the defendant had the right to discharge the plaintiff at any time if his services were unsatisfactory, of which fact the defendant was the sole judge.

We find no reversible error in this record. The judgment of the appellate court will therefore be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.[96]

BRIDGEFORD & CO. v. MEAGHER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1911. 144 Ky. 479, 139 S. W. 750.)

Action by Louis L. Meagher against Bridgeford & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

CARROLL, J. On December 21, 1908, the following contract was entered into between the appellant, Bridgeford & Co., and the appellee, Meagher: "This is to certify that the undersigned, Bridgeford & Co. will guarantee Louis L. Meagher a steady position as foreman of our molding shop, the same position he now holds, for a term of three years or as long as he performs his duties in a successful or satisfactory manner, provided Bridgeford & Co. are in existence, at a salary of not less than twenty-two and $^{50}/_{100}$ dollars ($22.50) per week, payable weekly, said Louis L. Meagher to give his entire time and attention to the services of Bridgeford & Co. This contract to take effect January 1st, 1909." At the time this contract was entered into, Bridgeford & Co. were and had been for many years engaged in the manufacture of stoves and structural iron work, and the appellee, a molder by trade, had been working for them for some nine years, and for about three years preceding the contract held the position of foreman of the molding shop. On January 1, 1909, he commenced work under the contract and continued until the 22d of November, 1909, when he was discharged.

In January, 1910, he instituted this action against appellant to recover damages for its breach of the contract in discharging him. He averred in his petition: That during the time he worked for it under the contract "he gave his entire time and attention to the services of defendant as required by said contract, and performed his duties in a successful and satisfactory manner as said employé, and that defendant has been in existence ever since the making of said contract, and still is in existence. That plaintiff has at all times been, and still is, ready, willing, and able to perform his part of said contract, and did so perform it until his wrongful discharge as aforesaid, and since his said discharge has at all times been ready, willing, and able to perform his part of said contract, and has tendered and offered to do so, but defendant, in violation of its contract, has refused and still refuses to permit him to do so. Plaintiff says that by reason of said breach of contract he was thrown out of employment and lost the opportunity to earn the salary promised in said contract for the remainder of the term, to wit, from November 22, 1909, to January 1, 1912, and that he has been unable to obtain other employment, although he has diligently endeavored to do so; that by reason of said breach of contract plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,460." In its answer appellant, after denying in a general way the averments of the petition, set up in one paragraph that it did not undertake in the writing sued on to give appellee a position for three years, and in another paragraph it averred that it discharged him because he failed to perform his work in a satisfactory or successful manner. Upon a trial before a jury a verdict was returned in favor of appellee for $2,000, and from the judgment entered upon this verdict it prosecutes this appeal.

[96] In accord: Schmand v. Jandorf, 175 Mich. 88, 140 N. W. 996, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 680, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 746 (1913), services as skilled candy maker for one year "to the satisfaction of" Jandorf.

The first error assigned by counsel is the failure of the lower court to sustain a demurrer to the petition. [The reason given was that the contract was void for want of mutuality; but the court held that both made conditional promises for a three-year period and that neither had the privilege of terminating performance.] * * *

Another ground for reversal relied on is alleged error of the court in giving to the jury the following instructions:

No. 1. [This instruction was to the effect that the discharge was wrongful in case the jury believed that the plaintiff had performed his work "in a good, efficient, and workmanlike manner."]

"No. 2. If you find for the plaintiff, you will award to him such sum in damages as you believe from the evidence was the amount lost by him by reason of being discharged from the service of the defendant, and that means, gentlemen, you will find for him, the plaintiff, in the event you find for him at all, the full amount of his contract wages from the time he was discharged until the period of employment terminated, by its date, to wit, January 1, 1912, which would amount to $2,460, from which you will deduct such sum as you believe from the evidence the plaintiff has earned, and such sum, if any, as you may believe from the evidence the plaintiff could by the exercise of diligent efforts to secure employment have earned, and such sum as you believe from the evidence the plaintiff will earn or by the exercise of reasonable diligence to obtain employment can earn up to the termination of the period of time covered by the contract, to wit, January 1, 1912. Your verdict for the plaintiff, if you find for the plaintiff, not to exceed the sum of $2,260. If you find for the defendant, you will say so by your verdict, and no more."

The objection urged to instruction No. 1 relates to the construction placed by the court upon the words, "in a successful or satisfactory manner." It will be observed that the trial court instructed the jury that these words meant that appellee was "to perform his work as foreman in a good, efficient, and workmanlike manner," and, if he did so, it had no right to dismiss him; while it is the contention of counsel for appellant that under the contract it was the sole judge as to whether appellee performed his work in a successful or satisfactory manner, and it had the right to determine in good faith this question for itself, and to discharge appellee without reference to whether the service rendered by him was efficient and workmanlike or not. There is a line of cases holding that, where the master reserves the right to discharge the servant if his services are not "satisfactory," he may do so without any other cause or reason than the mere fact that he is not satisfied with him or his service. Other cases hold that under such a contract the master in discharging the servant before the term ends must in good faith be dissatisfied, and that, if he is in good faith dissatisfied with the services of the employé, he may discharge him before the contract term has expired, although, in fact, no valid ground for the discharge exists. In the note to Corgan v. George F. Lee Coal Company, 218 Pa. 386, 67 Atl. 655, 120 Am. St. Rep. 891, reported in 11 Ann. Cas. 841, the authorities upon this question are collected, and a number of cases cited holding in the language of the editor of the note that: "Under a contract of employment for a definite term, provided the duties of the employment are satisfactorily performed, the services must be performed by the employé to the satisfaction of the employer, and the employer has the absolute right whenever he becomes in good faith dissatisfied with the services of the employé to discharge him."

But in nearly all of the cases where the right of the employer to discharge the employé if his services are not satisfactory is recognized the contracts of employment expressly and unconditionally conferred upon the employer this power, and there was no language in the contracts limiting this arbitrary authority or manifesting a purpose to protect the employé during the term, if he was capable and trustworthy, and performed his duties in an efficient and workmanlike manner.[97] And, if this contract read that appellant reserved the right to discharge appellee whenever his services were not satisfactory to it, or when he did not give satisfaction, there could be found ample authority to support the proposition that appellant might have discharged appellee before the expiration of the term if it was not in good faith satisfied with the manner in which he performed his duties, although he may have discharged them in an efficient or workmanlike manner. Wood on Master & Servant (2d Ed.) § 109; Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 496, 54 N. W. 157. But this rule, although well established and supported by the great weight of authority, ought not to be extended to embrace contracts that do not fall strictly within its scope.

And, as this contract may by its terms be taken out of the class to which other contracts giving to the employer the right to discharge without cause belong, we are not disposed to hold it applicable. When it was entered into, appellee was holding the same position guaranteed to him by the contract. He had informed the appellant that, as it was about to convert its establishment into a nonunion plant, he could not remain in its employment unless some satisfactory arrangement was made by which he would be insured permanent employment. Following this declaration of appellee, and as an inducement for him to remain in its employment, it prepared the contract in question. It will be observed that this contract stipulates that it is to continue in force "for the term of three years or as long as he performs his duties in a successful or satisfactory manner, provided Bridgeford & Co. are in existence," showing that it was intended by appellant to retain appellee in its service for as long as three years if he performed his duties in a successful or satisfactory manner, and it remained in business. Unless this was the intention of the parties, there was no reason for inserting in the contract that it should terminate before the expiration of three years if Bridgeford & Co. went out of existence. If it had the right to discharge appellee at any time his services were not satisfactory, it had the right to do so whether it went out of existence or not; and it is manifest that the words, "provided Bridgeford & Co. are in existence," were inserted in the contract to protect it from loss in the event it went out of existence before the expiration of three years, and while appellee was performing his services in a successful, or efficient and workmanlike manner.

The situation of the parties at the time it was entered into may also be looked to in arriving at their intention as expressed in the contract, and, when the conditions surrounding them are considered, it is manifest that it was not contemplated by either that one might arbitrarily and without good cause terminate the contract. Appellee wanted his position secured for a definite term, and appellant desired his services for a certain period, and with these mutual purposes in view the contract was entered into. To allow appellant to terminate at its pleasure a contract made under these circumstances would do violence to the intention of the parties when it was executed, and to the language employed to express their engagement. Having this view as to the proper construction of the contract, we think the trial court correctly instructed the jury.

The objection urged to instruction No. 2 is that it permitted the jury to award appellee damages which might accrue after the time of the trial which took place in November, 1910, more than 13 months before January 1, 1912, at which date the three years expired.[98]

[98] The part of the opinion subsequent hereto should be studied again later in connection with Schell v. Plumb and following cases, post, p. 784.

It is the settled law in this state, and has been so ruled by virtually all the courts, that in actions like this there can be only one recovery, and that one must include all past as well as future damage that has been or may be sustained by reason of the breach of contract on the part of the employer. The action to recover this damage may be brought as soon as the contract is broken, or at any time before the expiration of the term for which the employment was made, or the employé may, if he so elects, wait until the end of the term; but, whenever he brings the suit, he must in that suit recover all of his damage past and future growing out of the breach of the contract.

It is also the general rule that the measure of damage is the difference between the contract price and any sum earned by, or that by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have been earned by, the employé after his discharge. To illustrate: If under the contract the employé was to receive $100 a month, and immediately after his discharge he obtained employment that paid him $50 a month, the measure of his damage, assuming that he had a right to recover, would be $50 a month, and this would be all that he could recover, although he was not actually employed at $50 a month, provided it appeared that he could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have procured employment that would have paid him this sum. So that, if the trial should take place after the expiration of the contract, there would not be much difficulty in determining by the application of this rule the amount of damage to which the injured employé was entitled; but, if the trial is had before the contract expires, it is apparent that the sum he would earn or that he might earn by the exercise of reasonable diligence between the date of the trial and the expiration of the contract is necessarily involved in great uncertainty, and this has induced some courts to reject the right to recover any damages after the date of the trial if it takes place before the expiration of the contract. McMullan v. Dickinson, 60 Minn. 156, 62 N. W. 120, 27 L. R. A. 409, 51 Am. St. Rep. 511.

But the great weight of authority supports the rule prevailing in this state, that the action may be brought before the expiration of the term; and, if it is, damages may be recovered in this action for loss that will be sustained for the whole of the term, although the trial may be had before the term expires. In Pierce v. Tenn., etc., Coal Co., 173 U. S. 1, 19 Sup. Ct. 335, 43 L. Ed. 591, the Supreme Court of the United States, in considering this question said: "The defendant committed an absolute breach of the contract at a time when the plaintiff was entitled to require performance. The plaintiff was not bound to wait to see if the defendant would change its decision and take him back into its service, or to resort to successive actions for damages from time to time, or to leave the whole of his damages to be recovered by his personal representative after his death. But he had the right to elect to treat the contract as absolutely and finally broken by the defendant; to maintain this action once for all, as for a total breach of the entire contract; and to recover all that he would have received in the future as well as in the past if the contract had been kept. In so doing he would simply recover the value of the contract to him at the time of a breach, including all the damages past or future resulting from the total breach of the contract. The difficulty and uncertainty of estimating damages that the plaintiff may suffer in the future is no greater in this action of contract than they would have been if he had sued the defendant in an action of tort to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in its service, instead of settling and releasing those damages by the contract now sued on." The same rule was announced in John C. Lewis Co. v. Scott, 95 Ky. 484, 26 S. W. 192, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 49, 44 Am. St. Rep. 251; Forked Deer Pants Co. v. Shipley, 80 S. W. 476, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 2299; Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 385, 18 Atl. 704, 5 L. R. A. 759; Hamilton v. Love, 152 Ind. 641, 53 N. E. 181, 54 N. E. 437, 71 Am. St. Rep. 384; Smith v. Cashie, etc., Co., 142 N. C. 26, 54 S. E. 788, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Howay v. Going, etc., Co., 24 Wash. 88, 64 Pac. 135, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, 85 Am. St. Rep. 942.

It is further argued that the averments of the petition are not sufficient to authorize any recovery after the time of the trial. In support of this, attention is called to Lewis & Co. v. Scott, supra, in which the court said: "If it was to be a part of her damages that she remained out of employment after seeking it, it was incumbent on her to allege the fact, and, if because she brought her suit before the expiration of the contemplated term of service she could not fix the damage or loss with certainty, this was a burden she voluntarily assumed by bringing the suit when she did. She must lay the basis as best she may upon which the jury may assess her damages. It would be an approximation, but is permissible, and is the most that could be required of her, and the best she could do unless she waited until the year was out." As the plaintiff under the rule prevailing in this state in actions like this is required to aver and prove that he was unable to obtain other employment, if such be the case, it is manifest that it would be practically impossible for the plaintiff to truthfully aver or state that he could not obtain employment after the trial, as he could not with any degree of certainty declare in advance whether he could obtain employment or not, or what compensation he would derive from employment if he succeeded in obtaining it, and therefore it is argued that no damages should be allowed after the trial.

Viewing the matter from a logical standpoint, there is much force in this contention; but, as practically all the authorities agree that only one action can be brought and this may be brought and tried before the end of the term, it follows that, if this practice is to be adhered to, the damages subsequent to the trial must be estimated as best they can, for, when the law points out the method by which an injured person may obtain redress, it should not impose conditions that would deny him the right to secure the redress to which it has said he was entitled; and so all that the plaintiff in cases like this should be required to do is to state in his petition, as did the appellee, that he had been unable to obtain other employment, although he had diligently endeavored to do so, and to show by evidence what he earned and what efforts he made to get employment up to the trial, leaving it to the jury to determine from the evidence what employment the plaintiff may obtain and how much he can earn between the time of the trial and the termination of the contract. Of course, in arriving at what should be allowed for damages after the trial, the jury can only be guided by the evidence of conditions that existed before and at the time of the trial and from these determine the amount to be awarded. It would not be fair to the plaintiff to assume in the absence of evidence to that effect that he will not be damaged subsequent to the trial or to assume that he can and will obtain employment through which he can earn more than the contract price, and if there is uncertainty or doubt about this part of the recovery, the person who incurred the responsibility by committing the breach of the contract should bear the burden of any injustice that may result, And so we are of the opinion that the petition was sufficient, and that the instruction conformed to the law as it is administered in this class of cases.

Another ground for reversal is that the evidence does not support the verdict, and that the recovery is excessive. We have carefully read the record, and our conclusion without going into details is that appellee at all times performed his duties in a good, efficient, and workmanlike manner, and that his discharge was not justified by any failure upon his part to discharge in such a manner his part of the contract. Probably the assessment was slightly more than it should have been, but we are not prepared to say that it was so excessive as to justify us in interfering with the finding of the jury. We have noticed all the material grounds for reversal pointed out by counsel, and upon the whole case find no reversible error.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

GERISCH v. HEROLD.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1912. 82 N. J. Law, 605, 83 Atl. 892, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 627.)

Action by John C. Gerisch against Rudolph Herold. Judgment for plaintiff (81 N. J. Law, 171, 79 Atl. 1028), and defendant brings error. Reversed, and venire de novo awarded.

The plaintiff agreed to erect and finish a house in a good workmanlike and substantial manner under the direction of Joseph Turck, architect, to be testified by a writing or certificate under the hand of Turck, and also to find and provide good, proper, and sufficient materials for completing and finishing all the work. The defendant agreed to pay for the same in four payments, the last of which, $3,000, was to be made when all the work was completed according to the plans and specifications to the satisfaction of the owner or his representative. The contract also provided in the ordinary form that, should any dispute arise respecting the true construction or meaning of the drawings or specifications, it should be decided by Joseph Turck, and his decision should be final and conclusive. This suit is for the last payment. One plea averred that the plaintiff did not complete all the work to the satisfaction of the owner or his representative. The replication to the plea averred that the owner fraudulently withheld his satisfaction, and on this issue was joined. This issue was not submitted to the jury, and the defendant did not request its submission. He relied upon a motion to nonsuit for failure of the plaintiff to prove that the work was done to the satisfaction of the owner or his representative. The architect had certified that the plaintiff was entitled to the payment of $3,000 by the terms of the contract.

SWAYZE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Contracts requiring the work to be satisfactory to the employer are valid. Gwynne v. Hitchner, 66 N. J. Law, 97, 48 Atl. 571. This decision has been approved in this court in a suit involving the same contract. Gwynne v. Hitchner, 66 N. J. Law, 97, 48 Atl. 571. A distinction is sometimes made between cases where the fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment of the promisor are involved, and cases where only operative fitness or mechanical utility is involved. 9 Cyc. 618, ff. Gwynne v. Hitchner was a case of the former class, and, although the case of a building contract is somewhat different, we see no reason to doubt that the mere taste or fancy of the owner may be an important element in a dwelling house at least. The Supreme Court has applied the rule to that situation, and we do not question the soundness of its decision. Welch v. Hubschmitt Co., 61 N. J. Law, 57, 38 Atl. 824. In the present case the parties made a clear distinction between the workmanship and the materials. The character of the former was to be testified to by Turck's certificate. The only provision as to the latter is that they should be good, proper, and sufficient for completing the work. The workmanship might well be left to the judgment of another while the owner to gratify his own taste might well desire to retain control of the latter himself.

No doubt it is true, as Justice Holmes said in Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284, 21 N. E. 312, 14 Am. St. Rep. 422: "When the consideration furnished is of such a nature that its value will be lost to the plaintiff either wholly or in great part unless paid for, a just hesitation must be felt, and clear language required before deciding that payment is left to the will, or even to the idiosyncrasies of the interested party." The court in that case seized upon the words, "or the work demonstrated," as offering an alternative to the owner's acknowledg-
